She had a grand time then—but after it was over and the guests had gone, Aunt Cis noted that Ann ran to her room and had a good cry. Whether it was the wistful feeling a girl gets when she passes that adult milestone and realizes girlhood's behind her, or whether it was a sign she felt lonely facing the grown-up world without someone to hold her hand, no one but Ann Blyth will ever know. She doesn't wear her heart on her sleeve.

But the general conviction around Hollywood is that while Ann Blyth's heart is not the hasty kind, it's no less warm because she hides it deep inside herself until the right and ripe time to give it. When that happens—well, a wise young married friend of Ann's predicts: "If Ann ever falls in love and discovers what she's been missing, you'll find a very different Ann Blyth from then on."

In one way, all who know her long for that to happen to Ann. In another way, they don't. They'd hate to see her change. The thing is, everyone loves Annie just the way she is. THE END my prayer was answered

"But this can't be," I told myself. "I've prayed for it."

There was no mistake. And that's how I really learned about prayer. In the midst of a suddenly shattered world, in tears and bewilderment came the beginning of my greatest lesson. It was a dimly etched beginning—too dim for me to recognize it right away.

So I cried often and I cried good and hard. There was no acceptable explanation. I had asked. I had not received.

I listened indifferently when, a few days later, Warners' told me that I was going to MGM on loan-out—for a picture called Midnight Mary. Midnight Mary was a low-budget production. I was rebellious.

But the habit of prayer was so integral a part of my life that my agony of disappointment could not destroy it. Only now, I prayed to be given understanding.

I learned to bear my disappointment. I learned to walk with my humiliation as I realized that supplication cannot be dictation.

Midnight Mary was a box-office surprise. A nice, big, fat money-maker. That is important in Hollywood. So it made a kid named Loretta Young suddenly important in Hollywood, too.

Berkeley Square was a beautiful picture. Heather Angel was exquisite and Leslie Howard was perfection in this fragile, whimsical drama. But for all its loveliness, its enchantment, it was not a big, fat money-maker.

I was sad that this was so. I felt no triumph. I was too busy exploring the lesson He had given me.

The prayer for the part in Berkeley Square is the unforgettable specific prayer in my life—because its answer was so different from my desire. Its lesson is part and parcel of all my prayers, a lesson that is proved to me in one way or another almost every day. I find it even in comparatively inconsequential events.

There was a woman who for no particular reason irritated me every time I met her. And I was forever meeting her. At parties, at my friends' homes, at the studio, on the street. I was actually exhausted by the strain it was to be civil to her. Exasperated, I prayed one evening, "Dear God, please don't let her be at the party tonight! I just want to enjoy myself for a change." I know this sounds childish—but aren't we all, sometimes?

Having prayed, I arrived at the party somewhat comforted. I was aghast to see her standing right beside the hostess! And then I remembered. I was telling Him again! "Well," I thought, "if this is the way it's to be, I'd just better stop seeing all the things I don't like about her and start looking for something that I can like."

Suddenly I realized she was smiling at me—and her smile was lovely. She came up to me tentatively—not at all the gushy, aggressive person she'd always been before. She said, "Loretta, I've always felt you disliked me—and I resented it. I want to apologize for the things I've thought about you. When you smiled so warmly at me just now I knew I was wrong."

I could not have been more surprised. I had no consciousness of having smiled at her first!

We are now and have been since that night the dearest of friends. Again He had led me and reversed my own expressed desire.

The greatest lesson I have learned in life is to be able to recognize the answer to a prayer when it comes—bewilderingly disguised. THE END

That did it!

I wish I'd known then that a little praise is music to a man's ears, but too much of it goes right to his head. Spurred on by my enthusiasm, Mr. Jonah had the shamelessness to demand a year's rent in advance!

And what a gullible girl I was. I paid him.

There comes a day in every girl's life when she has to make an important decision. When my day dawned, three days before my expensive encounter with Mr. Jonah, I wasn't prepared for it.

I'd come home from high school and had pushed my nose, as usual, into one of my favorite movie magazines. I was sitting at the dressing table in my bedroom, reading avidly, lost in the story of Garbo's off-screen life, when I happened to glance up into the mirror to see myself for one marvelous instant—as Garbo! The vision passed quickly, and in its place appeared my everyday face above the rigidly starched middy blouse, looking a little ashamed.

"See here!" I said to myself with sudden, dramatic decision. "Enough of this play-acting. You're a big girl now, and life is passing you by. The time has come for you to strike out for yourself—to ACT!"

It was a big and solemn moment. I jumped up and ran through the house looking for mother. She was doing the family wash on the back porch, and I think she was glad of the interruption.

"Mama," I said, "we're going to move! We'll leave Anaheim and the past behind us, and go to Hollywood. I'm going to be a movie star!"

Mother looked at me sadly.

"C'mon, Mama," I begged. "Say we can go now!"

She smiled and sighed. "Now, look," she began.

"Mama," I interrupted, "it's a cinch! I know all about how to get into pictures. I've been reading about it for years. We'll just sell all this old stuff—" I swept my arm dramatically over the wash tub—"and move. Today—tomorrow, maybe. I have enough money—more than enough. The money Daddy left me."

Mother closed her eyes briefly. I guess she was trying to figure how far I'd be able to stretch the $11,000 my father'd left me when he had passed away nine years earlier.

"It was supposed to pay for your schooling," Mama said, finally, "but I guess your father would have wanted you to use it for your career, if that's what you have your heart set on. . . . Now, now, you'll get all soapy!" she protested as I gathered her up in a bear hug. . . .

Three days later I stood in Hollywood in my new expensive living room, the town's carpet spread out at my feet just waiting for me to walk on it barefoot. I was excited, up there on Cloud Nine. But I was scared, too. My friend Jonah and his rent routine had taken a little of the starch out of my middy blouse.

Middy blouse! I looked down at my uniform and sneakers and wondered if they were still casting for "Our Gang" comedies. How sexless could a movie star be? What I needed, I decided right then, was something dripping bugle beads and satin.

Clutching what was left of my "career money"—still a sizable chunk—in my hot little hand, I walked down the hill into Hollywood proper to make like a movie star.

Two hours later I had put the finishing touches on my wardrobe. I ground to a stop in front of the house in a brand new used car—a huge 1928 Packard. In the back seat were a mink coat and enough elaborate gowns to see even a modest clothes-horse through six racing seasons.

Two weeks later, I had put the finishing touches on my legacy. There I sat in my hillside home waiting for the casting directors to begin to wear out the telephone line with offers—while the man in the bank began to figure up how much I'd overdrawn.

Yep! Marie Wilson, the girl with the head full of holes, had gone through her "fortune" plus $1.38 of the bank's money in a fortnight. In those wonderful days of low prices it really took some kind of a reverse Einstein to blow $11,000 in 14 days!

Still, I felt I'd accomplished something. I'd installed my whole family in the house—my mother, my stepfather, my grandfather, my two half-sisters and my two half-brothers; I'd bought them all new wardrobes and had had their teeth fixed; I'd stocked the pantry with $500 worth of canned goods; the rent was paid for a year, and I was on the verge, I felt sure, of becoming a star overnight.

Well, long before we'd made a real dent in those canned goods, I did actually break into the movies! MGM gave me a test—and then, while they did nothing about it, Warners saw the test and did. I got a $75-a-week contract and, after a few small parts, I was given a big, fat role in Boy Meets Girl.

But after this good start, the bottom sort of dropped out of the Marie Wilson market, along about 1940. And even a year later I was still haunted by the tune at the top of my hate parade, "No Casting Today."

I remember coming out of Paramount one bleak November day in 1941, with the casting director's firm "Sorry, Marie," still ringing in my ears. It was cold. Darned cold. I patted myself on the back for having bought that fur coat. It wasn't this year's mink, but it sure kept me warm.

I remember looking around the cold, windswept corner of Melrose and Irving and suddenly thinking of a sun-drenched strip of beach in Miami, Florida—a spot I'd always wanted to visit. I looked into my purse. The buffalo on the lone nickel there looked back at me, and I swear he winked! On a crazy impulse I closed myself into a phone booth and used my last coin to call the local airline office.

"How much is a one-way ticket to Miami?" I asked the man at the other end of the line. When he told me $240.35, I started to laugh. It began way down at my toes and rippled on up until even my chin chattered. As I pushed open the telephone booth door to leave I automatically slipped my finger into the coin return slot. And sure enough, I hit pay dirt in that pay phone! For the Bell Telephone Company, with rare good timing, had poured into my hand $1.55.

On a hunch that maybe my luck was changing, I dropped one of the nickels back into the phone and dialed my agent.

"Glad you called, honey," he chirruped, "I've just made a deal for you to appear on the Texaco Star Theater next week."

Believe it or not, it was on that very broadcast that I met Ken Murray. Ken is that wonderful guy who, a few months later, put me into his Blackouts. And that revue kept my purse full for the next seven years.

And before it closed, I got another terrific break. Cy Howard saw me in it and gave me the title role in his radio show, My Friend Irma. And later on I got to have given my movie career a new and wonderful boost.

By this time, I've learned another big lesson—about pretending to be something or somebody you're not. Who're you kidding? The answer to that one is almost always—yourself.

Somebody touted me into acting like a movie star, once. Once was enough. "Marie," they said to me, "if you plan on being a big star, you'd better start acting like one. Forget you came from Anaheim."

So I did. I hired a chauffeur and a limousine. But I was allergic to the car upholstery, and the chauffeur's driving made me nervous. I smiled graciously at the Brown Derby waiter captain, instead of giving him my usual, "Hi, Bill!" And it almost broke his heart. I went to the opera, because it was cultural. I found it expensively restful. I fell asleep in the middle of the first act, in a seat that had set me back $6.50! I read Homer and Virgil and the latest best sellers—and wound up with eyestrain. And the only person who was impressed with this big act was my bank teller. He told me he never thought money could go out of a checking account so fast!

Today when I drive my own Ford convertible, and take my dog, Mr. Hobbs, to previews with me, or ask Bill, the Derby captain, how his wife feels, I'm just being Marie Wilson. If that's type-casting, I'm all for it. . . .

Girls have to play it smart where men are concerned. We're not all quiz kids. (Goodness, I guess I should know!) But there's a pretty good substitute for brains—old-fashioned horse-sense. If it's good enough for old-fashioned horses, I don't see why modern girls can't get some good out of it, too.

Horse-sense is that thing that tells us when a man doesn't mean what he says he means. When a fellow talks about art, it may be just his way of inviting you to preview his etchings. Or when a man tries to convince you that black is white, it's horse-sense that tells you it doesn't necessarily mean he's color blind.

Horse-sense has saved many a girl's reputation—and believe me, your reputation is your most important asset! That's one reason I never dated the fellows on any set I ever worked on. Don't get me wrong—I had plenty of chances. But dating the fellows you work with is bad business. It always ends up with holes in your reputation, because, despite what they say, most men in a girl's life love to kiss and tell. It's just better all the way around to skip dates with people on the home team. That goes for that good-looking, wavy-haired clerk down the hall from your office, and the floorwalker in the store where you work, too. On the set or in the office—it's all the same.

I'd been in pictures eight years before I risked making a date with an actor. It was in Rookies on Parade at Republic Studios that I first saw this fellow. Gee, he was beautiful! Six-foot-three, brown curly hair, and a cute grin! His name was Allan Nixon.

When he walked across the sound stage to ask me to go to dinner with him, the butterflies in my tummy began stamping their feet! Believe me, it was the only time in my life I forgot to say "no!"

Allan told me later that if I'd been the kind of girl who had made a habit of set-dating, he wouldn't have even asked me to go out. As it turned out, of course, I've been Mrs. Allan Nixon for eight years.

Yes, the most precious thing a girl has is her reputation. Carry yours reverently in your lily white hands. And girls—this is no time to get butterfingers!

This reluctance of Nicky's to discuss his relationship with Liz seemed understandable, since Liz has had a way of changing her beaux with alacrity.

Of course you remember how she supposedly was divinely in love with Glenn Davis. It turned out that she wasn't divinely in love with Glenn Davis at all. She was only 15 at the time and mildly infatuated with Glenn's reputation and record as an athlete.

And then she supposedly was enraptured with Bill Pawley, Jr. In this case, it was Bill who called it quits. He could see the handwriting on the wall. He realized after six months of "going" with Liz that she was never of a mind to renounce her acting career and settle in Florida. He knew which way the wind was blowing, and he resigned from Liz's heart before he was fired.

Then, who should advance to the fore of her love life but Vic Damone, the Bay Ridge lover from Brooklyn.

Vic was booked into the Mocambo in Hollywood. Liz went around to see him, well-chaperoned; and this is how those unfair stories of her being a night-club habitue originated.

Liz was so shaken up about "what those nasty columnists are doing to my reputation" that she called Vic when he was singing at the Flamingo in Las Vegas and asked him what to do.

Vic advised Liz to write Walter Winchell the truth—whereupon she sat down and wrote Mr. Winchell that she had only been to Mocambo three times: once as Jane Powell's guest, once with her brother Howard and his girl, Mara Regan, and once just long enough to catch Vic's act and then go home.

Winchell set the public straight, and Elizabeth Taylor was acquitted in the eyes of her movie fans.

It was because of the previous men in her life, her extreme sensitivity, and her mother's hypersensitivity that people understandably refrained from publicly discussing Liz and Nicky.

An intimate friend of hers, for example, recently said to me, "I think Liz is head over heels in love with Nicky Hilton, and I'm sure she'll marry him. Only for Pete's sake, don't quote me."

A colleague of Liz's felt much the same way: "While we were shooting Father of the Bride," he told me, "Nicky Hilton used to come on the set often. I've been in love myself, you know, and if the love light wasn't burning in the eyes of those two kids, then all my experience has been for nothing."

"Look," said a young girl who knows both Nicky and Liz and has double-dated with them. "I think they're going to get married and get married quickly.

"Nicky has had all the education he needs. He went to New Mexico Military Institute in Roswell, to De Paul University in Chicago and to Loyola in Los Angeles. He studied business administration, and he's in the process of making some hotel deals just like his father.

"As for Liz—well, she's been in the limelight with different fellows for the past three years. A lot of writers have called her a siren and a femme fatale and all that sort of silly stuff. The truth is that she's just a normal, healthy American girl just like me. She likes to go out with boys, and so do I, only she has to be very, very careful. That's the price of stardom, of being famous. I can go out with any guy I want. Not Liz. She needs a young man, handsome, good family, unblemished reputation.

"She's got to stay out of nightclubs, dance halls, jam-joints. She might as well be running for President."

A day after Nicky Hilton had told me, "any further announcement, Liz's mother will have to make"—Liz's mother made one.

She said: "Oh, Liz and I planned to keep it secret. We wanted to make the announcement at a surprise party—but you know how those reporters are. Mr. Hilton spoke to them in New York and asked them to keep the news back for a few weeks, but they released it. So I guess we might as well come out with it now. Yes, Elizabeth and Nicky are definitely going to be married on May 6th. It will be a very large church wedding with all the trimmings."

The engagement tea which Liz gave after her mother's announcement was attended by Jane Powell; Marilyn Hilton, her future sister-in-law; Mara Regan, her brother's girl; Ann Westmore, daughter of make-up man Wally Westmore; Betty Sullivan; Barbara Thompson, and about a dozen others.

Pete Freeman, the son of Y. Frank Freeman, Paramount Theaters executive and a partner in the Hilton Hotel Chain, is the one who brought them together.

"It happened over at Paramount," Nicky says. "I was on the set of A Place in the Sun, the picture Liz was shooting with Monty Clift, and Pete introduced me to her. And I sure was impressed with her. We asked her to have lunch with us and then the four of us—Pete's wife was along—went to Lucy's across the street. Then, not long after, I asked her for a date, well, we simply fell in love."

Nicky Hilton—he was called Nicky by his mother because his middle name is Nicholson and there had to be some way of differentiating him by call from his father—is as good-looking, charming, and prosperous as any young man Liz ever dated. He seems very right for her.

As one of Liz's friends put it, "After all, Nicky lives in Bel Air. He won't insist that she move away or give up her career. Liz can have a real full life —a husband, a home, a family, two or three Cadillacs, all the clothes she wants, and stardom. What more can a girl ask?"

And what more could a boy ask for than Elizabeth Taylor? THE END

MODERN SCREEN

"Two, Please!"

my heart stood still

Well, they sent me to a Manhattan restaurant called Danny's Hideaway, where Farley was sitting with John Springer, who works for RKO. John Springer has a terrible tough job. When Jane Russell comes to town without her husband, poor John has to just devote himself to taking Jane to night clubs and theaters and restaurants every night. I gave him a pitying look. He returned it.

"This is Farley Granger," he said. Then he went away.

My heart ——— ———. "I love you," I said. I'm no beater around bushes.

"Before breakfast?" Farley said. Him either.

He was drinking orange juice, in a suave, daring manner. I gave the waiter my order. A glass of aspirin, and two waters.

A lady from the next table stuck another lady's hand across under my nose. "Farley," said the first lady, "I'd like you to meet Miss So-and-So of Such-and-Such magazine."

"How do you do?" said Farley, and the lady said she did nicely, and that was that.

"After we're married," I said, "I won't have you speaking to other women."

"I think I'll call a cop," said Farley.

Now consider the problem. Caring for a young man who's cared for by all the other females in the country. He was just voted Most Eligible Bachelor of the Year, in fact. Montgomery Clift, who was first last year, only placed third. I believe a millionaire got in there between him and Farley. Which has nothing to do with the case. Not even my case on Farley.

"Tell me what you've been doing in New York," I said. (I have a whole stock of original questions like that, for when conversation bogs down.)

He told me. The night before, he'd been to see the musical comedy, Miss Liberty, and then had gone backstage to visit its star, Allyn McClerie. Allyn is an old friend he hadn't seen in three years and theirs was an exciting reunion, because so much had happened to both of them in three years.

After that, Allyn, her husband, Adolph Green, and Farley went to the Copacabana to hear Lena Horne sing. They had a table right at ringside, and Lena, that gorgeous, sultry lady, grinned when she saw them, and when she sang "The Lady Is a Tramp," she really gave it to Farley. "Hate California, it's cold and it's damp," she growled, singing right to him, throwing it in his lap, so to speak, and he didn't know when he'd had so much fun.

I was hanging on these glamorous reminiscences with unbecoming avidity, when Cliff Cochrane, the Danny's Hideaway photographer, came over and snapped my picture with Farley, and I began mentally to rearrange the 47 other pictures on the bedroom wall.

"Jimmy Durante is very fond of this place," Cochrane said. "Whenever he's appearing in a night club, we get free publicity. 'I don't have to work here,' Jimmy's always telling his audience. 'I can go to Danny's place. Less money, but contentment.' "

Take the moment when the MODERN SCREEN photographer (another photographer, and his name is Nelson Morris) goes to shoot a romantic tête-à-tête between me and Farley, and this lady springs into action.

"Push the Pepsi machine into the foreground," she tells the fountain man.

"I can't," says the fountain man.

"Why not?" says the lady.

"Because the pipe from that machine runs down into the cellar," says the fountain man coldly.

Nobody went and sawed off the pipe, so the machine didn't get pushed into the picture, but you all know Pepsi-Cola hits the spot, don't you? (There, lady, how's that?)

By this time, Farley was due at CBS, where he was supposed to put an interview on tape for commentator Margaret Arlen. (They record the interview on a Thursday afternoon, for instance, but it isn't heard on the radio until the following Monday morning. Stick with me, and you'll learn the wonders of science.)

We walked from the Pepsi palace to CBS, and the temperature was about 75 degrees, which is the kind of cockeyed winter New York had this year, and there was a funny pink haze over the whole day. All along the way, kids stopped Farley to ask for autographs, or to take pictures, but they were marvelously polite kids, full of pleases and thank-yous.

At CBS, Miss Arlen, who is a brisk, chic, blonde girl, handed Farley a script, he read it once, and then they recorded it. To give you some idea how good that boy is, the dialogue sounded ad lib, completely conversational. If I hadn't been there, I'd never have guessed that any of it was written down on paper.

Miss Arlen interviewed Farley for her listeners. They talked about his first couple of pictures, North Star, and Purple Heart. They discussed his hitch in the Navy. They touched on the miserable year he spent after he got out of service.

"Going to the Goldwyn office to beg for work," Farley summed it up.

There he'd been, for a solid year—studying voice, being coached in drama, doing some sailing, playing some tennis, putting up a good front, but not working. It was frightening, because he's a boy who never wanted to do anything besides act. Oh, a few things, of course, but not in the same class. He's no personality kid who fools around with acting, can take it or leave it, thinks it's a nice way to make a living, and that's all. To Farley, acting's serious. He's still not convinced he's good. "I will be," he says. "But I have so much to learn."

Just when he thought he'd hit bottom, They Live By Night came along, and then Alfred Hitchcock used him in Rope, a kind of nervous, unpleasant part, but you could see Farley'd grown up to be a sensitive, intelligent actor, and then Roseanna McCoy put him over with a romantic lead.

They say his newest picture, Edge of Doom, is the greatest thing since The Informer, and that he's the greatest young actor of our day.

Miss Arlen's interview covered the foregoing facts neatly and completely. She sounded properly enthusiastic, Farley sounded properly modest, and I sat in a nearby chair holding Farley's jacket. It was a lovely jacket, some rough, grey Scotch material, and he looked beautiful in it.

*T. M. REG. U. S. PAT. OFF.

The interview completed, Farley had to go see his boss, Mr. Goldwyn, who was also visiting New York that week. I couldn't follow him any farther. Follow him farther, and I had a vision of eight liveried minions heaving me out of a hotel suite on my ear. (I'm sure Mr. Goldwyn doesn't really have eight liveried minions, but I'm the fearful type. Maybe Mr. Goldwyn would heave me out all by himself.)

Anyway, Farley and I were phfft. Washed up. Finished. Goodbye, au revoir, auf wiedersehen, cheerio.

I came home sadly, to write my interview. You want to know the truth? I found out I'd forgotten to interview him. I don't know what he gave his mother for Christmas. I don't know how many rooms in his house, or if he owns an 80-foot sloop. I don't know if he does like raw onions, or sleeps in his butler's old pajamas.

But ask me what color eyes he has. Brown, that's what color. Deep, deep brown. His hair is crinkly, his laugh is special. He's very tall, he has lots of shoulders, he doesn't turn on that canned-in-Hollywood charm.

They tell me he cares for Shelley Winters. I guess I'll go kill myself. THE END sometimes I hate my husband

And that isn't all. He then phones Regis Toomey, and Jimmy Cagney, and his business manager, and then maybe somebody else to make a date for flying on Sunday. He gets a million details out of his head (which is that of a frustrated businessman) and finally emerges flushed and triumphant from his tête-à-tête with Mother Bell. Then, I must admit, he makes up for it to me, because whether or not I had been inside the front door on his arrival, he finds me and really kisses me.

Take the matter of the trees around our house. I've talked before about Richard's mania for removing them, but believe me, it's still going on after two years. By this time, more than 20 have disappeared and I sometimes wonder when he has them all down if he'll suggest we go to live in Sherwood Forest so that he can have himself a whale of a time. It goes against my grain to see the poor things chopped down, and it seems to me that a new one disappears on a weekly basis—usually a eucalyptus, because Richard harbors a dislike for them. Recently he had an entire row removed from the edge of our driveway, and the other day when we drove in, he pointed to the lumpy earth.

"There," he said. "Now doesn't that look better?"

"No," I said. "It doesn't. It looks as though the house is doing a gradual striptease."

Bushes disappear by the score and days later I find them planted on the opposite side of the house. It all stems from Richard's penchant for puttering around the house, and his desk is cluttered with maps designing the replacement of trees, furniture, bushes, pictures; of everything, in fact, but me.

To add insult to injury, he spends hours chopping the wood and claims the exercise does wonders for him. The fourth time he made the statement that his muscles were growing by leaps and bounds I asked to see his biceps. He obliged by taking off his shirt.

"Pooh," I said. "They don't look one whit bigger to me."

I trust that fixed him for chopping up my trees.

His puttering can include anything. My desk, for instance. While he stands there talking to me, he makes four or five neat piles out of what had been two neat piles, and when I go there to find something, instead of being able to put my finger on it immediately, I have to re-sort everything.

It also includes automobiles. By the time I've broken in a new car and have grown to regard it as a member of the family, he drives me home some night and there will be a new one in the driveway.

"I wonder who's here," I say.

"That's for you," he says. "Like it?"

Now, I want it understood that I am far from unappreciative of Richard's generosity, and a new car is something really to get excited about. But he switches them like razor blades, and it's only been in the last few months that I've come to recognize the gleam in his eye that means my beloved convertible won't be here tomorrow. This at least gives me the opportunity to sneak out to the garage and bid the car a proper farewell.

He's always right. All the time. When I invented the code for my checking account, he smiled wisely and said it wouldn't work, that I might as well save myself the trouble and go right on forgetting what I'd bought.

"But it's quite simple," I told him. "After I mark down the amount of the check, I put my code after it. A question mark means it was something to wear for myself, a minus sign for anything for Pamela. I have a sign for everything."

"I'm sure you have, old girl," he said. "But it would be so much simpler to write down 'blouse' or 'wastebasket' or whatever the item is."

When the bank statement arrived, Richard approached me as usual, trying his best to smile brightly.

"Honey, I have a check here—"

I interrupted him with a wave of my hand. "Hold it—wait until I get my record. I have it all down in black and white." And after I'd fished the paper out of my desk, "Now—how much is it for?"

"$18.79."

"Let's see—$18.79. Here it is. Now—" I stopped short. I had marked a triangle next to the sum and for the life of me couldn't remember what it meant.

"Well?" said Richard.

"Give me time, give me time."

"You mean you don't know what it was."

"I guess I do. Don't, that is."

He patted me on the head. "You and your black and white!" he snickered.

When I learned that Richard and I would work together in The Reformer and the Redhead, I was a bit apprehensive, for I've heard it said that married people usually don't work well in a picture together. So in order to protect ourselves we made a pact that we wouldn't tell each other what to do, and it worked beautifully—except the night before the picture started. We were reading the script aloud together and after Richard had read a few lines I looked up and said, "That's funny."

"What's funny?"

"Well—you and I seem to have a different interpretation of the character you portray."

"Oh?" he said. "Well, what's yours?"

He disagreed when I told him, and it turned into a spirited five-minute discussion until it occurred to me that I had a nerve telling Richard anything, because he's had so much more experience than I and I told him so.

"But you're good, Junie," he said. "Really good, and I value your opinion."

"Oh, but I'm not. You're such a wonderful actor."

And so it simmered down to a mutual-admiration society. . . . But come to think of it, I guess that doesn't belong in this story because I started the discussion myself. When MODERN SCREEN asked me to do this I rolled up my sleeves in high glee. And—oh, dear!—here I am bogging down already. But there's one more illustration of my husband's little ways.

At a year-and-a-half, our daughter Pamela is just the age where she is inspecting everything, and one night when the three of us were in the den she reached for an ashtray.

"No, no," I told her. "Put it back. You may have this box but you can't have the ashtray."

One of Richard's eyebrows went up and he put down his book. "Isn't that sort of silly, honey?" he said to me.

"Silly?"

"Well," he said, "you can't expect the mind of a child Pam's age to distinguish between things she can or can't have."

"You're sure of tha[illegible]"

"Certainly."

"And you don't want me to tell her anymore?"

"No."

So the next night when he came home and buzz-bombed into the den to phone, his voice echoed through the house. "JUNE!"

I came running, trying to wipe the smile from my face. The floor of the den was littered with ashtrays, logs from the woodbox, playing cards, and peanuts.

"This is ridiculous!" said my husband, scraping crushed peanuts from the sole of his shoe. "You'll have to speak to Pamela. Be firm. She'll have to be told they're some things she mustn't touch."

"Yes, dear," I said.

Yesterday I met a woman who told me she was married to the most perfect husband in the world, and if I'd known her better I would have told her to watch her language. She was speaking of the man I love. I'd rather have Richard any old day than 20 eucalyptus trees. THE END

A few weeks later I ran into a beautiful woman, the wife of a big star. She'd been nagged with star ambitions herself until it made her life a hell. They had split up, as they'd done before, and I expected her to wear the harassed frown she'd carried since I first laid eyes on her. Not at all. She never looked happier.

"Things take on their true values for me now at last," she told me. "I don't care about a career—I know now that it's by no means the greatest thing in life." She explained that she'd been taking psychiatric treatment, and so had her famous mate. They hadn't solved their problem yet—they were still apart—but already there was inspiring progress and peace. She knew what was destroying her, and looking at it for what it was worth, she'd tossed it aside. He name is Pat Knight and her husband, of course, is Cornel Wilde.

Last fall when Bette Davis left her artist husband, William Grant Sherry, she told him frankly the only thing that would win her and their daughter, Barbara, back was a complete cure of his ungovernable temper. Sherry admitted his weakness, went to a psychiatrist on Bette's terms—still goes twice a week—and they're back together again.

Psychoanalysis won Ava Gardner the confidence and personality to tackle the big-time star's future which MGM mapped for her. Susan Hayward and Jess Barker have held their marriage together by steady, hard-slugging emotional lessons from a marriage psychologist. After George Sanders' divorce shocked him into taking scientific measures to wipe out his sullen and insulting self, he spent close to $5,000 curing himself of a career-threatening delight in issuing remarks like "Women are little beasts" and "Children are grubby brats."

Judy Garland's crack-up was cured in part by probings into her confused nerves—and she'll need more to stay steady. Lew Ayres reconciles his spiritual self with the commercial business of being a star by self-analysis—and he told me recently, "I think I'm doing a pretty good job of it." Jennifer Jones flew to Europe for the very best psychiatric counsel before marrying David Selznick. And David, himself, occasionally takes to a psychoanalyst's couch. So do Victor Mature, Jean Arthur, Bob Mitchum, Mel Ferrer, Vincent Price—a list of Hollywoodites too long to name, from top tycoons to the frustrated French poodles of both Greer Garson and Clifton Webb!

What is this wonder-work that has taken hold in Hollywood—the most notoriously neurotic, unstable, city in the whole wide world? Is it the real McCoy? Or is psychoanalysis, Hollywood style, just another movietown vogue, a fad of fakery—like swamis and sucker seers with their gypsy bandanas, crystal balls and tea leaves? Is it a gay game of glamorous self-deception? Are the stars just having fun being fooled, to make them feel better about fooling everybody else?

The answer is "No!"—not on their lives. Some archaic souls still think so, unfortunately. And some jaded ones, it's true, try out psychoanalysis just for a new thill. But to high-strung stars who need emotional help in a high-tension world, serious psychological diagnosis and treatment is a terrific boon—and, believe me, it's here in Hollywood to stay.

There are over a hundred reputable mind-doctors around Hollywood (the real ones are all MD's, too) and they're busy night and day helping stars find themselves, their happiness and their usefulness in life. As a doctor friend of mine puts it, "psychiatry is as necessary to a sick mind as medicine or surgery."

Some successful stars are so wrapped up in the fictitious characters they play, they neglect to look at their real selves until they blow a fuse. Then, facing the dark facts of their lives isn't so pleasant. Bob Walker knows about that. His experiences at the Menninger Clinic make an illuminating case-history of what a really mixed-up star must face to find a cure.

"To me," Bob told me, "a mental clinic had been an asylum for the insane. I couldn't stand the sense of shame attached to entering a mental institution. On the plane to Kansas I wore dark glasses, kept my hat-brim snapped over my face and hunched down in my coat collar. Actually, of course, nobody noticed me—and they wouldn't have cared if they had. But I couldn't realize that.

"I somehow had the idea that I'd find the clinic run on the line of a country club. My first shock came when I found myself behind locked doors. Then everything, including my razor, was taken from me. I bitterly resented it and kept thinking, 'Do they think I'm crazy?' But the greatest shock came when I stepped into my quarters. I found myself in a room with bars on the windows! I remember the terror of that first night alone in a barred room with strange sounds all around me.

"For the first month I was only under observation. I didn't realize it then, but a complete, scientific diagnosis was being made of me.

"At the end of the first month I was convinced the clinic was doing me no good. Being an actor I was able to convince a doctor I was perfectly capable of going into town by myself one night—or perhaps the clinic was only trying to convince me how sick I still was. Anyhow, I was allowed to go. I took a few drinks, got into a fight with a policeman, rammed my fist through a window. Again I was in headlines.

"Now I was convinced of my desperate situation. But I wanted to get out. I told myself I'd been there a month and here I was as bad as ever. My doctor advised me to stay, but his advice only irritated me. He said he had a psychoanalyst assigned to me. I said I wanted nothing to do with the man. You see, it was another attempt to avoid a show-down. I told my doctor I'd soon be leaving. He said, 'All right. It seems we can't help you.'

"A few days later the psychoanalyst came. I took a liking to him right away. His face was filled with kindness and understanding. He said he'd heard I was leaving but just dropped in anyway to say hello. First thing I knew I was talking to him as I've talked to few people in my life. But in the end I told him I was still determined to leave. He said that was all right.

"Next day I found an excuse to see that psychoanalyst again; this time I liked him even more. For the next few days I endured a hell of indecision, but finally I made up my mind. I told my analyst, 'I'm going to stay here and battle this thing out.' It was the most important decision in my life.

"I had one hour a day with the psychoanalyst, six days a week," Bob told me. "It was an emotionally-exhausting experience. For three weeks I spoke to nobody else, keeping myself shut in the room, eating little, sleeping little. Then one day the darkness began to clear and I knew I was getting well. You can't possibly understand that thrill. I had been shown how mental stumbling blocks had distorted my life. Four-and-a-half months later I was discharged." They'd warned Bob it might take him a year or maybe two, when he entered. Reason he could leave so soon was that he finally came to the point where he desperately wanted to help himself. He knows he's not completely well yet, but as he told me, "For the first time in my life I'm not being driven; I'm doing the driving. All the things that used to be terrors to me are challenges. And experience has shown me I can conquer them."

To me that's an inspirational story—but not a glamorous one. Tackling the job of ironing out a sick mind is no picnic, not when the illness almost always stretches back through years and years. Bob's trouble for instance, began as a kid; he got the idea he wasn't wanted, brooded about it until it took command of his life.

With that fix he couldn't adjust realistically to his grown-up life. He didn't believe he could possibly be loved—and this turned his own love to hatred. He loathed everyone including himself; the world was one big enemy. Drinking magnified that, and his split with Jennifer Jones added fuel to the fire. Being an actor didn't help either, Bob explained. "I only saw myself the more as the chief player in a tragedy and thought 'Poor, poor me!' " He visited a psychiatrist in Hollywood but it wasn't any good. Bob wasn't ready. Only when he wound up in drinking jams and police stations and saw his disheveled self splashed over papers and magazines did the horror of it make Bob anxious for a cure.

Bob's case points up a vitally important factor in cures of Hollywood's sick psyches: You have to be ready, you have really to want help before you've got a chance.

It takes guts to face the facts but frankness is part of the treatment. Cures of crippling complexes, in spite of what you may think, aren't worked by weaklings.

Not all psychiatric treatments bring cures, in Hollywood or anywhere else. But neither do all medical prescriptions or operations. Reputable psychiatrists will tell you right off that they aren't magicians.

Jean Arthur suffered painfully from complexes for years. Psychiatrists tried to help her time and again. Jean toted, among other things, the absurd bugaboo that she was no good because she didn't have a college education. She hated herself so that when people interviewed her or shot photographs she became physically ill. She lived like a lady hermit, wore a frown deep between her eyes, while all the time she was a terrific actress with a popularity unmatched and unlimited.

After 14 years of marriage, believe it or not, Jean went to college to take a course in marriage. Yet, she was soon divorced from her husband, Frank Ross. As a star, Jean finally became so temperamental nobody could take her. She agreed to do Born Yesterday on Broadway, for instance, with a salary and play-percentage that would make her the highest paid star on the street. But she demanded this, demanded that, thought she was persecuted, overlooked, slighted. Finally, she stepped out. I hear Jean's still being unhappy about everything but I hope she finds a great doctor who can help her.

Robert Mitchum's stab at straightening himself out was also too half-hearted to help. It happened before his marijuana mess and that sordid black mark on Bob's record might never have stuck there if he'd listened to the psychiatrist's advice. Bob was going great guns as a star, but all the time, in his own words, "I was constantly obsessed with the phantom of failure." It's a long story and traces back to complex chapters in Bob's adolescence. Anyway, not too long before the lightning struck, Bob let himself get tied up with some hangers-on and leeches who lured him into easy vices. He earned the reputation of being a "soft touch" and a "good guy." There was a time when he preferred these phonies and their flatteries to his family, or so it seemed.

Finally his worried mother, his sister and his wife, Dorothy, persuaded Bob to visit a psychiatrist and get himself set on a truer course. The doctor gave him a thorough going over and his verdict, as Bob remembers, was this: "He adjudged me rational, but suffering a state of over-amiability in which failure to please everyone created a condition of self-reproach. He told me I was addicted to nothing but the good will of people, and suggested that I risk their displeasure by learning to say 'NO!' and following my own judgment."

Did Bob take that advice? Not a bit. He really wasn't scared enough then—as Bob Walker became—nor desperate enough for help. He wasn't "ready." So he kept on being a "good guy," and one night when some pals suggested a trip up a canyon for fun, even though he was headed for home and tired, he said "Yes," and—well you and the judge and Bob and everyon knows the rest. But it never should have happened.

Jennifer Jones hadn't quite finished Madame Bovary when suddenly she flew away from Hollywood to see a famous psychiatrist in Switzerland. Jenny was David Selznick's fiancée then but she just couldn't make up her mind whether to tackle marriage again. I don't know whether she sought psychoanalysis because of the wonders it had worked with her ex-husband, Bob Walker, or whether she was confused about her feelings for David. Nor do I know what the doctor advised her. But I do know that she was mighty certain she knew her own mind before she said "I do" at last. She ironed out every possible doubt which remained and it was probably as smart a maneuver as she ever made in her life. Certainly Jenny and David give every appearance of having a hammer lock on married happiness. And at the same time, Jennifer can enjoy her children with her former husband Bob, with no emotions stirred up, which is good for her, good for Bob, good for the kids. Maybe more Hollywood marriages should be as psychologically cautious.

In fact, a prominent mind doctor I know bewails this very fact more than anything when you bring up the subject of Hollywood divorce. "Trouble is," he told me the other day, "married couples too often come to us to repair the damage after it's done. Before they get married, they should know themselves and their intendeds psychologically, not leave their mating to luck. They stand a far better chance of finding the right mate that way."

Ava Gardner's date with the psychiatrist was one of those close-the-barn-door-after-the-horse-has-gone treatments. Ava's marriage to Artie Shaw should possibly have never occurred. Ava was a country girl from the hills of Carolina, Artie a frustrated sophisticate. He'd been wrestling his psyche around long before he became famous as a bandleader, and Artie's still trying to find out what ails him and his marriages. He's lived in a frustrated world for so long. Hated jazz, wanted to be a writer, a great musician, anything but what he was.

Anyway, it was right after Ava's split-up with Artie that she took psychiatric treatment—at Artie's suggestion. Life with Artie had bewildered and beaten Ava down so—she dropped 15 pounds, worrying—that she had to build up her self-confidence again. The mental therapy did the trick—so well that Ava could not only tackle the major star's career she had always ducked shyly before, but could actually find herself grateful to Artie for telling her, "You haven't a personality of your own. Go find one." I think Ava did, all right—through psychiatry. And the strange thing is, her psychological cycle seems to have led her mind right back to —Artie Shaw! I haven't talked to Ava once in the past few weeks without hearing "Artie" in almost every sentence. It's no secret they get together now and then. If Ava actually should try it again with Artie, to be wife Number Six and the only repeat customer for the marrying bandman, and if it should work—brother, that would be a miracle of ironed-out egos!

But believe me, I'm not one to sell psychiatry short on anything. Not after what I've seen happen around Hollywood for those who take it seriously.

There's not a doubt in my mind but that most of Hollywood's tragedies could be avoided by frank psychiatric treatment. Would John Payne and Gloria DeHaven have been so yes-and-no about their marriage if they both had learned the score about themselves? Would Franchot Tone's ex-wife, Jean Wallace, have brooded herself into a suicide try? Would Wanda Hendrix and her Audie have had all their troubles? I could ask Hollywood questions like that all night. And, you can bet, plenty of others are asking them too.

In fact, from a cold-blooded standpoint, the men who really run the Hollywood show know by now that psychiatry is only sound Hollywood business. They've seen stars worth millions in the bank rescued by mental treatment in the nick of time when they were about to be cancelled out. They've watched big deals fizzle for want of a meeting of minds. They've seen useless tragedies of mixed-up behavior wreck box-office bonanzas it took years to dig and develop. Believe me, the studio gates aren't closed to psychiatrists these days. It's come right down to the bankroll—and when that's threatened you'll always get action in Hollywood.

If you don't think the movie moguls are hep to the new help, listen to this: Awhile back Paramount wanted Paulette Goddard to star in a certain picture. She read the script and shook her head. There was a scene in which she shot a man and she didn't see why. What's more, nobody could tell her why. Finally Paulette set a condition and a deadline for the deal. "If by next week, you can give me a logical reason why I should kill this character," she offered, "I'll play the part. If you can't—I won't." They couldn't and she didn't. Since that experience, Paramount has kept a professional psychologist on the payroll to explain emotional motives to its stars, and to smooth out temperaments and tempers.

Me, I've never had my soul searched, it's true, although I tried once and the doctor just laughed. "Go away," she said. "You're one of those garrulous extroverts who never let a neurosis sit still long enough to get going. If you'll stop talking for a few minutes, maybe you can work up a case."

But I'm a believer. About everyone I know could use a psychological anchor in these confused days.

I know one Hollywood genius who had his psyche soothed recently. "Genius" is actually his name, and he's Victor Mature's dog. The way Vic tells it, Genius fell into a bitter, brooding state and the vet said no canine misery ailed him—must be his mind. So Vic trotted him pronto to a psychiatrist, and they went into a huddle.

"This dog," announced the doctor at last, "has B.O.—and he knows it. It gives him an inferiority complex."

So Vic bought Genius a bed of cedar chips to sleep in and the sweet-scented pup's been fat and frisky ever since!

At least, that's Vic's story. But after hearing it, I wonder. Maybe Mature had better call up his psychiatrist and make a date. Just to see if he's still perfectly okay upstairs, himself. THE END

Every day while they were in New York, the Bogarts got a report on young Stephen Humphrey Bogart. Bogey claims I have ruined him by printing stories like this which make him out a softie, while his pictures call for him to be a tough guy.

Broderick Crawford and his pretty Kay were having an awfully good time. So were Mona Freeman and her nice young husband, Pat Nerney.

Our host, Sherm, personally saw to it that everybody got the "A" treatment with a special flourish or two for such nice people as the Charles Boyers, the Sam Goldwyns, Kay Thompson, Anita Loos, Jack and Mary Benny, and others.

Maybe it's spring in the air! It must be something—for romance is bustin' out all over.

Ruth Roman is another girl who is getting the rush "crush" treatment from a rich young farmer up in Victorville where she is on location with the Lightning Strikes Twice company.

The moment John Whelan saw Ruth—he fell hard and didn't care who knew it. The whole thing was sort of a rural South Pacific with Whelan and Ruth taking all kinds of kidding about "looking over the vegetables and seeing an enchanted stranger!"

Victorville is no new spot for movie company locations—but the town seems to have gone crazier over Ruth, Richard Todd and others of this company than any others ever to work there.

Richard, himself, told me: "I've never known such warm-hearted and wonderful people. When word came through that I was nominated for an Academy Award, these Victorville people took over the biggest banquet hall in town and proclaimed me 'Victorville's Own Academy Award Boy.'

"You can imagine how I felt—a stranger 6000 miles away from London—my hometown."

Adding to all the warm-heartedness and romantics, Mercedes McCambridge (the gal who knocked us cold in All the Kings Men) showed up in Victorville as a brand new bride. Just before Mercedes took the train to join the movie troupe, she took time out to marry the well-known radio producer, Fletcher Markle—MGM's new associate producer.

You have to admire that kid, Wanda Hendrix, for the fight she put up to the last stand to save her marriage.

Wanda was all set to go into court with her charges against Audie Murphy. But at the last minute, she called her lawyer and said, "I'm going out of town for a few days to think everything over. Don't do anything until I return."

She didn't even tell her mother where she was going. But I hear she went to a quiet, secluded dude ranch near Palm Springs where no one knew her and where she wouldn't be getting "advice" from every side.

The gossips had whispered that Wanda would bring charges against Audie as sensational as those Shirley Temple filed against John Agar.

It is true she is as hurt and heartbroken and every bit as bitter as Shirley was. But when she came back to town—she had made up her mind against making any charges that would hurt Audie.

How wise she is—and how much respect she has won for herself.

I carefully checked your letters this month—with the following results:

Since the birth of Ingrid Bergman's baby, some letters show sympathy for her—the first of this kind I have received in two months of solid criticism and disappointment registered from her fans.

Richard Todd hastily caught your heart in The Hasty Heart. One woman writes, "He has much of the same charm which made Richard Barthelmess a great star."

Liz Taylor is still the leading letter lady and there were lots of letters about Colleen Townsend's taking up religious work.

Keep your letters coming!

That's all for now—see you in MODERN SCREEN next month!

Ronald Reagan and Ruth Roman are a frequent twosome these days. Here they attend The Fabulous Invalid première in Hollywood.

A bit of clowning on the part of Creesh Hornsby, Bob Hope's hilarious new discovery, livens rehearsal time at NBC for Bob and Doris Day.

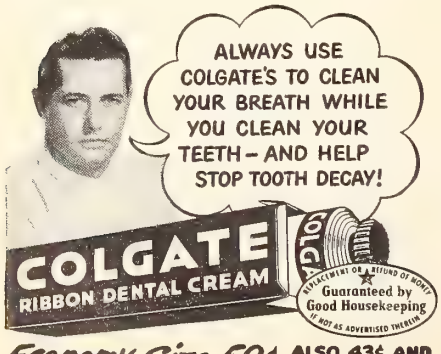
NO OTHER DENTIFRICE OFFERS PROOF OF SUCH RESULTS! PROOF THAT USING

COLGATE DENTAL CREAM HELPS STOP TOOTH DECAY!



2 years' research at five leading universities proves that using Colgate's right after eating helps stop tooth decay before it starts!

More than 2 years' scientific research at leading universities—hundreds of case histories—proves that using Colgate Dental Cream as directed helps stop decay before it starts! Modern research shows that decay is caused by acids which are at their worst right after eating. Brushing teeth with Colgate Dental Cream as directed helps remove these acids before they can harm enamel. And Colgate's active penetrating foam reaches crevices between your teeth where food particles often lodge.

The Most Conclusive Proof In All Dentifrice History On Tooth Decay!

Yes, the same toothpaste you use to clean your breath while you clean your teeth, has been proved to contain all the necessary ingredients, including an exclusive patented ingredient, for effective daily dental care. No risk of irritation to tissues and gums! And no change in Colgate's flavor, foam, or cleansing action! No dentifrice can stop all tooth decay, or help cavities already started. But brushing teeth with Colgate Dental Cream as directed is a safe, proved way to help stop decay!

The wildest tales ever told are those about Hollywood, because to many self-styled reporters fantasy is more exciting than fact But Modern Screen feels that its readers deserve to know the truth, want to know the truth. THE INSIDE STORY is at your service. Write to it c/o Modern Screen, 1046 N. Carol Drive Hollywood 46, California.

Q. I've heard that Bing Crosby and Bob Hope dislike each other, despite the many films and radio programs they've done together. Is this true?
—B. J., Los Angeles, Calif.

A. The truth is that Bing and Bob consider it financially prudent to exchange guest appearances and make movies together, but in private life they are not intimates. They both respect each other's great talents, but neither Bing nor Bob give their friendship easily.

Q. I read in the newspapers recently that Bob Hope pays the government 92 cents out of every dollar he earns. Is this so?—R. McJ., Fall River, Mass.

A. It isn't. Most of Bob's earnings go into Hope Enterprises.

Q. I'd like to know if Frank Sinatra is really going to the Menninger Clinic in Kansas to get himself straightened out mentally. —R. K., Topeka, Kansas

A. Frank says there is not a word of truth to that. There is no indication that he needs any sort of psychiatric treatment, although psychoanalysis is currently very much in vogue in Hollywood. This rumor about him was begun by a Hollywood columnist two days after Nancy Sinatra announced their separation. Right now, by the way, Sinatra's business manager, R. Emmett Burns, is in the process of liquidating Frank's assets. (You can buy Sinatra's desert home in Palm Springs for $100,000.) It looks very much as if their separation will be legal and lasting.

Q. Is Ginger Rogers going to marry Greg Bautzer, and if so, how many times will she have been married?
—A. H., Detroit, Michigan

A. Ginger Rogers' divorce from Jack Briggs isn't final until August, so Ginger refuses to discuss marriage plans concerning Bautzer. If she does marry though, he'll be number 4, and she'll be Mrs. Ginger Rogers Culpepper Ayre Briggs Bautzer.

Q. Who are the "tightest" actors in Hollywood?—O. P., Chicago, Illinois

A. According to people who have mingled with them socially and financially Dennis Day, Peter Lawford and Ray Milland enjoy the reputation of being extremely shrewd and thrifty men.

Q. Is it true that motion picture actresses get most of their clothes free in exchange for giving designers free publicity? —H. R., Troy, N. Y.

A. This isn't true. Actresses buy most of their clothes, although, once in a while, a designer or a studio will give them a favorite gown as a gift. MGM, for example, gave trousseau outfits to both Elizabeth Taylor and Jane Powell.

Q. How old is Ann Blyth, and who are the men in her love-life?
—B. T., Billings, Montana

A. Ann is 21. At this writing, she has no love-life, and consequently, no men. As an actress she's talented, ambitious, imaginative. As a woman, she's a puzzle.

Louella Parsons presents Olivia de Havilland (The Heiress) and Brod Crawford (All The King's Men) to the Academy Award radio audience.

LOUELLA PARSONS' Good news

■ No Oscar winner on Academy Award night was busier than your gal reporter—and I doubt if any of them had more fun.

It was my first night out after two weeks of seclusion with a siege of laryngitis and I had to be both "out front" and "back stage" getting material for my radio broadcast of the Awards the following Sunday.

Let me tell you some of the highlights I picked up from being all over the place:

My theater seat couldn't have been better for spying. I sat right in front of Broderick Crawford and his wife and two rows behind Olivia de Havilland, the new King and Queen of Hollywood.

All during the preliminaries, Brod sat like a man turned to stone. I doubt if he knew a thing that was going on until Jane Wyman (looking like a big doll in white lace) called from the stage, "The winner—Broderick Crawford!"

I'd never be able to describe to you the sound Brod made. It was a cross between a groan, a moan and a stifled yell. He actually sprinted down the aisle.

Lovely Claire Trevor, who was last year's best supporting actress in Key Largo, handed veteran actor Dean Jagger a supporting Oscar for his role as the kindly, be-spectacled major in 20th-Fox's 12 O'Clock High.

Post-Oscar celebration goes on at Romanoff's. Jan Sterling congratulates Paul Douglas for being a wonderful master of ceremonies at the Academy Awards. Paul's in Two Corridors East—may be a future award-winner.

Ginger Rogers phoned Fred Astaire who was in New York to award him a special award—for everything he's meant to musical pictures. George Murphy took Oscar for Fred. "Closest I'll come to one," he said.

Mercedes McCambridge hit the jackpot with her first try—she copped the best supporting actress award for All The King's Men. Tearful but happy, she collects a kiss from her proud husband, Fletcher Markle

He was so much in a world of his own that I am sure he did not know that Kirk Douglas (the loser—but oh, what a good one) reached out and slapped him on the derrière in congratulation! Kirk was seated, so he couldn't reach Brod's shoulder, the usual place for congratulations.

It was a tough beat for Kirk. Early in the year everyone had predicted he couldn't be topped in "Champion." But, if he kept his chin up like a real Champ—his girl friend, Irene Wrightsman, wasn't so brave. She ducked her head and broke into tears.

When Olivia de Havilland's name was called as the best actress winner—she again proved that first, she is a woman in love—second, a two-time Oscar winner. Livvy, bless her heart, didn't run down the aisle as Brod had done. She first grabbed the hand of her husband, Marcus Goodrich, and bent down and whispered something in his ear before she went to receive her trophy from Jimmy Stewart.

Backstage, all was bedlam due mostly to the happy wailing of Cinderella girl, Mercedes McCambridge, who just couldn't stop crying with sheer joy. Clutching her Oscar to her breast, Mercedes kept saying, "I want my husband! I want my husband!" Well, she's just a bride, so you can understand her feelings.

George Murphy, who accepted the special award to Fred Astaire for what Fred has meant to musical pictures, was kinda wistful as I passed him. George was standing off to one side, rather out of the picture, or I should say pictures, hundreds of them being snapped of the winners.

"That Oscar looks good on you, George," I said to him.

"Honey," he replied, "holding the other fellow's is probably as close as I'll ever come to one!"

And now here are a few over-all impressions left over from Hollywood's great night:

Later, at Romanoff's where most of the winners came for supper, Olivia, who was my supper guest, and I posed for our pictures with California's handsome Governor Warren. Olivia told him, "Governor—now I know how it feels to run twice—and be elected twice.'

One of the surprises of the evening (although I don't know why)—the big, big reception Linda Darnell inspired from the sidewalk crowds both outside the theater and the cafe. Have we been underestimating the popularity of our brunette beauty?

I think Ginger Rogers stole the show among those who made the presentations. She was so gay and vivacious and genuinely happy making the special Oscar presentation to Fred Astaire via radio to New York.

And never, never ever have I seen so many lovely girls in one evening. Absolutely breathtaking was little Ann Blyth in her brilliant red dress. Ruth Roman was another stunner in floating white chiffon. Incidentally, have you ever noticed what a magnificent way Ruth has of walking? Like a dancer.

I got my first look at Miroslava, the Czech beauty from Mexico, in Hollywood for The Brave Bulls. She is a blonde, très glamorous, and one of the few women with hair long enough to pile on top of her head.

Paul Douglas proved that he can take his

"A kitchen shower," was Elizabeth's su prising reply.

"But Elizabeth!" gasped Janie, "what the world do you want with that kind of shower? You and Nicky are going to go Europe for a three-months honeymoon. Ar when you come back you'll probably live a hotel for a year until you find just the hom you and Nicky want."

"That's right," Liz nodded.

"Then why a kitchen shower?" Jane i sisted.

"Just because it is the sweetest and mo married kind of a shower there is," replie the girl who has everything.

with a black velvet ribbon. Ginger, of course, danced every dance with Greg Bautzer. (Incidentally, no matter what you hear, these two can't think of getting married until August. Her divorce from Jackie Briggs won't be final.)

Betty Hutton has a good time wherever she goes—royalty or no royalty—and she looked like a big, blonde doll in white chiffon and black lace, getting in a few Charleston steps whenever the music permitted.

Barbara Stanwyck looked downright regal with her short gray hair in a most dignified black gown and beautiful jewelry.

At midnight, Louis Mayer proposed a toast to Her Highness, Queen Julianna, and it was a sight to see everyone in the room rise to his feet and hold high a champagne glass in a toast to the popular Queen of The Netherlands.

Everybody is going down (or sneaking down) to Palm Springs these gorgeous weekends with Charlie Farrell's Racquet Club looking like a fan's idea of Paradise.

That place is just like being on a big house party. More darn fun.

Of course, Ginger Rogers and Greg Bautzer are usually on the tennis courts first thing in the morning. But these experts aren't the only interesting stars to watch on the courts.

One of the best players is Paul Lukas—a whiz in spite of his silvery locks. Ditto for Lex Barker who plays tennis with the same bounce he gives to Tarzan. Speaking of Lex, I think he has a terrific yen for Arlene Dahl—but that lady likes to play the field.

Dinah Shore is just learning the game—but she is getting plenty good. It's a funny picture to see Dinah and George playing a hot game of singles with their baby daughter, sitting in her nurse's lap, cheering them on loudly from the sidelines.

But it isn't all tennis by a long shot. Come the cocktail hour and the gals retire to get into their pretty cotton, linen or print formals before the evening's dinner dance.

Sue Carol and Alan Ladd brought all their children down for one weekend—and with the place so crowded, they had to move into one small bungalow. "It's like living in Grand Central Station," cracked Sue.

Me? I'll always love this little desert town with its colorful stores and shops. I spent a year of my life there getting well.

Have you ever been completely deflated, laid low and embarrassed right out of your skin?

This pickle, all of it, happened to Jimmy Stewart and here's why:

Knowing how much his stepsons, Ronald, six, and Michael, four, love western movies, he talked Gloria into letting them come to the studio to see "Pappy—all dressed up in his cowboy outfit" for "Winchester 73."

Jimmy parked the youngsters on the set and then went off to get dressed, thinking he would knock them cold when he returned in boots and sombrero.

But, when he returned, strutting his stuff, he was amazed to see the kids didn't even lift an eyebrow.

Suddenly, Ronald leaned over to Mike and said, "He doesn't look much like Hopalong Cassidy to me!"

Never did two people have a more sudden fight than Bette Davis and William Grant Sherry at the MCA party given at the home of the Tom Mays.

One minute they were dancing lovey-dovey, and the next, you could hear Bette all over the place telling Sherry off in no uncertain terms. For a guy who is supposed to have a "terrific temper" (or so she claimed and he admitted when she sued for divorce before they reconciled), he didn't offer a peep in defense of himself.

Like the other surprised guests, Sherry just watched Bette as she stamped out of the place.

"If I were a modest man," said Clifton addressing the whole group before his hila rious new comedy started, "I would probabl be nervous. But modesty has never been on of my besetting virtues. If you do not lik the picture you are about to see—don't tel me."

You can't help loving that Clifton. As th picture unrolled, you could hear him chortlin at every funny scene, aided and abetted b the delighted laughter of his mother, Mabelle

It was amusing to see how many of th stars stopped by a popular drive-in on th way home and ate hamburgers and hot dog in their cars, even as you and I do after a evening spent at a good movie.

I saw Ronnie Colman going for his secon hamburger with pickles and onions!

Betty Hutton never plays the field. Sh likes just one beau at a time. And the luck fellow she has settled on for most of her date is good looking, agreeable Bob Sterling wh was once married to Ann Sothern.

Where Ted Briskin always used to slov Betty down and was always shaking hi head at her for one reason or another, Bo is just the opposite. The most avid Hutto fan couldn't admire Betty—and show it mor than Bob.

If she gets up to dance or sing, he ask everyone, "Isn't she wonderful? She's th cutest, prettiest gal in town—and she's m girl!"

What girl wouldn't respond to such hear warming admiration?

In honor of Bob, Betty has junked most c the conservative black suits and dresses Te insisted that she wear—and she's blossome out with the smartest wardrobe in town.

One of her most stunning dresses is a stra less navy-blue taffeta cocktail gown wor under a transparent blue lace coat and whe she wears it, everybody agrees with Bob- she's the cutest girl in town.

I won't be the one to predict that thi romance will end in marriage. I think Bett will be a long time a'marryin' again.

Ricardo Montalban, who is one of the many unselfish movie actors helping young victims of cerebral palsy, chats with Carol Ann Moore.

But she and Bob are certainly finding a lot of fun and happiness and gaiety together.

By the time this is in MODERN SCREEN, Rita Hayworth will have met with Jules Stein, who went to Europe especially to see her, and will have made her plans for her next picture.

Prince Aly's serious ski accident has somewhat changed things for Princess Rita, who had planned to come home in May. Aly won't be able to travel for sometime, and she won't leave him until he's completely well.

When she does, the hottest story, as I write this, is still Rita's own glamorous biography. Where in all the world could you find fiction more exciting and more dramatic?

If she succeeds in getting out of the percentage deal she had with Columbia, and dissolving her company, Beckworth Productions, she will make her next picture for Columbia. If she doesn't, it may go to court.

I gotta hunch Farley Granger is more in love with Shelley Winters than he is willing to admit even to himself. At least, he certainly wants to believe what the gal tells him.

I have every reason to believe that Shelley was having quite a romance with Gene Beardon, the baseball player, when she was in Tucson on location for Winchester 73.

It was certainly hot enough for a studio executive to fly up there and try to stop the romance before they got marriage-minded. He reminded Shelley that she was a more potent attraction at the box office as a single girl.

But on her return to Hollywood, Farley Granger told a reporter:

"Poor kid. Her studio is always bawling her out about something she does that they say is silly. And then they deliberately plant a phoney romance between her and that baseball fellow!"

The letter box this month put Farley Granger back on top of the heap getting his name mentioned most in my mail. And the gals don't want Farley to marry anyone—for a spell anyway.

Ava Gardner should read what they're writing about her—or perhaps she shouldn't if she wants to stay happy!

Janet Leigh is coming up in interest. You like her nice, "natural" type of beauty.

Well, that's all for this month. Be seeing you.

THE REFORMER AND THE REDHEAD

Cast: June Allyson, Dick Powell, Cecil Kellaway, David Wayne.
MGM

■ June Allyson's father (Cecil Kellaway), who runs a zoo better than anybody, has been removed from his post by political maneuvering, and June's on the warpath. Along comes Dick Powell, embryo politician, supposed reformer. June thinks he's going to clean up the town, doesn't know he's really getting support from the corrupt town officials. So then a lion escapes. And David Wayne is Dick's campaign manager, and David and Dick have a secretary (his name is Marvin Kaplan) who's hilarious, and June and Dick fall in love, and Dick gives up his corrupt supporters and turns hero. After that, he captures the escaped lion. Very satisfying. Of course there are really two lions, and Dick thinks he is capturing the pussy-cat type, and really he is capturing the man-eating type, but you know MGM isn't going to let anything happen to Dick Powell. It would make June Allyson too mad.

Warners

Gordon MacRae is in a veterans' hospital, being nursed by Virginia Mayo. This he likes. But his buddy, Edmond O'Brien, with whom he's planning to buy a ranch, has disappeared, and this he doesn't like. One night a beautiful lady (Viveca Lindfors) comes sneaking into his room and tells him Edmond's got a busted back and wants to die. Then she disappears. The hospital people tell Gordon he was dreaming, but he remembers the mink coat the lady was wearing, and once he's discharged, he goes rushing off to track down the lady and Edmond. He rushes right into the arms of police, who claim Edmond murdered a big-time gambler, and ran away. Gordon knows Edmond's no murderer, so he continues his investigation. Eventually he finds the gal in the mink coat. She belongs to a big-shot gambler (not the murdered gambler, but another one). Edmond's been working for this bigshot, too. But love has blossomed between Edmond and mink coat, and big-shot gambler has crushed Edmond in his car, and given him that busted back. All these fragments of information turn up much later, along with a couple more murders, but I don't want to make things too complicated. I'll simply say I guessed the murderer right in the beginning. I take no credit. Any simp could have done the same.

WABASH AVENUE

Betty Grable in Technicolor as a gay nineties chorine, with saloon impressarios Phil Harris and Victor Mature fighting over her. Mature and Harris are always cheating one another at cards, pinning murder raps on one another, blackmailing one another. It's a playful relationship. Betty likes Phil, hates Vic, so naturally she ends up with Vic. (He teaches her to sing more slowly, and rips all the feathers off her costume.) Harris watches the denouement with tears in his eyes. "What does she want with a mug like him when she could have had a mug like me?" he wails. What else do you want to know? Betty's legs are still around, the music is tuneful, if not inspired, there are scenes of the Chicago World's Fair, and you could probably have written the script yourself.

How is Your Breath Today?

Your other charms count for little when you're guilty of halitosis (unpleasant breath)*.

Why run this risk? Why take your breath for granted—ever? Or trust to makeshifts only momentarily effective?

Instead, call on Listerine Antiseptic, an extra-careful precaution against off-color breath. Never, never omit it before any date where you want to be at your best.

Freshens Breath Instantly

You see, Listerine Antiseptic instantly sweetens the breath. Helps keep it that way, too . . . not for seconds . . . not for minutes . . . but for hours usually.

While some cases of halitosis are of systemic origin, most cases, say some authorities, are due to the bacterial fermentation of tiny food particles clinging to mouth surfaces. Listerine Antiseptic quickly halts such fermentation, then overcomes the odors fermentation causes. Lambert Pharmacal Co., St. Louis, Missouri.

OUR VERY OWN

Cast: Ann Blyth, Farley Granger, Joan Evans, Jane Wyatt

Samuel (Best Years) Goldwyn, who likes to examine American family life as it's lived by the great middle class, presents a picture guaranteed to offend nobody. It's formula entertainment—a laugh here, a tear there, a happy ending—and you can certainly take the children. Ann Blyth is the oldest daughter in the Macauley family. Joan Evans comes next, and Natalie Wood is the baby. Ann's adopted, but she doesn't know it. On Ann's 18th birthday, Joan accidentally finds out the secret, and it's too good to keep to herself. During an argument with Ann about Ann's boyfriend (Farley Granger), Joan tells all. Now Ann starts acting adolescent. She's in a state of shock. She forgets how wonderful her parents have been to her all these years; she insists on being allowed to go see her real mother. Real mother (Ann Dvorak) is a beery young woman from the wrong side of the tracks, and seeing her does Ann no good whatever. Still, she shuns her lovely home and parents. Then her best friend, neglected daughter of a millionaire, starts talking about how nice it would be to have relatives at the high-school graduation (both girls are graduating any minute), and Ann realizes she's been silly. Her whole family will be there to hear her commencement address. That commencement address is supposed to be about the benefits of American citizenship, but it winds up as a eulogy of home and parents, and all the parents love it. Long-suffering mother and father Macauley are beautifully played by Jane Wyatt and Donald Cook. It's a pleasant 93 minutes.

Cast: Barbara Stanwyck, John Lund, Jane Cowl, Phyllis Thaxter
Paramount

Barbara Stanwyck is about to have an illegitimate child by a very unpleasant soul (Lyle Bettger) who simply doesn't care. On a train, Barbara meets a young couple (the girl is also pregnant), discovers that the couple's going home to the husband's people. Girl's never met husband's people. There's a train wreck. Young couple kaput. Barbara takes the girl's place (for the sake of her baby) and goes off to meet new "in-laws"

Please Believe Me: Mark Stevens and Peter Lawford fight for Deborah Kerr's affections.

(Jane Cowl and Henry O'Neill) who couldn't be nicer. Also dead young man's brother, John Lund. Barbara and John fall in love. But can she be happy living a lie? Nope. Especially since Lyle Bettger turns up in a blackmailing frame of mind, and tries to soak the rich, namely Barbara's benefactors. Now poor Jane Cowl has heart trouble, and when she hears Barbara sneaking off in the middle of the night, after having first loaded a gun, Jane up and dies from the excitement. She's followed in death by her faithful husband, not too many months later. Oh, I forgot to say. The night Barbara sneaked off with the gun, she killed Lyle Bettger. At least, she thought she did. Eventually it turns out somebody else did, so she and John can face the future together with free minds and easy consciences. The only thing they did wrong was to hasten those sweet old parents into early graves, and that's no crime as Paramount sees it. Jane Cowl's nice to watch, and, in fact, the acting's all very good. The story could be a whole lot better but you don't have to take it too seriously.

Cast: Deborah Kerr, Robert Walker, Mark Stevens, Peter Lawford
Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer

Cute comedy concerning British Deborah Kerr, who's been left hundreds of acres in middle-western United States by an ancient cowboy. On the boat to the U.S. to claim her legacy, Deborah meets richest boy in the world, (Peter Lawford), richest boy's lawyer (Mark Stevens) and fortune hunter Robert Walker. Stevens is along to protect Lawford from predatory women who are always taking him—Lawford—to the cleaners. He's still pretty filthy (rich, that is) and enjoying it. If a lovely lady wants to make him happy for a hundred thousand dollars or so, he's got it to spare. Well, all three boys—Stevens, Lawford, Walker—fall in love with Deborah, who herself falls in love with Stevens. Stevens loves her against his will, thinks she's after his client's money. Doesn't know she's an heiress herself. Some weeks and a mink coat later, Deborah discovers her western territory is wasteland, she's thousands in debt, she's no heiress, a gangster named dirty louie or big eddie or something (J. Carrol Naish) is out to kill Robert Walker (who borrowed money from him in order to romance Deborah). All very involved, but delightfully entertaining.

THE DAUGHTER OF ROSIE O'GRADY

Cast: June Haver, Gordon MacRae, James Barton

James Barton is against the theater. He thinks the hard theatrical life is what killed his wife, Rosie O'Grady, and left him with three daughters to bring up. They're not even good daughters. One of 'em (Marsha Jones) is secretly married to a cop (Sean McClory), and the middle one (June Haver) is tagging around with singer Tony Pastor (Gordon MacRae), though she's endeavoring to pass him off as a college boy. That June. Just loves to sing and dance. When Pa gets so rabid she can't bear it, she leaves home, joins Pastor's show, becomes a real hot star. In the end, the old goat is proud of the kid, but by that time the daughter who married the cop has had twins, June and Pastor have become affianced, and everybody is singing a song about the daughter of Rosie O'Grady in the most unlikely manner imaginable. I think one member of the cast, is a find though. He's Gene Nelson—a dancer with lots of charm and talent.

NO SAD SONGS FOR ME

Cast: Margaret Sullavan, Wendell Corey, Viveca Lindfors, Natalie Wood.
Columbia

It's lovely to have Margaret Sullavan back in the movies—but not in this particular movie. She's so noble it hurts you and her both. Maggie, married to Wendell Corey, and mother of little Natalie Wood, thinks she's pregnant. Nope, says the doctor. That's no baby. It's a cancer. Can't do anything for you. You'll die in 10 months. Well, Maggie doesn't want to tell the family, but pretty soon her husband shows signs of falling in love with his draftsman (draftswoman?) Viveca Lindfors, and that's almost too much to bear. Wendell admits he loves Maggie more, though, and she, grateful for small favors, starts planning his life, after her death. Viveca's not such a bad sort, really, Maggie figures. Bit of a homewrecker, but nice with children, plays the piano, has good table manners. She'd be an ideal second wife for Wendell. Maggie doesn't want him marrying some burlesque queen. (Picture makes the point that widowed men often choose unsuitable mates, in their grief and confusion.) That's the general idea. The acting's good, but the story's hard to swallow, and furthermore, it's pretty grueling to spend 90 minutes watching a lovely, sensitive woman prepare to meet her Maker.

THE SKIPPER SURPRISES HIS WIFE

Cast: Robert Walker, Joan Leslie, Edward Arnold, Spring Byington
Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer

Sailors seem to be crazy about the sea. Hula girls throwing wreaths of flowers, coffee slopped into your lap with every pitching wave, cold stars from a scrubbed deck at midnight. . . . Robert Walker's a navy commander, and loves it. Longest time he ever spent with his wife (Joan Leslie) and kiddies was seven months. Wife wants him to quit the navy, take a job running fishing boats. Walker's home, unhappily toying with this idea (and going to navy school for a special course) when Joan breaks her leg. This leaves the housework to Robert. He puts the place on a navy schedule, turns the kids into a crew, gets everything working efficiently, but nearly wrecks his marriage. The kids are disciplined so thoroughly, one of them starts sucking his thumb in a retreat to babyhood when life was easy, and Joan finally walks—or rather, limps—out on her systematic spouse. Happy ending to all troubles, though.

I WAS A SHOPLIFTER

Cast: Scott Brady, Mona Freeman, Andrea King, Anthony Curtis
United Artists

Beautiful debutante kleptomaniac Mona Freeman falls into the hands of a bunch of crooks. (Professional crooks, not amateurs, like her.) Boss crook is Ina Perdue (Andrea King), so shrewd, so worldly. Assistants include Pepe (Anthony Curtis), a greasy little jerk who pulls a knife if you look at him, and The Champ (Greg Martell), who talks the way Hollywood likes to imagine illiterates talking—i.e., "You shouldn't ought to have done that." Then there's Scott Brady. Unknown quantity. Really a copper, but pretends to be a dip (that's trade lingo with us crooks) so he can save little Mona and put the rest of the bunch behind bars. Once when Mona's on a job, Scott nearly loses her forever, because Pepe tries to make love to her, and this so revolts the poor girl she runs blubbering into the Pacific Ocean, to die. Scott fishes her out, winds up the case, and takes Mona on a honeymoon. The dialogue's entirely predictable, even to the lines of the detective who gets shot by a villain. "You hurt?" Scott asks this detective. "Nah," detective says. "It's only my shoulder." I Was Champagne For Caesar: Intellectual giant Ronald Colman gets rich on radio quiz shows.

A Shoplifter won't hurt you much, either. Only your head. One thing, though: That Brady's a real find. He kind of kids his part along, and he's got charm to spare.

CHAMPAGNE FOR CAESAR

Cast: Ronald Colman, Celeste Holm, Vincent Price, Barbara Britton
United Artists

Caesar is a parrot with a taste for hard liquor and dirty words. He lives with a scholarly gentleman (Ronald Colman) and the gentleman's sister (Barbara Britton), a piano teacher. Ronald and Barbara are poor but proud, and Ronald's chief detestation is quiz shows. He thinks they're the forerunner of intellectual destruction in America. In a wild effort to prove his point, he goes on a quiz show, wins a pot, refuses to take it. Says he'll come back next week and continue to run up his winnings. (For every correct answer, the pot's doubled.) Everybody in the country is fascinated, and Ronnie's won 20 million dollars before the program's horrified sponsor (Vincent Price) can collect his wits. Vincent sics a Delilah-type woman (Celeste Holm) on Ronnie to find out his weak spots, but Ronnie fools her, even as he falls for her. There's more, all very funny, authentic satire. Radio's Art Linkletter, playing an emcee, lampoons his own type of emceeing, George Fisher is fine as himself, Vincent Price was never allowed to mug so freely, and Beauregard Bottomley (that's Ronnie) is a man to make even Lynn Belvedere look at last to his laurels.

THE TATTOOED STRANGER

Cast: John Miles, Patricia White, Walter Kinsella, Frank Tweddell.
RKO

This one's only about an hour long, and it can be classified as somewhere between a documentary and a murder mystery. If you're scientific-minded, you get to learn about modern police methods (laboratory tests, etc.). If you're blood-thirsty, you see a killer brought to a nasty end. Police Lieutenant Corrigan (Walter Kinsella) has a murder to solve. Lady corpse with tattoo is brought to the morgue, only to have some old bum sneak in and try to carve the tattoo off her. Deduction: Bum was hired by killer to eliminate identifying evidence. Corrigan is assigned a young detective as helper. Young detective's a college man, likes test tube deduction. Corrigan expects to hate him. But y.d. (John Miles) is a nice boy, the two men get on fine, the case is solved with the aid of a botanist (Patricia White). If you'll pardon my saying so, I think some of the sound was dubbed in. The mouths didn't always move with the words. Anyhow, Kinsella has a nice dry way of playing a cop, and RKO's young hopefuls, John Miles and Patricia White, do very well.

THE BIG HANGOVER

Cast: Van Johnson, Elizabeth Taylor, Percy Waram, Fay Holden
Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer

Van Johnson, home from the war, is top man in law school, has an offer of a job (after graduation) from a big bunch of corporation lawyers, has the top corporation lawyer's beautiful daughter (Elizabeth Taylor) in love with him. No problems? Hah! Has he got problems. One teaspoon of hard liquor, and he breaks into rollicking song, winks at old ladies, and hears his dog making speeches. It's a form of shell shock. He was trapped in France in a cellar floating with hundred-year-old brandy, right up to his nose. Before troops fished him out, he nearly drowned. Now the mere mention of alcohol affects his nervous system, so he's kind of a jumpy boy. Furthermore, he has problems concerning ethics. Should he be a rich corporation lawyer, or should he be an Abe Lincoln type, go to work for the city, act as the agent of the people? Lots of laughs, and a few speeches about laws being the only things that set man apart from the beasts. Rather nice speeches, too. Worth thinking about. The Big Hangover's cast is large, and uniformly excellent.

UNDER MY SKIN

20th Century-Fox

An Ernest Hemingway short story becomes a very entertaining motion picture. John Garfield's an American in exile. He's a crooked jockey. Likes money. But his motherless little boy (Orley Lindgren) thinks John's Superman, Daniel Boone and the Marquis of Queensbury, rolled into one. Kid doesn't understand why he and the old man chase all over Europe, one jump ahead of the authorities. Thinks it's just for the fresh air. Pop gets mixed up with a master thug

Under My Skin: John Garfield, American in exile, is in flight with his son Orley Lindgren.

(Luther Adler) in Italy, makes tracks for Paris, where he meets Micheline Prelle, who asks him to keep going. "If there's a no good louse in the neighborhood, I always end up with him," she says. That means she loves him. Anyhow, John finally rides a straight race, just to prove himself to his little boy, only to have a riderless horse bump into him and throw and kill him. If the riderless horse hadn't killed him, Luther Adler was waiting in the grandstand, so it's six of one, half a dozen, etc. Picture moves right along, but the hollering should be reserved for Micheline Prelle, the French import. She's beautiful, a fine actress, and one of the most exciting personalities in years. Guess I'll have to join a fan club.

ONE WAY STREET

Cast: James Mason, Marta Toren, Dan Duryea, William Conrad
Universal-International

This is a "moving finger writes" drama, and before it's over, you'll discover there's no use messing with fate. Dan Duryea's gang swipes $200,000 in a bank robbery, only to have the "Doc" (James Mason), a disillusioned hanger-on make off with the money and Duryea's girl (Marta Toren). Duryea resents this performance, and makes plans to get even. Mason and Toren get to Mexico, where their plane is forced down by pump trouble, and they have to stay in a primitive village. Marta's happy, but James keeps talking about Mexico City, and having a ball till his "number comes up." However, under the tutoring of a local priest (Basil Ruysdael), James learns to love the children of the village, does some doctoring, becomes a rehabilitated character, decides to go back to the States, face Duryea, return his dirty money, and start life afresh. So he goes back to the states, a few more people in the bosom of Duryea's gang get murdered (including Duryea), and then Mason's run over by an automobile. Life's funny, ain't it? Come through all that gang war without a scratch, and then suddenly, pfft. The actors are all very nice—Dan gets to run his gamut, slapping, shooting, even dying lengthily, and Mason even looks good in those floppy Mexican hats.

If you like thrillers here's one'll keep you happy.

One Way Street: Mexican scenery for James Mason, a disillusioned gangster turned good.

THE ASTONISHED HEART

Cast: Noel Coward, Celia Johnson, Margaret Leighton
Universal-International

A new Noel Coward production written by, and starring, Noel Coward. The Astonished Heart is no Brief Encounter; it's neither so simple, so unaffected, nor such a work of art. But it is smooth, moving, and marvelous to watch. Tells of a psychiatrist (Coward), happily married for years (wife is Celia Johnson) who falls in love with another woman (Margaret Leighton). He knows all about the workings of the human brain, and he thinks he can control this new passion, keep it in its place. What starts out to be a rather gay, romantic affair develops into deep tragedy for all three principals, and ends with the psychiatrist's suicide. Even if the story doesn't seem quite real to you, the performances are great.

COMANCHE TERRITORY

Cast: Maureen O'Hara, Macdonald Carey, Will Geer, Charles Drake
Universal-International

Nowadays, in a cowboys-and-indians picture, the Indians are the heroes. It's a new, and I guess refreshing, trend. Here, a white-skinned stinker named Stacey (Charles Drake) is trying to keep the government of the U.S. from renewing a treaty with the Comanche Indians. If the treaty's not renewed, then silver-mad settlers (like him) will feel free to move in and start plowing up Comanche territory because there won't be any law which says they can't, and whammo, you'll have an Indian war. Stacey manages to steal the treaty from the government messenger who's enroute to the Comanches with it, but the messenger, a chatty old man named Seeger (Will Geer) meets up with Jim Bowie (Macdonald Carey), he who invented the bowie knife, and Jim's on the side of right and the Indians. Maureen O'Hara, stinker Stacey's sister sees the light, and joins Jim and Seeger, and you have these three noble whites, plus a handful of Comanches, against all the greedy maniacs who want to dig for silver. It's a short war but a merry one, and you'd be surprised what can be done with a couple of bowie knives.

THE CAPTURE

Cast: Lew Ayres, Teresa Wright, Victor Jory, Jacqueline White
RKO

This one is too complicated to synopsize. A man (Lew Ayres) kills another man who's supposedly guilty of a train robbery, only then Lew falls in love with the other man's widow (Teresa Wright), marries her, and develops a conscience he can't live with. Maybe his wife's former husband was innocent. Maybe the big shot Barry Kelley who reported the robbery is himself the thief. Before you can say eh? how's that? Lew's gone off and murdered old Barry (quite by accident) and then he develops a psychic block about raising one arm, and he almost gets himself air-conditioned by the bullets of the local police. Whole thing takes place in Mexico, and there's stuff about oil fields, and ranches, and posses, but mostly it seems to be an action picture where they forgot about the action.

The Capture: Lew Ayres falls for widow Teresa Wright. Only trouble: he killed her husband.

THE EAGLE AND THE HAWK

Cast: John Payne, Dennis O'Keefe, Rhonda Fleming.
Paramount

It seems that during the Civil War the French were planning not only to overthrow Juarez in Mexico, and establish Maximilian there as Emperor, but also to march an army into Texas and annex that state. Texas, being so busy fighting the North, would hardly notice until it was too late. Which is why we find a Yankee spy (Dennis O'Keefe) and a Suth'n gentleman (John Payne) riding off to Mexico together, to foil this dastardly plot. The situation they find in Mexico is so confused I doubt if I can explain it. There's a simple old slob of a general (Thomas Gomez) who thinks he's collecting an army for Juarez, because a rat named Danzeeger (Fred Clark) tells him so. The truth is that Danzeeger's an agent of the French, and the money he gives the general for his soldiers is French money, and the guns they'll march on Texas with are French guns, etc. There are more complications. Danzeeger's wife, Rhonda Fleming, goes for John Payne, who likes her too. Next time you see John Payne, he's being spread-eagled between two wild horses, a position which is very hard on a man. Everything's in Technicolor, even the blood, and, crazy as it may sound, it adds up to good entertainment.

Since our previous mention last month of this theme, this opus has caused a musical revolution. Originally known as The Harry Lime Theme (that's Orson Welles' character in the picture), it's coupled on all these versions with The Cafe Mozart Waltz, which is an integral part of the same fabulously successful all-zither background. But, of course, Karas' version, which is taken from the original movie sound track, is the one you'll want. Most of the other versions feature either zithers dug up urgently from out of nowhere, or various vocal and instrumental noises trying to sound like zithers.

CHARLIE VENTURA—Flamingo (Victor).
A very interesting Rugolo arrangement, but Charlie has played better.

CHARLIE PARKER—Parker With Strings Album (Mercury)
This was a brilliant idea—take a tremendous bopular musician, equip him with pleasant popular tunes such as April In Paris, Everything Happens To Me, Summer Time, and surround him with sweet strings, woodwinds and rhythm. As a result you get six sides of superb saxophone by Parker in an album that should appeal to anyone.

What Future for Pia?

BY CHARLOTTE EATON

Which parent will she choose to love? For how long will Ingrid's daughter bear the scars of scandal?

■ The newspaper headlines were two feet tall about Ingrid's romance and Dr. Lindstrom's outraged heart. Wherever people gathered Bergman's name was on their lips and no one had to search for conversation. But untouched by the scandal, almost unnoticed in the heat of the gossip was twelve-year-old Pia, the innocent victim of her mother's indiscretion.

Now the spotlight is on her. Now in the fight for her affections she is suddenly being thrust into the harsh and often cruel world of adults, and somehow she must grow up to cope with it.

In two years, according to California law, she will be old enough to choose between her mother and father. What will her choice be? And how long will the scars of her parents' divorce remain with her?

Until Pia makes her decision, and probably for long after, people will argue about the rightness of it; they will rehash the story of the Bergman-Rossellini affair until it dies of exhaustion. Even now, Ingrid, more than Pia, is staggering under (Continued on page 86) my War with Betty...

■ I warned Modern Screen I wouldn't give them a story oozing with mother love. I'm not the Stella Dallas type. Besides, Betty would read it and laugh me right out of the house.

Right now we're engaged in a sort of hit-and-run battle, but before I tell you more I want to get something straight: This warfare has nothing to do with the way I feel about my daughter. Nothing could change that.

Anyway, we fight about her children—Candy and Lindsay. On that subject we've come to a parting of the ways. I guess it isn't unusual. I've never known a woman with children to listen to her mother's lectures about bringing them up. But I've never known a woman with Betty's ideas, and if she asks me (which she doesn't) I think she ought to bury them. She's often offered me the same advice, but of course, I don't take it.

The big trouble between Betty and me is we're too much alike. When we disagree with each other we blow up. There's no stopping either of us until we run out of breath. Then we apologize and cry like babies and make speeches about how wonderful we are because we understand each other so well.

Only last week I held the floor for half an hour, and for a lady my size, I held it pretty well. Betty just stood there and listened until I collapsed in a chair. "Well," she said calmly, "now that you've laid me out in lavender, how do you feel?"

I felt like shooting myself. But I didn't, because I knew that next week Betty would probably let me have a dose of the same.

I do try to keep a lid on my temper at times, particularly when I feed my two grandchildren their lunch. It seems they enjoy music while they eat, their trays are so gorgeous you're ashamed to serve them mashed potatoes, and they have a prescribed diet. Not only that, I tell them stories to order.

"You're old-fashioned!" she screams. "You're new-fangled!" I shout. And the fight begins— but when it ends, I'm holding Betty in my arms.

Candy and Lindsay listen wide-eyed when Grandma reads to them. Mrs. Hutton's views on child-rearing differ considerably from her daughter's but they agree on everything else (right, Betty, Marion, and their mom) with it came those magic moments that Clark had once known—and almost forgotten.

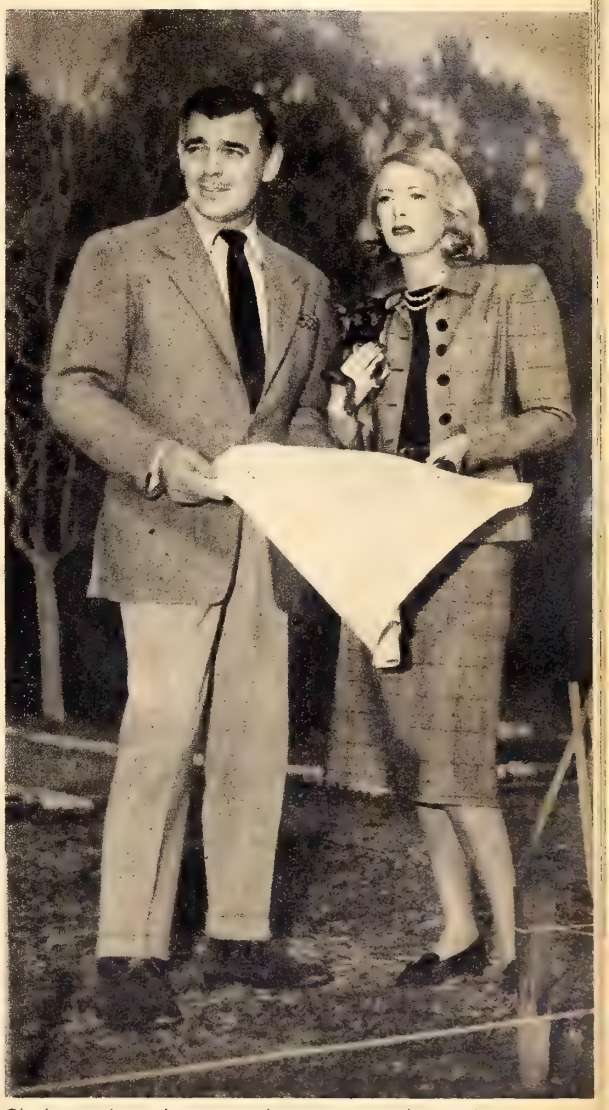
■ For the actor he is, Clark Gable put on a bad performance these past few years. Loneliness stood out on him like a neon sign. The evenings he spent at his Encino ranch home, he'd wander from room to room, pick up a book and drop it, pick up a phone and decide not to call, sink into a chair and stare at nothing.

The nights he went out the newshounds followed him to parties and theaters and nightclubs for hot gossip about this man of the world. They got the gossip. But anyone with half an eye could see that Gable wasn't happy.



Then, at one of the parties, he met Sylvia. He'd known her before, but this was different. He'd never married her before . . .

Everyone knows the story of their elopement and honeymoon. Only his friends know that Clark has changed, that for the first time in many years he's come out of his shell. (See picture at left for proof of this.) They can trace the change back to the beginning of his marriage, to Hawaii . . .

There were ten thousand people mobbing the dock at Honolulu to greet Clark and his bride. Time was when he would have faced a crowd like this black-browed and scowling. He'd have stalked straight through them, or slammed himself into a stateroom. This time he loved it. They couldn't drape him with enough leis; he couldn't shake enough hands or joke with enough people whom he didn't even know.

No sooner did he hit the Islands than he blossomed out in South Sea shirts that would have made Bing Crosby jealous. He went overboard for every dreamy Island tune. He bought himself a ukulele and crooned off-key to Sylvia. He padded in sandals around Honolulu's streets, and sunned his chest at Waikiki for the Royal Hawaiian hotel guests to see.

Clark wasn't enthusiastic about a guest house for their Encino ranch, but Sylvia won him over and construction began. Now he calls it the "Tree House."

my dear husband

For eight long years he's picked my friends and planned my politics and ordered me around. And now I'm mad, really mad—about that man, Bill Holden.

by Brenda Marshall

■ One afternoon, a few years after we'd been married, my husband telephoned me at the studio. "When are you coming home?" he said.

"Why?" I asked.

"I want to show you my etchings," he replied.

Driving back to the valley I had to snicker over how that conversation would have sounded to an eavesdropper. But when I got home, well, there they were—two lovely etchings by Toulouse-Lautrec.

"Like them?" asked Bill.

"They're beautiful," I said.

"Good," my husband announced. "We're going in for these."

"We?" I thought to myself. "What do you mean—We?" and planned all sorts of resistance to this authoritative attitude of his.

But, you know, now that we've been married eight years, I find that he still has it and I don't mind. In fact, it's a part of marriage—the protected, wanted, included feeling part that I would miss very much if it were lacking. So Bill still speaks for both of us—and once in a while he's right. He was right about the etchings.

On the other hand, he was wrong about my taking up skeet shooting, getting to be the greatest cook in Hollywood, and riding horseback like a rodeo queen.

Not that I undermined him or failed to cooperate.

"We'll go out on the range and do some skeet shooting every Sunday," he said. "You'll love it."

I went. I hated guns but I practiced. Just when I was beginning to hit the targets we stopped going every Sunday. In fact, we haven't gone since the first Sunday we missed. The same thing happened with horseback riding.

As for the cooking—well, I didn't even try. All during my girlhood I felt I'd never be able to cook and every time I tried it as an adult I proved I was right. It puzzles Bill because he is a wonder in the kitchen. And I don't mean just a barbecue man. I have seen him take the most hopeless-looking piece of meat, sprinkle it, mutter over it, pop it into the oven, and then pull out the most savory dish I've ever eaten.

He's inclined to take life much too seriously, I think, and he can get awfully stubborn. But, on the other hand, he has a wonderful sense of humor. When he has to backwater on an issue, for instance, he has his own way of laughing it through so there's no sting for either of us afterward. This is important, because, as every wife knows, a husband's resentment over losing an argument can linger long after the triumph of the little victory has disappeared.

Take a little incident like this: We were driving home from a party at one-thirty in the morning, when Bill remembered that he promised we'd attend another affair at the home of an old friend.

"Darn it all!" he muttered. "I gave him my word!"

Ann Blyth spends much of her leisure in the den where she keeps her growing collection of records, mementos, and photographs of friends

Boldly patterned wallpaper and the handsome dark lines of the Governor Winthrop secretary give Ann's bedroom an uncluttered elegance. When she can, she relaxes here with a book that teaches her more about acting..

Many of the living room pieces, including the fine old Queen Ann sofa, are prized heirlooms. Ann brought them from her Connecticut home when she set up housekeeping with her aunt and unc

the house with the shamrock gate

No butlers in the pantry, no peacocks on the walk—for this is the house where Ann Blyth lives—with Cis and Pat and a fat canary.

BY DUANE VALENTRY

When guests come they gather round this corner fireplace in the living room. Ann prefers quiet evenings here to nightclubs.

■ All Ann Blyth wanted was a little house with a few flowers in the garden. The real estate agent couldn't believe it. "We have castles for girls like you," he said sternly.

So Ann collected her dignity and her Uncle Pat and her Aunt Cissie. They rode down into the San Fernando Valley where the sun was brighter than Hollywood's gold—and there they found the place. . . .

It was completely covered with ivy and almost hidden by foliage, but Ann pointed to it excitedly. "That's it!" she cried. "That's it!"

"That's what?" asked Aunt Cissie.

"My dream house," sighed Ann.

"I am too old," said Uncle Pat, "to live in a tree."

But they bought the place, and as it turned out, it was more than fit for human habitation. Uncle Pat trimmed the outside with an axe, and what finally emerged was a lovely white house, Spanish-style stucco, rambling and roomy. Around it now is a low wall, covered with berries and flowers. And at one end of the wall is a swinging gate with a shamrock cut into the center.

The gate swings out onto the huge back lawn where Mickey, a black cat with white paws, lives. It swings into the arched doorway of the one-story house where Ann and Cissie and Pat have settled down. (Continued on next page)

In front of her bedroom chests, littered with perfume bottles, figurines, and a wooly lamb, Ann Blyth begins the evening phone calls.

Aunt Cis usually shoos Uncle Pat out of the kitchen, but when Ann's entertaining, he pitches in and whips up hearty snacks.

Ann tries to spend a few minutes each morning practicing her golf swing. She's new at the game but she's a fiend for it.

Their day begins in the breakfast nook which is lit up by the morning sun and the red and blue wallpaper and the chirping of Willie, the fat canary.

Sometimes, even during breakfast, they wander around the house admiring their own taste and ingenuity. A decorator didn't come near the place. (A decorator would have paled before the quantities of bric-a-brac and mementos and photographs that add so much to the charm.) They painted some of the walls themselves, and some of the chairs, and they still rearrange the furniture at the drop of an idea.

"I'm thinking of a swimming pool," said Uncle Pat one day.

"I like the living room the way it is," laughed Ann.

"Oh, it'll be just a little pool," said Pat. And soon they may build one—but out in the backyard.

Ann's favorite room is the den. The walls there are panelled and stained redwood. She keeps her record collection in the den, and a stack of photographs, and souvenirs of times that are important only to her.

The walls are lined with pictures. On one side, there are about 12 framed plaques awarded to her. The United States Army gave her one "in grateful appreciation of your fine spirit and public service." Another came from the famous wartime Hollywood Canteen "for loyal service," and still another from the War Activities Committee.

On the opposite wall pictures of Ann's friends and co-workers are grouped. There's an unusual photo of Bing Crosby standing with a gun tucked under his arm, and hunting dogs beside him, with the inscription: "I'll have to hunt a long time to find a co-star as nice as you . . . Fondly, Bing." The picture he was referring to was Top O' The Morning, where Ann spoke with an Irish brogue and charmed everyone, including the critics.

Ann studies her scripts in the den, and entertains her friends (Jeanne Crain and Joan Leslie are among her closest), and sometimes, she just lounges dreamily before the brightly burning fireplace. She rarely goes to nightclubs or makes the gossip headlines. Her greatest loves so far are her work and her home. She's taking her time about men.

"So much of the unhappiness I've seen is so unnecessary," she'll tell you. "The quick marriages and the lightning divorces. Look at Aunt Cissie and Uncle Pat. They've been married almost all their lives, and only to each other. What they have is real. It's what I want."

And these two are giving her what she needs—the warm family life and the easy understanding that so many young stars hipped on glamor don't want or don't get. The house, itself, exudes this atmosphere.

The living room, for instance, is wide and inviting. The decorations don't resemble stage settings. Much of the furniture is old and comes from Ann's former home in Stamford, Connecticut. There's a "what-not" at one end of the room full of china and porcelain that Ann collected bit by bit. Among these is a figurine given to her by the Los Angeles Gaelic Association. She was chosen by them as the Actress of 1948. A fireplace is in another corner of the room. It has a red brick hearth which is always stacked with logs.

The house has three large bedrooms (Ann's aunt and uncle have a separate wing), as well as a huge guest room. Ann's own bedroom is feminine, with its gay flowered wallpaper, its pink ruffled lampshades and the soft blue scalloped bedspread. Her dressing table and chests are cluttered with perfume bottles, tiny animals and dolls. The furniture is heavy but simple, and in dark wood. A Governor Winthrop secretary, filled with books, is near her bed. A painting of her mother, and a crucifix are also in her room.

by Ronald Reagan

What do the stars think about life, about God, about immortality? Here is the first in a unique series of articles.

■ I wouldn't attempt to describe what God is like, although I place my greatest faith in Him. I think the wonderful line in the Bible which says God is love comes as close as words can.

In school I learned about two basic philosophies: All people are bad until proven good; all people are good until proven bad. I believe the latter. I believe in a force of God behind most people, and so I put my trust in them.

I wouldn't attempt to describe what heaven is like, either. I certainly don't expect to spend eternity on a cloud, but I do think there's something beyond the grave, that we were given souls for a reason, that if we live as the Bible tells us to, a promise will be kept.

I don't believe in hell. I can't believe that an all wise and loving Father would condemn any one of his children to eternal damnation.

Modern Screen presents the complete story of Hollywood's loveliest wedding . . .

ELIZABETH, THE BRIDE

by hedda hopper

■ Picture yourself seated primped, powdered and dressed in your best, in the beautiful little Church of the Good Shepherd in Beverly Hills, California. You're waiting excitedly for the moment of moments on this day of days, for when at last Elizabeth Taylor becomes Mrs. Conrad Hilton, Junior, the most beautiful, most adored bride in the whole wide world.

All around are packed the chosen three hundred close friends, neighborhood friends, studio friends, people who've known and loved this gorgeous girl and her handsome groom since they both were kids. Along the aisle stretches a white satin carpet, and down both sides, draping the oak stalls, are white satin ribbons with bows. Bright spring flowers bank the aisle and scent the air.

Maybe the postman didn't slip a white envelope into your mailbox with an engraved card inside reading, "Mr. and Mrs. Francis Taylor request the honor of your presence at the marriage of their daughter, Elizabeth Rosemond, to Mr. Conrad Nicholson Hilton, Junior. . . ."

But that doesn't matter, really. If you love Elizabeth as do all of us gathered there you can share her joy a thousand miles or more away.

You can feel the thrill that ripples beneath these vaulted ceilings as the wedding music starts, softly at first, then swells into the familiar strains. Nick Hilton steps out from the chapel, a little pale but immaculate in cutaway, striped trousers and stock, a white carnation in his button hole. Behind him is his best man, his brother Barron. There's barely time to follow Nick's anxious glance up the aisle before the first smiling bridesmaid is floating past on an usher's arm. Soon they've passed—Jane Powell, Marjorie Dillon, Marilyn Hilton, Betty Sullivan, Mara Reagan, Barbara Thompson, and Ann Westmore, too, Elizabeth's maid-of-honor—all fresh and lovely as this May day in their bouffant organdy gowns. The ushers, (Continued on next page)

Hardly have they parted for their wedding stations at the flower-festooned altar before Lohengrin's majestic chords sound the joyous phrase, "Here comes the bride!"

You look. She's lovely—so lovely that your breath stops and something like pain grips tight in your chest. I've seen Hollywood brides, pretty ones like Shirley Temple and Jane Powell and Deanna Durbin—and beautiful ones, too, clear back to Norma Shearer and Vilma Banky, who were heavenly visions indeed. But none as beautiful as Elizabeth Taylor, taking her measured steps on the proud arm of her handsome, white-haired father, her sapphire eyes looking straight ahead, and a rose flush on her ivory cheeks. Radiant is an overworked word, but how else can you describe beauty like this? No scene Elizabeth will ever play can have this glow. Not if she turns into a second Bernhardt can she recapture the reality of these emotions. This is the Hollywood wedding of weddings, Elizabeth is the bride of brides to me, and I'm an old campaigner.

Elizabeth's 4-carat ring.

The traditional white satin wedding gown which her pet studio designer, Helen Rose, labored over for months and which MGM presented to Elizabeth, accents her dark beauty. It's snug around the middle with a voluminous skirt to emphasize Elizabeth's amazingly small waist. The bodice is hand embroidered with rich seed pearls and glistening crystals. Her gossamer veil flows to the white aisle runner; on her third finger, left hand glows the 4-carat emerald-cut diamond engagement ring Nick gave her. On one arm is a white bridal bouquet. The picture is perfect.

But almost before you can take it all in she's at the altar, and Nick is stepping to her side, bursting with pride and there's a look between them which says, "Forever." There's always that same shy, quick look of trust, a premature vow of the eyes, when it's a true love match—as surely this is.

The age old and lovely vows of marriage begin, and in the family pews in front, Sara Taylor and Francis hold hands and keep back the tears. Howard and Liz's favorite Uncle Howard Young, here from New York, stare straight at the girl they both worship.

They are kneeling for the benediction. They rise, embrace, and turn to leave, more swiftly now, back up the aisle as Mr. and Mrs. Conrad Hilton, Junior. Elizabeth's face is relaxed, happy, sparkling, and Nicky starts to grin. The rustle of satin and the swish of the train passes on. Only twenty minutes have passed from the time she entered, until the church doors flood in the waning sunlight and you hear the shouts of the hundreds outside and the congratulations and the roar of a motor. They're on their way to the Bel-Air Country Club and the wedding reception, where six hundred will gather to congratulate the happy pair.

Minutes later they are kissed and toasted in champagne. Your place in line comes up and you kiss Elizabeth and whisper "Bless you" and know again there was never a more beautiful bride. The cake is cut and eaten and wrapped up in little handkerchiefs to be carried home and slept on, and the bridal bouquet is tossed amid squeals, and caught. Elizabeth has gone upstairs—to run down soon in her chic pale blue going-away suit, and be whirled out of the door by her new husband. Inside their shiny convertible is the polished new suitcase so carefully packed with the white satin night gown and the negligee of sheerest marquisette with two huge pockets of rose point lace at the bosom.

Paramount's Edith Head designed Elizabeth's traveling suit in black wool. With sloping shoulders and standing collar, the jacket neatly sets off the skirt's sheath-like lines. Miss Head also did five blouses for the suit (here are three), each one completely different in mood.

Elizabeth fell in love with this sleek Italian shantung at first sight. Ceil Chapman made up the dress in muted shadings of honey, amber and tobacco, softly draping the stripes. More of Miss Chapman's designs for Liz are on the next page.

"I couldn't say no"

The father of the bride nostalgically looks through Liz' album.

Like the father of any other lovely girl, Francis Taylor was hesitant about giving Elizabeth in marriage. But when Nicky asked the age-old question, he knew there was only one answer.

BY KATHERINE ALBERT

Mr. Taylor stayed home while Mrs. Taylor, Nick, and Liz shopped—and stepped out with Conrad Hilton, Sr. above in New York.

■ The father of the bride has his responsibilities. He has to flatter the caterers, pour the champagne, charm the guests —and foot the bills. Not only that. Even after his daughter has promised her hand, his future son-in-law comes and asks for it.

This last, though, was the least of Mr. Taylor's worries. As far as he was concerned, Nicky Hilton could have both his daughter's hands, and all her gloves as well.

"He's everything I want for the husband of my daughter," Mr. Taylor has said. "So when he asked to marry her, I couldn't say no."

What Mr. Taylor asked Nicky was, "How do you feel about Elizabeth's career?"

"I feel fine," Nicky said. "I wouldn't want her to give it up."

Mr. Taylor smiled with relief. Bill Pawley had asked her to give it up, since his home and business were both in Florida, and Hollywood was not. Elizabeth thought a while, and decided to give him up.

"I feel I ought to tell you," said Mr. Taylor, "she can't cook."

"Neither can I," said Nicky.

"Or run a house. . . ."

"In the hotel," said Nicky, "all she has to do is call room service."

Nicky took a deep breath. "I—I guess you know how I feel about Elizabeth. . . ."

"Yes. I—I suppose you know how we feel about Elizabeth. . . ."

With the memory of this day always in her heart, Elizabeth begins the life of every bride— making plans, meeting problems, sharing great joys . . .

FROM THIS DAY FORWARD

THE NEWLYWEDS' FIRST HOME . . .

Blond modern furniture predominates in the two-room suite at the Bel Air Hotel, where Liz and Nicky Hilton will live after their honeymoon.

"I, Elizabeth Rosemond, take thee, Conrad Nicholson, for my lawful husband, to have and to hold, from this day forward, for better, for worse, for richer, for poorer, in sickness and in health, until death do us part."

■ May 6th, 1950. Father Concannon stands at the altar of the Church of the Good Shepherd in Beverly Hills. The afternoon sun comes through the stained-glass windows in shafts of light, and a sudden silence falls over the many guests as the bride and groom kneel.

Father Concannon looks at Elizabeth and Nicky before him, and begins the ceremony. "My dear friends," he says, "you are about to enter into a union which is most sacred and most serious. It is most sacred, because it is established by God Himself; most serious, because it will bind you together for life in a relationship so close and so intimate, that it will profoundly influence your whole future. That future, with its hopes and disappointments, its successes and its failures, its pleasures and its pains, its joys and its sorrows, is hidden from your eyes. . . .

"Truly, then, these words are most serious. It is a beautiful tribute to your undoubted faith in each other, that recognizing their full import, you are nevertheless so willing and ready to pronounce them. . . . Henceforth, you will belong entirely to each other: you will be one in mind, one in heart, and one in affections. And whatever sacrifices you may hereafter be required to make to preserve this common life, always make them generously. Sacrifice is usually difficult and irksome. Only love can make it easy; and perfect love can make it a joy. . . ." (Continued on page 94)

THE FIRST YEAR

by Jane Powell

When you're in love, says the bride's best friend—small faults seem to grow smaller and your happiness increases, and the first year is only the beginning. . . .

■ Dear Elizabeth,

I keep remembering the peanut butter sandwiches you sneaked into my valise when Geary and I left on our honeymoon. They fell out of my bedjacket as I unpacked, and Geary suddenly got a pained look on his face.

"Oh, Janie, no!" he said.

"No what?" I asked, ready to burst into tears.

"Crackers in bed! That's grounds for divorce. That's practically illegal."

"Well, darling," I told him, "you've got a case." And we started to laugh as if it were the funniest thing in the world. But after a while, I got to thinking about how even silly things like that can start trouble, if you're in the mood for trouble. And right then I promised myself never to be in the mood.

Now that you're a bride, I feel awfully sentimental. I remember how lovely you looked as my bridesmaid in that blue taffeta gown with the velvet ribbons in your hair, and even though I was too excited at the time, I pictured you later as a bride in white, and I knew someday soon you'd be one.

I can think of a million things I want to say to make you stay happy—as if Nicky weren't enough. Of course, I'm not the voice of experience. I haven't been married even a year, but I can tell you right now the first year isn't the hardest. I'd say it was the best, if I weren't so sure that the second year is better still, and the third more so.

Probably I don't even have to write this letter. I know you. I know Nicky. You go together. But it's those peanut butter sandwiches. They made me remember what you must have recalled when you gave them to me. The time we were kids together at MGM. The problems we had—first, geography, then learning how to jump Double-Dutch, then boys. We always talked about everything until we collapsed into giggles.

Remember how none of the boys would look at us even after we put on the lipstick we weren't allowed to use? Remember how your brother would always tell us to scram when we wanted to meet his friends? We'd go out behind the schoolhouse between classes, and munch those peanut butter sandwiches, and have crazy conversations about how someday we'd be beautiful and famous and sought after.

It seems so long ago. . . . I guess we're a couple of lucky kids the way things turned out. But you know, even after I got married, I found there were still some childish ideas rattling around in my head, and I have to tell you what I learned. So listen to old Granny Powell.

I'm not the girl I used to be, even though I may look the same. I remember proclaiming to you that a girl mustn't let marriage change her personality. Well, that's ridiculous. Marriage will change you in (Continued on page 104)

Liz, bridesmaid at Jane's wedding, caught the bridal bouquet with another girl and kept her half until the charm worked.

IT ALL BEGAN when Sharman Douglas left, came to a Hollywood party given by Elizabeth Firestone right, and met Peter Lawford.

THE END CAME, at least for now, when Sharman boarded a plane for England—leaving Pete behind.

Love 'em and leave 'em—that was Peter Lawford. But an international charmer discovered his technique and now that he's sighing—she's flying.

She didn't say yes

■ Today, Peter Lawford is lost. Lost somewhere between Roddy McDowell and Ronald Colman.

Like Huckleberry Finn, Frank Merriwell, The Rover Boys and all the lamented Alger heroes, the eager lad from Britain who crept into our hearts a few short years ago with his wistful eyes and manly husbanding of the canine, Lassie, is gone—part of another day.

Peter Lawford is in love.

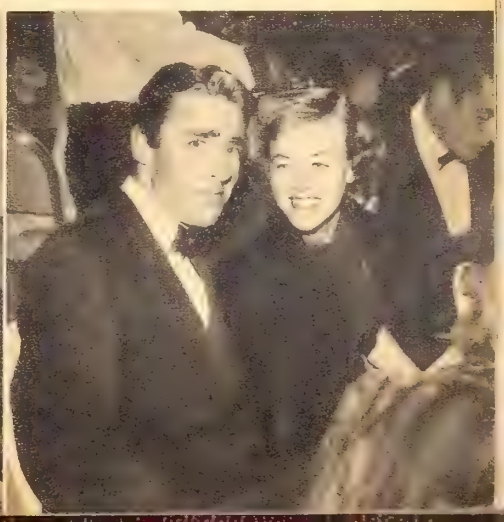
"Will you marry me?"

"No. Thank you very much."

Sometime, somewhere during the past few months, Peter Lawford, movie star, spoke those words to Sharman Douglas, toast of two continents—and it is fair to deduce that she answered him as indicated above.

The place where the question was popped is unknown. It may have been one night driving along the ocean front under a pale moon with the thundering Pacific thumping out an accompaniment. It may have been in a nightclub, or at supper in some quiet restaurant. It may have been at the Douglas ranch near Tucson, Arizona, as they lay tanning themselves under a hot desert sun. It could have been in New York, as they said farewell for now, Sharman to go back to England—and Peter to go back to Hollywood and his movie-making.

At any rate, the words were said.



Yes, Peter Lawford is in love. Emotional maturity has caught up with him. At twenty-six, to all professional intents and purposes he is still a boy, still rather breathless and reserved, the casual collegiate lovemaker of MGM musicals. But privately, he is now a man, thwarted and melancholy, willing and ready to leap into matrimony.

HIS FORMER LIFE centered almost exclusively about married couples. Pete, with Pat Walker, left, palled with the Jackie Coopers, dined with the Keenan Wynns (now Evie's Mrs. Van Johnson) and went formal with Molly and Charles Dunn.

He's loud and lusty and full of laughter. He has a voice you'd like to own. He's Mario Lanza—the magnificent!

BY JIM HENAGHAN

As a boy Mario lived in the slums of Philadelphia. Now he has a mansion in Hollywood for his wife, his parents and his daughter, (below). His second starring role is in Toast of New Orleans.

■ Mario Lanza is a big, barrel-chested, vigorous American of Italian descent who is twenty-eight years old, married, and has an Italian-Irish daughter of two named Coleen.

Mario Lanza, some people will tell you, is a lunatic. Mario Lanza, some other people will tell you, is this country's first really great operatic tenor, an artist and musical find of such importance that no man since Caruso himself can equal his stature. And, Mario Lanza, movie-wise Hollywoodites will tell you, is the most exciting screen personality to trot onto a sound stage since the films began to talk.

Some, or all of these things, may be true. The family, of course, is a fact. The rest will be confirmed or denied by time. At any rate, your reporter's first meeting with him took place in the office of a business associate. Frankly, not being of a very cultural turn of mind musically speaking, I rather dreaded the interview. I had pictured a bulky stuffed shirt with a Latin leer for any but his own kind; a condescending artiste stewing in his own magnificence. I couldn't have been more wrong.

The door flew open and a very handsome, grinning young man made a Harpo Marx entrance as though he were walking on springs. He burst into a voluble, completely American monologue on the occurrences of the day directed toward his friend, while your reporter cringed in the corner (Continued on page 107)

Linda takes a deep breath and blows out all two of the candles on her birthday cake. The time: January 30. The place: Hawaii.

by Shirley Temple

■ As we flew toward Honolulu I began to wonder if the trip was such a good idea. For all that Linda Susan knew I could've walked her into the backyard, sat her under a tree and said, "Now we're in Hawaii,"—and let her try to convince me that we weren't. You can bet that would've been a hard job, because even though Linda Susan can talk, I can't understand her.

I tried to remember how I felt when I was two, and if I'd have been insulted by such a trick. I'm sure I would have been. Anyway, all I could think of was how it felt to be twenty-one and on my way to Honolulu. It felt very good.

My really big worry was that Linda Susan might miss home—the nursery, the toys, the familiar surroundings. Of course, Mom and Dad came along, as did Mrs. Halverson, Linda Susan's nurse. With all those familiar faces how could anyone be lonely? As it turned out, my worrying was for nothing. Three days after we'd arrived, I couldn't tell Linda from the natives. (Continued on next page)

"My heart was filled with nostalgia as Linda Susan and I left Hawaii." writes Shirley Temple in this last of three articles.

We stopped for a while at the Royal Hawaiian Hotel, but then we took a house away from the busy shops. It was quiet and peaceful with a winding beach and swaying palms. The view was the kind you see on travel posters and never quite believe is real.

After we'd got settled, I took Linda Susan on lots of drives through the Island. We went up to Pali one day. That's at the top of the cliff which divides the island into windward and leeward sides. The prevailing winds come from the windward side, and the leeward side faces the sheltered part of the island. It was so beautiful up there it took my breath away.

"Su-Su," I said, lifting her up, "look at this. I want you to remember this gorgeous, incredible sight!" Su-Su threw up her arms and laughed into my face.

On the way down from Pali we stopped at a bird sanctuary. This was one place Susan loved. She chirped all the way home.

The Hawaiian sun did its job swiftly and wonderfully. Linda Susan was turning a golden tan and all the health in the world was in her face. She seemed to enjoy this tropical life.

She learned her first native custom when I took her to a luau. A luau's an Hawaiian barbecue picnic. She watched in awe as a roast pig which had been buried in the ground for twenty-four hours was uncovered and served. The hot rocks underneath and above the pig had given it a delicious, unforgettable taste. Linda sat cross-legged on a bamboo mat with a positive expression of glee on her face as she wiped her sticky hands over her dress. But I couldn't scold, even if I'd wanted to, because much of the food was supposed to be eaten with the fingers.

There was the poi, for instance. It's made from the roots of tropical plants and comes in three ways: one-finger-poi, two-finger-poi, and three-finger-poi, depending on the number of fingers you feel like dipping into the bowl. Linda Susan started a custom of her own—ten-finger-poi, and if the bowl were a little larger I guess she would have hopped right in.

Sitting cross-legged on a bamboo mat wasn't too much of a problem for me, but trying to eat from that position almost broke my back. Naturally Linda Susan didn't mind at all. She's so limber she could probably eat a whole meal while swinging from my left arm (of course, I'd then be crippled for life).

I thought that once she'd mastered the business of eating from a straw mat she'd give it up and go on to something more difficult. She went on to many things, but she didn't give up eating Hawaiian style.

During the rest of our stay on the island, whenever I'd sit down for a meal I'd look around for Linda Susan, and find her sitting cross-legged under the table, shrieking for food.

I don't know if it was the newly-acquired eating habit, the food or the air, but whatever it was it certainly agreed with Linda Susan. She gained almost two pounds during our five-week stay.

It's a wonder she didn't lose four the way she did her version of the hula. How she ever learned it is a mystery to me. Maybe the dancers at the barbecue had made an impression on her, but whenever the soft sounds of Hawaiian strings or the tom-toms came to her ears she'd drop whatever she was doing and start to move her hips. Her rhythm was a little peculiar. It was almost as if she'd been stung and the bee wouldn't let her alone. The more anyone who watched her laughed, the more she jerked and laughed with them.

"Linda Susan," I said once, "you're making a spectacle of yourself." She thought that was a lovely compliment and gave one final bump that landed her on the floor.

Naturally my daughter had a colorful hula skirt in her ensemble. Fond of clothes, she loved the island styles. The day after we arrived I bought some mother and daughter outfits which looked as tropical as the island itself. It'll take Linda Susan a long time before she gets used to her dainty organdy dresses again. At home she used to love strutting about in my fur cape that dragged on the rug behind her, but I suppose even that may have lost its attraction.

Of all the exciting things that happened to Linda Susan in Hawaii nothing could compare with her passion for the beach. The miles of white sand, the brilliant blue sky and the sparkling ocean fascinated her.

"Prett—ee, Mommy," she'd say over and over again. "Prett—ee," and she'd love it when I'd build castles for her down near the water's edge. But what she enjoyed most was to jump on the mounds of wet sand and feel the (Continued on page 65)

"Papa" dates Piper Laurie

■ Piper Laurie was 17 when Universal spied her in a school play, whipped out a seven year contract, and started paying her for nothing. "I can't take your money," she said indignantly. So to make her take their money, Universal cast her as Ronald Reagan's daughter in a movie called Louisa. That solved her money problem, but not her date problem. The day Francis (the talking mule) premièred, Piper's escort got lost and she was left holding the invitation. "Don't worry," said Ronald Reagan modestly, "I'll take you." "You?" said Piper. "But you're my father!" "See here," said Ronald, "let's not carry this thing too far." Piper dropped it right there. Immediately after work (as you can see in these pictures) Ronald changed his tie, bought a corsage and showed Piper the première and the town. Same night, Betty Hutton (opposite page) was showing another part of the town her version of the Charleston. Bill Daniels, dance instructor, had lured her onto the floor at Mocambo, where the crowd dissolved in cheers.

by Frances Clarke

■ She was very young, and very shy, and her eyes told you how desperately she needed to be liked. As she entered the powder room at the highschool dance, there was a sudden silence among the girls—the sort of silence that meant she was the one they'd been saying nasty things about.

She forced a weak smile. "Hello, Mary . . . Alice . . . Ruth." There was a cold murmur of greeting. Miserably she hung her worn cloth coat on the rack—among the sleek furs and velvets. As she turned to the mirror to straighten her hair, she realized now how foolish had been her frantic hope that, somehow, her dress would not betray its origin—this creation of shirred taffeta, with artificial rosebuds caught here and there in a frill of silver lace, that had cost $4.95 in Kansas City's bargain center, Jones Basement.

She pushed at her hair hastily, quickly applied lipstick and hurried out. Before the door was closed, she heard behind her the clear voice of a young lady exclaiming, "Well! I wonder what he thinks of that dress!" And there was harsh laughter.

That was how Joan Crawford arrived at her first dance. She was the only student in the private co-ed school who had to work her way through its elegant halls. She was there because her mother, making little by running a laundry agency, could not support her, and only at a private school could a girl earn both her education and her living—doing dishes, making beds, cleaning and cooking. The other girls, with the cruel snobbery of the young with secure backgrounds, ignored her socially. And then one day, to their amazement and rage, the best-born and wealthiest lad in the school asked her to be his date at this, the biggest school dance of the year.

As she made her way from the powder room to meet her escort at the ballroom entrance, the music started. Further qualms assailed her now—for the simple reason that she'd never danced with a boy before in her life.

She went up to her date. "Why," he said, "how beautiful you look. And what a pretty dress. . . . Well—shall we show the people how to dance?"

She had a moment of near panic as she found herself walking out on the floor beside him. And then—they were dancing. Dancing smoothly and beautifully. Her feet meshed perfectly with the rhythm and her partner's steps.

Success is sweet no matter how or where it appears. So it's little wonder that the girl from the wrong side of the background ledger, finding she could meet all comers successfully on the dance floor, started haunting dances. At one of them, she met a quiet, studious, poetic college boy named Ray Sterling. He looked beyond her too-high heels, her too-brief skirts, her too-vivid lips, her too-too everything—and saw the very fine young girl with a great hunger for life and a great vitality. He sensed that if those driving forces were properly channeled she could and would be a great person.

He told her so. He told her what he knew of the world of art, music, literature and philosophy. Eagerly she listened. She tried to get more formal education. But at Stephens, a very good Mid-Western college where she could work her way, she flunked out because a diploma from the private school—despite what it said—had been awarded for the extra-curricular chores she'd done, not for classroom work.

So she returned to Kansas City and turned her heart to dancing. Working as a department store clerk, she painstakingly saved some of her earnings toward a nest-egg to set her on her way as a professional dancer. Before she'd saved much she quarreled bitterly with her mother and went off to Chicago. With less than five dollars in her purse, she auditioned in the office of Erne Young, a show producer. He gave her a job singing and dancing in a frowsy side-street nightclub. Two weeks later, he sent her to dance in a chorus in an expensive Detroit nightclub. There she was spotted by J. J. Shubert, a really great theatrical producer who couldn't fail to notice her when her swirling skirt spun a glass off a table into his lap. The result was that she became the chorus girl third from the left, back row, in his Broadway hit, Innocent Eyes. Then came another show, The Passing Parade. While in this, she took a proffered screen test only because her roommate insisted.

Before the result of this was known, she went home to see Ray Sterling—whose letters, filled with affectionate encouragement and advice, had followed her—and to make up with her mother. There, on Christmas Day of 1925, came the wire from MGM offering her $75 a week.

"I don't want to be a movie actress—I want to be a dancing star!" she protested against her mother's and Ray's excitement. But Ray persuaded her to accept as a short-cut to her goal, pointing out she could use the money she'd be making for really good dancing lessons.

So, on New Year's Day of 1926, she boarded the train for Hollywood. . . .

As Joan Crawford told me all this, we were sitting in the recreation room of her beautiful Brentwood home. Everybody had warned me that she wouldn't talk about the past. And at first, she didn't want to.

"One day I sat down and made a table of my worries," she explained. "I found thirty per cent of them were about something which of course I couldn't alter—the past. So I decided then and there to quit thinking or talking about it."

"Well," I said wistfully, "I hoped you would—because I'd like to know how you eveloped your capacity to grow. The first ovie I ever saw you in was Dancing aughters, in 1929. You had a terrific ffect on me. At first, I used huge quanities of mascara and lipstick trying to nitate your big eyes and your vivid outh. Then, later on, I began to listen symphonic music—because you gave a ig party for Stokowski and raved so uch about him as a conductor. I began read the philosophers more seriously college because, in a movie magazine, ou advised it. And to me you became e most never-stop-growing person I've ver known."

"'Never-stop-growing person,'" she reeated slowly. Then she said briskly, "I ave to be. I can't possibly sit back and ay, 'I've grown up now, so I can quit tudying.' Why, as many times as I look p some words in the dictionary, I still tumble over them when I try to use them. lo matter how much I study there are ots of things I haven't got the assurance discuss. I'm still trying to make up for ll the education I missed in school. The nly real assurance I have is in dancing. guess I'm just a frustrated dancer."

She was wearing a brief, bared-midriff laysuit. Any ideas I might have had that oan Crawford has become a make-up an's work of art were certainly exploded hen and there. The only make-up she ore was a little lipstick. As far as I'm oncerned, she can take her place right ow as one of the fabulous women whom ime forgets to touch.

Finding during her first few months in Hollywood she was little more than a lorified extra-girl and a queen of the ublicity department's cheesecake art, oan had turned again to dancing. Esorted by various playboys, she entered harleston contests then being held at Hollywood night-spots. She won so many ups she became known as the Charleston id.

"In my rented bungalow in Culver City," aid Joan, "I placed my cups against a ackground of which I was particularly roud—a blue velvet scarf on which a lancing girl was embroidered in glitterng rhinestones. When Paul Bern, then n associate producer, saw that rhinestone irl, he couldn't keep from laughing. It ave me a jolt. I knew then how cheap nd gaudy it was . . . and all the other urnishings I'd acquired, too. So I began o study seriously how to improve myself."

When Dancing Daughters came along in 929, she was still a "flapper" and could nderstand the problems of the heroine. o it was tailor-made for her spirit. She ad improved herself enough so that she ould put that on film well enough to nake herself an overnight star.

"When I was told I was to be starred hereafter and that my salary was increased to $500 a week, I could hardly wait to get to a telephone and call Ray nd my mother in Kansas City to tell hem," she said with a smile.

Next she looked around for a house to buy. She was determined to pay cash for t and to improve it as she was financially able. She found a seven-room one with ample grounds around it out on a lonely, country road. She bought it.

"This room is one of the original ones," she told me. "The first night, I slept on a mattress and kept my personal things on a tea-cart while the maid had a bed and a tiny table in her room. That was practically all the furnishings we had. It scared us half to death driving that dark distance out here. But I was determined that I'd have real beauty around me."

At this time, she was listening to another sensitive, quiet young man—Douglas Fairbanks, Jr. So her dream of becoming familiar with the world of art, music, literature and philosophy was intensified. She married Fairbanks in 1929.

To the public, it was exciting to read the headline, "WILL EX-CHORUS GIRL BE RECEIVED AT PICKFAIR?" To Joan, it was humiliation—because Douglas Fairbanks, Sr., and his second wife, Mary Pickford, waited a full year before receiving her. When she finally was invited to one of their very formal dinners, she was painfully self-conscious. Brilliant conversation on all sides went over her head.

She yearned desperately to forget such parties and to resume the evenings of studying with her young husband. But he, by that time, was a man turning into the international sophisticate he has now become. By 1933, their paths had diverged so greatly that Joan left him.

"To this day," she says, "I'm scared of big parties. For a long time when I received any invitation, my first question was, 'How many guests will there be?' If it was a large party, I'd refuse. After I began to try to face that fear, I'd accept —but nine times out of 10 I'd phone practically at the last minute excusing myself on the grounds I had an early studio call. I do go to big parties—but I die until I can grab onto a few congenial couples with whom I can be co' 'fortable.

Right after her first divorce, Joan was lonely. There were tears, and she was singing "marriage is not for me" blues. Her unhappiness showed in her work. "They" began saying Crawford was through. In a sense, dancing once again came to her rescue—she was teamed with Clark Gable in Dancing Lady. It put her back in the top brackets.

Emotionally she was recovering, too. She was listening to another sensitive, articulate young man—Franchot Tone.

Of him, she says now, "I still worship Franchot—worship, you understand, not love—for his ability to talk so very intelligently about our profession. I've never been able to do that. I can only feel my roles. Almost invariably my first take is my best. One intellectual actress took advantage of that. In a key scene we had together, she purposely blew up in take after take until all the verve went out of me, then she projected her drama quite perfectly and stole the scene. Franchot would never deliberately use his ability to harm another player. Nor would Mel Ferrer, the latest person I've met who has that wonderful intellectual understanding."

During the two years of her marriage to Tone, she seemed to be achieving it. They built a little theater in the garden of her home—which by that time had been turned into a lovely mansion in what had become the beautiful Brentwood residential district. There they rehearsed stage plays. Until Franchot built up her self-confidence enough, she dared not appear with him before radio audiences. But Franchot himself was not progressing in his profession as he had hoped. This, combined with other dissatisfactions, sent Joan into the divorce courts again.

Indicative of Franchot's psychological hold on her is the fact that with their divorce, Joan found she could not face radio audiences any more. (Recently she appeared on Suspense—but only after the producers made an exception by transcribing it instead of presenting it before a studio audience as it usually is. Joan paid for all costs of the transcription.)

Joan then turned to children as an outlet for her emotions. She adopted fair-haired Christina and, a few months later, equally blond Christopher. She turned her tremendous vitality toward becoming a good mother. Between pictures she took complete charge of them. The children dominated—and still do to a large extent —her conversation. (The most poignant of all her remarks to me was, "I began to learn to play the way kids do. I'd never had a chance to before. . . .")

Romantically, her name was linked with Greg Bautzer, the very eligible Hollywood attorney with whom she'd been friendly for a long time. She was seen with him enough so that there were rumors they were altar-bound.

When she blithely announced one morning that she'd just married Phil Terry, a charming and ambitious young Paramount actor, it hit Hollywood like a bombshell.

"There's an empty seat next to a kid blowing bubble gum."

I couldn't ask Joan about Phil Terry. I was still under the spell of the day the Hollywood Women's Press Club awarded her the Golden Apple for the most co-operative actress of the year 1945. Never before nor since has there been such a turnout for those awards. Throughout the award luncheon, Joan wept continuously. No one that day asked Joan to elaborate on the morning's news flash that she and Phil Terry had separated—and she was headed for the divorce court for the third time. And she volunteered no comment.

But I do know that during her marriage to Phil Terry, a new Joan Crawford appeared—one who let her husband do all the talking even when the interview was supposed to be exclusively with her. Typical of the period is the experience told by one writer, "All Joan said during my interview with her was, 'Phil, dear, please pass Miss Blank the olives.'"

She left Metro and went to her 27-room house to await offers from other studios. She is very frank to say, "That was the worst time of my life. Nothing has ever made me so miserable as those three years when everybody except close personal friends and wonderfully loyal fans said I was definitely washed up. Nobody offered me a job. And I simply didn't know how to retire. I've earned my own way ever since I was nine years old."

At the end of those three years, Jerry Wald, enthusiastic young producer at Warners, offered her Mildred Pierce.

From all sides everybody cheered and topped their cheers by giving her the industry's sought-after Academy Award.

After her divorce from Phil Terry, she adopted two more children, twins Cynthia and Cathy. They came in while I was there, shy, two-going-on-three-year-olds hiding behind their nursemaid's starched skirts. Joan beamed on them. "Come on now," she said, "show Miss Clark your happy face! Happy face!" Quickly the twins' smiles came and Joan laughed, "That's it! Always happy face!" Cathy broke away from the nursemaid's skirts and ran joyfully to Joan, who scooped her up. But Cynthia, solemn again, sat down and proceeded to try to tuck her slippered big toe in her mouth.

"Look at you!" Joan chuckled. "I told someone the other night how you do that. He said, 'Oh, to be able to do that again!' I bet him $50 I could—and I won, too!"

In came one of the handsomest little boys I've ever seen. Dressed in pajamas and robe, he was introduced as Christopher. With great gravity he asked me my opinion of sand-crabs. Finding me interested, he told how many they'd caught at the beach that afternoon. Then his gravity broke as he said enthusiastically, "Mummy's best of all at catching them!"

Laughing, Joan excused herself for a few minutes and took the children to watch their favorite television show.

When she returned, I said, "They're wonderful!"

"They are, aren't they? I'm sorry Christina's away right now so you can't meet her," she said softly, her eyes glowing. "Every night I ask, 'God, have I done right for them today?' I know how important those early years can be. I want them to be happy."

"How about marrying again?" I asked.

"Everybody thinks I should marry again, but—well, that's in the future."

"What about Ray Sterling?" I asked with sudden inspiration. "Is he married yet?"

"No—he's never married. He lives in Florida now. We write to each other a lot. I had a letter from him just the other day. He's been appointed to a crime prevention commission, isn't that wonderful?"

"Any romance there?" I asked hopefully.

"Well," said Joan, "as Ray says, if the timing had ever been right when we'd been together, we probably would have married and made a go of it. I probably would have married him back in Kansas City, but we both felt I ought to try my wings first. Since then the timing's never been right somehow. But certainly he's the most important of all my beaux. I was headed for trouble when I met him. My life would have been a lot different without him. . . ."

As I looked about at the beauty with which Joan has surrounded herself, I was particularly impressed by the Gagni paintings. They are quite a far cry from the gaudy rhinestone dancing girl. Gagni used his paint thickly in all the living things he reproduced so that they stand out in exquisite bold relief from the flat background he has made of lifeless things such as buildings, bridges or streets.

It seemed to me his technique keynoted Joan Crawford—standing out so vividly so beautifully in her life today against the unhappy background of her early years

At first she was frightened by the roaring surf. She even cried a little when I tried to take her into the calmer water, but soon she toddled in by herself and splashed about and screamed when I made her come out.

Every morning she'd watch the men push their outrigger canoes into the surf. And as they skimmed over the breakers into the open seas she'd shield her eyes with one hand and point to them with the other. "Canooo," she'd say, "Canooo," and the words were left trailing in the air like the call of a coyote.

I got her a small toy canoe to play with and she spent hours pretending to ride the waves. She had a wonderful time talking to herself and laughing and maneuvering the boat through the sand.

When she wasn't playing "outrigger" she was running over the beach in her playsuit and huge, floppy Mexican straw hat that we'd brought from Los Angeles to protect her against sunburn. The hat's brim was so wide you could only see her feet sticking out as she lurched across the sand like a little character out of a comic strip.

I kept watching for signs of homesickness but they never came. To Linda Susan Hawaii was home, except that her collie, Lannie, was missing. The first few days she looked for him everywhere. If there was a knock on the door she'd clap her hands and laugh, "Lannie," and she'd look so puzzled when he didn't come in. But later a while she found other Lannies. Every long-haired dog on the island would be tugged and hugged and kissed by my daughter. And none of them seemed to mind.

Aloha, too soon . . .

It was odd how those five weeks flew like five days. In one mad afternoon we packed all our clothes (there seemed to be many more than what we'd started with) and boarded the Clipper.

At first Linda Susan refused to leave. I'd put a skirt of hers into the valise and she'd take it out and hide it under a chair. Then, so delighted with her little trick, she'd pull me by the hand and show me the hiding place.

Down at the airport she was almost smothered with leis made of gardenias and orchids and carnations and white ginger. She kept waving her hand at the friends who'd come down to say goodbye to us.

"Aloha, Linda Susan," one of them said, "Aloha."

Linda looked up a little sad, a little surprised, and shook her head. "No hello," she whispered, "Bye-bye."

And as I carried her up the gangplank I started to think how I would feel if I were two years old and my mother were dragging me away from the place I loved. But I could think of was home and how I'd like to be there.

So in the plane I started talking to Linda Susan about Lannie and how he was waiting for her to come play with him, and of all the toys getting themselves ready in the nursery, and of the sandpile outside and of her love birds who were lonely. Her eyes lit up and she hugged me tight, and after a while she hummed herself to sleep.

And as the plane sped on I thought how nice it was that now I had a daughter old enough to take with me wherever I went, and that wherever I go it will be new and thrilling because I'll be seeing it all through my daughter, Linda Susan's eyes.

New Year's Eve, when all of Honolulu practically blows up with fireworks, Clark and Sylvia sent rockets and Roman candles whooshing into the sky from midnight to dawn. They stood there like a couple of awe-struck kids watching the sky light up. Like the newlyweds they were, with a whole life before them, exciting and new.

Nobody who knows Clark or Sylvia well was really surprised by the Gable who came back from Honolulu, the Gable who dropped ten years by saying, "I do," the Gable with the frequent, boyish grin.

His friends knew that a guy like him is no good rattling around alone and lonely as he'd been since Carole Lombard died. But he needed the sort of woman who would understand him, who would be able to interest him in life again.

The new Mrs. G. is not only social but sociable-plus. She likes people and people like her. She's lived all her life in a world of conviviality, and one Hollywood prediction is practically unanimous: the old recluse Gable is a man of the past. If anyone can warm up his home and bring him back to the life of friends and fun that he really loves, it's Sylvia. Already in the past two months she's had more dinner parties at Encino that Clark himself bothered to stage in the past two years, including a surprise forty-ninth birthday party for Mr. G. himself.

When he came back from his honeymoon, Clark was given a special gift from MGM. They put off shooting his picture, To Please A Lady, for three months. But every day of those three months he worked overtime—to please a lady named Sylvia.

After Clark had shown his bride her new home in Encino, she came out onto the brick front porch and gazed across the lawn at the sun-spattered pepper trees.

"I love it," she said. "It's perfectly charming. Simply adorable. Only—"

"Only what?"

"Wouldn't sheep be lovely on that beatiful green lawn?"

"Sheep?" muttered Clark. "I dunno. I dunno about sheep."

"And over there, in that patch of sun by the pool. Can't you just see roses? Hundreds of roses?"

"Roses?" said Clark. "Oh, yeah. Roses."

"And just imagine a guest house down under that spreading walnut. The 'Tree House,' we'd call it."

"Guest house!" yelped Clark. "Hey—who wants guests?"

Just then Martin, the valet who's been with Gable for fourteen years, walked out to say, "Lunch is ready, Mrs. Gable."

"He knows who's boss," laughed Clark. "So do I. And I'm afraid I like it."

Just the other morning as Clark waved goodbye, and rolled down the winding drive in his new imported Jaguar roadster, he passed a flock of sheep grazing on the lawn, not far from a hundred and eighty rose bushes, blowing pink petals into the pool. And just over the hill, down under the spreading walnut tree, painters were putting the finishing coat of paint on the new guest house. And pretty soon, Sylvia will be sending out invitations. But this is not what Hollywood expected.

When news of their marriage first broke out, Hollywood set up a wail. "We'll never see the guy again," everyone moaned. "The International Set's got him. First thing Sylvia'll do is take him off to Europe. Anybody want to buy a ranch?"

Well, just try and buy it—Mr. and Mrs. Gable's ranch, that is. Even if you get by the electric gate, you'll be climbing a pepper tree the minute you say, "How much?" And Bob, Rover and Ricky, Clark's three watchdogs, reinforced by Minnie, Sylvia's toy Manchester, will keep you up there for years.

It's private property, and the way things look, it's going to stay that way.

Matter of fact, Clark and Sylvia never considered making their home anywhere else. Everything they loved about their honeymoon house in Kahala—the flowered chair covers, the Chinese screens, the lanai lounge—they wanted to take back to the ranch. They'd have moved the big hibiscus to their front lawn if they could, and possibly the view of the bay.

About all they actually packed was a ukulele and a crate full of Hawaiian records. But most important, they brought themselves, and their dreams for the future they've vowed to share.

Sylvia fell in love with Clark's ranch at first sight, the way she fell for Clark. His home is as much a part of the guy she married as his rugged face, jug ears and disarming grin. In his whole rambling life no place has tied him to it as long or as strong before.

For the past twelve years—a big hunk out of any man's life—all the intimate memories of his sad and glad times have fastened right to those twenty acres of sloping soil in the San Fernando Valley.

It was to this same homestead that Clark brought his last bride, Carole Lombard, and it was from here that he bolted, grim and red-eyed, to search the Nevada gorges day and night until he found her crushed body. It was here that he flew from Paris two years ago when the sad news reached him that his beloved old dad, "Billy," was dead. (Often Billy Gable lived at the ranch with his son.) It was here that Clark greased his guns and oiled his tackle before setting forth on the mountain hunts and blue-water marlin cruises he loved; here where he returned whiskered and sweaty with his bag or catch to phone Jack Conway, the late Vic Fleming, Al Menasco or Walter and Fieldsie Lang, some pal or collection of pals, and beg them to "come and get it."

In that time, Clark's ploughed up almost every foot of the citrus-alfalfa land in person. Bob, his twelve-year-old German pointer, used to pant along beside him as Clark drove the tractor. And out in the pasture today stands Sunny, his riding horse. Now sixteen, Sunny's carried Clark over every square foot of the place.

Gable's personally sweated with construction gangs building the six-stall stable, the sheds, the garage and outhouses. He planned and put in the small oval swimming pool. And he's personally acquainted with every shrub, flower and tree inside his white rail fence.

If you are hunting for elegance, the elegance of town houses and English country manors, for instance, you won't find it here in the small, clapboard, slant-hoofed house. "It's not grand or gorgeous," Clark says, "but it's for me." And it's for Sylvia, too. Certainly she wasn't looking here for the things she had tasted and found tasteless elsewhere.

The only time Clark ever considered leaving his home for good was when he went off to war. Mixed up and shaken then, he wanted to wipe the slate clean to sell his place and his memories of it. His friends talked him out of that, and Clark's been glad ever since. Especially now.

"Inside my house," Clark has explained time and again to a curious press, "is the only place in the world I have any privacy at all. It's my refuge, and it's not going to be invaded." It never has been thrown open for the world to see. It never will be photographed.

But what Sylvia Gable saw when Clark kissed her and set her down past his doorway was a bachelor hall that could use a few feminine frills.

Inside the English provincial house with its hint of Cape Cod is a large living room with a massive fireplace. Over the fireplace are mounted Clark's collection of antique fowling pieces. Two huge sofas stand on either side of the hearth, flanked by over-stuffed chairs. The tables are sturdy and simple, the walls almost bare of pictures, and a beige carpet stretches across the room.

A book-lined den near the living room houses Clark's fine gun collection, a radio, a record machine and a movie projector. Next to the den there's a small office for his secretary, Jean Gorceau.

The dining room is a step below the living room. It has its own big fireplace and a plain plank table big enough for ten. Old oil-burning lamps on the table give the room much of its salty atmosphere. Chairs line one wall and Clark's built-in bar is against the other.

A straight staircase rises out of a living room corner to the bedrooms above.

Clark's room has an over-sized bed in it with a small couch at its foot. His wardrobe racks and chests of drawers are built into a dressing room which has floor length mirrors on all sides.

Sylvia's room is across the hall. This was Carole Lombard's room, and somehow the sentimental fiction persists that Clark refused to alter a thing in it since she died. But two years ago, he had it completely done over for a guest room.

Of course Sylvia has changed things at her new home. Clark expected her to, and he's delighted with the results.

Already there are flowers and plants inside where nobody ever thought of putting them. The few prize pieces Sylvia had at the ocean-front house Doug Fairbanks left her are on their way from England and New York. The guest house —two rooms and a bath—is fully furnished to her taste. Sylvia's bedroom was done over again in the soft greens and yellows she loves. The living room furniture's been shifted around, and recovered. And the unfamiliar scent of lavender drifts out of the wardrobe closets, packed now with the beautiful clothes which were back in New York when Sylvia needed them most—for her trousseau.

"You know something?" Sylvia confessed recently to a friend. "The week before we were married I amused myself by thinking what I'd wear if Clark should propose. I had a wonderful dress in mind, a whole outfit, in fact. And what happened? I got married in a plain navy blue with a white collar!"

Nobody would have enjoyed dolling herself up for an event like that as much as Sylvia. She loves clothes and carries them well. Her collection of jewelry is dazzling. Her perfumes are super-feminine and exquisitely French. She's been on the international "best-dressed" lists many times.

Her most flattering lines are tailored and trim, and no one can put a hat on her head or French heels on her feet. She's decided what her type is long ago and she sticks to it with confidence.

But even in that navy blue dress with the white collar, Sylvia was up in the clouds on her wedding day. And neither Clark nor Hollywood has let her down.

The first time Clark and Sylvia came out of Encino together they went to the première of Key To The City. This was a lucky break for Clark, because in that movie, for the first time since the war, he was unmistakably the old Gable, virile and fascinating. That was the kind of role that made him famous. Sylvia, who hadn't seen Clark on the screen since It Happened One Night (in 1935) told him later, "Darling, you haven't changed a bit!"

Right now Sylvia's catching up to the other Gable fans by seeing all of Clark's movies at home. She's extremely interested in his career, although she hasn't the smallest desire to act. The first day Clark worked on To Please A Lady Sylvia inspected the set with all the curiosity of a bobby-soxer. In May, she's going with him to the Memorial Day auto races in Indianapolis where footage will be shot for his next race-driver role.

After that, Clark has four more months of freedom for a second honeymoon, and he's planned it already. He wants to take a motor trip all over the U.S.A. to show Sylvia a close-up of the country that was so good to him.

They want to see Europe together, too, and then, South America. But no matter how far away they go, they'll always come racing back to Hollywood, to their home. "Brother," said Clark to a friend the other day, "if there's a dull minute from now on, it's my own fault."

Clark's grateful for this second chance at happiness, and he wants to enjoy every moment to the full. Both he and Sylvia are seasoned enough to know that there's give and take to married happiness, and the more you give the more you take. Both have a striking parallel in their romantic pasts. They've tried marriage before, and failed twice. They've known brief, intense loves that ended tragically by death—Clark with Carole Lombard and Sylvia with Doug Fairbanks.

And they know that, fate willing, they'll get the wish they made that Hawaiian night in December, 1949. With the Pacific surf in the background, and the moon glistening on the sand, Clark and Sylvia sipped champagne on the lanai, and Clark made a toast: "To us," he said, "and to our new life in the days and nights ahead. May they all be as swell as this."

So far they've got their wish, and it looks as if it will keep, for on that night when love walked in and claimed Clark Gable's life, loneliness took one lingering, frightened look and drowned itself off the shores of gay Hawaii. THE END

"But he said to come over any time," Bill persisted.

"Not this late," I said. "You can't call on anyone at this hour."

"I suppose you're right," he answered.

When we got home, I went upstairs right away and got ready for bed. Bill said he would be up in a moment. Minutes passed. I was just getting under the covers when I heard the front door open, and then—the motor of the car as Bill started it up and drove away!

I was lying there, mentally throwing knives at him—and not missing—when, scarcely five minutes later, I heard the car come back. Bill came upstairs, and I stared at him until he almost withered.

"Now! Now!" he said. "I bet you thought I was going on to that party alone."

"Weren't you?" I asked.

"Of course not!" he replied.

"Then where were you going at nearly two o'clock in the morning?"

"Why, darling," said Bill, "I noticed there wasn't much gas in the car and I knew you had an early call—so I just ran up to the all-night service station and filled the tank."

"Oh, Bill! How nice of you!" I said and went to sleep happy. I was happy. Even if he had started out for the party, he'd come back because he didn't want to risk offending me. What more can a wife ask?

Once when he was ill and ordered to stay in bed he decided he was going to get up and go to the studio anyway. I was furious—but he was firm. I watched grimly as he got to his feet, swayed over to the wardrobe closet and started pawing around among the clothes. Then, very quietly, he turned and went back to bed.

"Well, what changed your mind?" I asked.

He looked up at me, his jaw set. "I didn't change my mind," he said. "I just didn't have strength enough to lift the suit off the hanger."

The next minute my Bill was asleep.

By the way, he doesn't snore. That, I understand, is a claim which very few, if any other, wives can make. But he is a thrasher. (Once I awoke to find him beating away at the foot of the bed where he claimed some gophers were digging a hole.) He also makes a peculiar, clicking noise deep in his throat. Both our boys seem to have inherited this last habit. Sometimes, in the middle of the night, I hear Bill clicking away, with both West and Scott doing the same thing . . . and I have to laugh softly at the odd night chorus. Once Bill awoke and heard me.

"Huh?" he asked thickly.

"Yes, yes," I replied comfortingly and he went back to sleep. It doesn't make any difference what I say when he wakes up like that. All he needs is a little reassurance and he'll sink away again.

But it isn't so easy to reassure him any other time. If things are going very well he's apt to be glum. If things look bad he's high-spirited and confident.

I never say, "The reviews on your last picture were great, Bill," because he'll tell me there was an awful lot wrong with it. But if the reviews are just so-so, he'll say, "Wait till next time! I know just what was wrong and from now on I'll have it under control." (He certainly has Sunset Boulevard under control.)

In his personal life Bill doesn't react this way. It's hard for him to take things easily, or do them in an easy way. If he thinks he's smoking too much he can't just cut down. He has to stop altogether. Consequently on the second day, he's a mental wreck.

Sunday after Sunday he'll laze around the house. Then will come one Sunday when he'll be up before dawn, wheeling fertilizer around in the garden or digging holes. By nightfall he'll be gasping. He'll be lucky to get out of bed in the morning.

He even eats wrong in my opinion. But my opinion doesn't take hold. Eating is important to him. When meal-time's delayed he's delirious—that is, at lunch and dinner. He doesn't care about breakfast.

If we're having people in to dinner, at, say, seven-thirty, Bill likes to have them in by seven so they can drink their cocktails and sit down on time. But, if they happen to arrive as requested at seven-thirty, he'll greet them with, "Hello-would-you-like-a-drink-dinner-is-ready!"

An army friend of his, Joe Kilgore, has told me how Bill behaved when they had quarters together in an apartment, where Bill did most of the cooking. "Anytime I came home late to dinner Bill would be standing at the top of the stairs, a kitchen towel over his shoulders, and a big fist ready to shake in my face because I had spoiled his steaks with my tardiness."

Incidentally, I'm amazed at how Bill's old friendships persist. Some of his best friends were first graders with him in school. He doesn't make new friends though, at the drop of a hat. And his judgment about people in general is much better than mine.

People I think are fine he has often seen in another light—a more revealing light—as it eventually turned out. That's why I always ask Bill first before inviting any of my friends over. But it doesn't work the other way. "Come on over!" he'll yell into the phone if someone he likes happens to call. Then he'll turn to me and say, "That was Hector. You remember old Hector? Swell guy! He's on his way out for dinner." Just like that.

On cooking, on friends, and on political matters Bill is more or less in charge for both of us. On things professional, on scripts and acting roles, little Brenda's opinion is asked for and respected. On raising the family, meaning our children Virginia, West and Scott, I am the authority. Anything else we work out together.

Lately this cooperation has taken the form of our running up and down the Coast looking for antiques. A few weeks ago in Santa Barbara, we ran across just the piece we were looking for—an old English pushpenny gaming table.

"How much?" I asked.

"That will be four-hundred-and-fifty-dollars," said the proprietor.

I looked at Bill and turned to the door. But Bill stood his ground.

"That's too bad," he told the man. "I just haven't got that much cash."

"How much have you got?"

"Seventy-two dollars," Bill said.

The dealer scratched his head. "Well. . ." he began, and I turned in amazement. Was he really going to accept that much of a reduction? But Bill wasn't amazed.

"And, of course I couldn't give you all of the seventy-two," Bill said. "Have to keep ten. Lunch and all that . . ."

The dealer's hand almost shook as he stretched it out for the sixty-two.

A few minutes later, as we started up the highway, I turned to Bill. "I was scared to death he wouldn't take the seventy-two," I said. "How did you have the nerve to cut it more?"

Bill swung the wheel sharply and the car turned in towards a roadside diner. He studied a big sign showing steaks broiling over a charcoal fire and then looked at me.

"I was scared to death he would take the seventy-two, and I wouldn't get to eat!" he replied.

That's him . . . that's my dear husband.

New York. He went to prep school in New Mexico, served in the Navy, finally graduated from Loyola, a Catholic college in Los Angeles.

Already he has all the know-how of what makes a big hotel tick, he's an executive in the sprawling Hilton Hotel chain and one of his dad's trumps. Last year Connie Hilton sent Nick abroad to make a survey of European hotel conditions. His report to the company was solid and comprehensive—a terrific job. It wasn't his first. All the Hilton managers respect Nick and ask his advice.

With the Hilton company set to build a huge new $7,000,000 hotel next year in Beverly Hills, Nick won't have to worry about a job to support his wife, or, it's my guess, one that's too far away from hers. Undoubtedly he'll be busy as a bird dog getting the Beverly Hilton started.

Everyone who has ever known Nicky Hilton is wild about him. His ex-stepmother, Sari (Zsazsa) Gabor Hilton Sanders (now actor George's wife) told me, "Nicky's one of the finest boys I ever knew in my life. He's the very highest type of young American man." Nick was sixteen when Sari married Conrad, his dad. They became pals at once and when he got the go-ahead on his engagement from Elizabeth's dad, Nick called London (where George Sanders was making a picture) to tell Zsazsa the glad news. "It may sound amazing for me to predict," she laughed to me, "but I bet those kids will stick together for keeps." She's not the only one who thinks that. So do Elizabeth's dad, her mother, Conrad Hilton—and me.

I sat next to them at a Hollywood party not long before their wedding. I know first hand Nick's charm, manners, good humor—and ability to take it, too. Esther Williams was with me and when Esther and I get going we can be holy terrors. That night we started off with, "Well, Elizabeth, now that you're going to get married, there are some things you ought to know—" It was a slanderous gag but we milked it merrily. "Now let's see," said Esther. "First, you'll make two pictures then it will be time for the first baby. Then two more and time for the second." We went on and on like that, instructing Elizabeth and Nick in the facts of life. She blushed and so did Nicky, who sat with his arm looped through hers. But even though we kidded them wickedly for two solid hours, they took it. Finally Liz exploded, "Why, I've never been talked to like this in my life!"

That night it was hard for me to realize that the blushing boy across from me had actually swept gorgeous Elizabeth Taylor, Hollywood's crown princess if there ever was one, off her feet. He just didn't seem the type. And, matter of fact, Nick isn't. He's no swoon boy and knocking them cold isn't the way he operates. Nicky Hilton won Elizabeth's heart by a very different technique.

It all started one noon hour last October at Lucey's cafe across from Paramount, where Elizabeth was halfway through A Place in The Sun. That morning she'd played the scene where Montgomery Clift goes off to jail, and now she was emotionally tense. When "Pete" Freeman, (son of Paramount's boss) called her set and said, "Liz, Nick Hilton, a friend of mine, wants to meet you. How about lunch?" She said, "Love it." Some chatter and laughs away from the heavy mood of the morning would be welcome. Nick, of course, had frankly asked his friend, Pete, to set it up. "I think she's a knockout," he'd admitted. "I want to meet her." Well, what young man wasn't dying to meet Elizabeth Taylor? But even then young Nick Hilton knew why he was. He'd fallen for Liz on the screen, he'd read about her, heard about her and what he had in mind was knowing her much better. Nick's original break, of course, was that he knew Pete Freeman well enough to ask a favor like that.

There wasn't much sensational about that lunch date—just small talk with the table hopping interruptions that afflict all lunch dates in all Hollywood star hangouts. Liz thought Nicky was "nice" and "attractive," that's all. But before he left Nick Hilton was strictly sunk. He was in love and he knew it. What's more, he knew what to do about it. Before he left he made a date with Elizabeth for the next Saturday night. And after he left he told Pete, "She's more wonderful than I thought she could be."

All the rest of the time she played A Place in the Sun Elizabeth saw Nick almost every night. He came to dinner at her home, said an early good night—but soon with a good night kiss. Weekends and afternoons off they clattered together over the woodsy Bel-Air riding trails where there are plenty of big oak trees to tie the horses to and sit on the leaves and talk and make plans. Weekends to go when they stepped out, it was to Barrymore and Marilyn's, or Pete Freeman's, or Elizabeth's friends, the Marshall Thompsons, to Jane Powell and Geary's house. Last New Year's the Freemans drove with Nick and Elizabeth to Arrowhead Springs to welcome 1950 in. But that was a private party, too, and well chaperoned. No wonder their romance wasn't buzzed around, no wonder they could keep it under wraps as they did all those early weeks, when all the time Nick Hilton was woozy with adoration and Elizabeth herself knew something important was making funny noises in her heart.

Frankly, I don't blame Elizabeth for hiding the truth, although she lost control of her heart very early in the game. She'd been singed twice by world wide publicity of the most chastening sort. They'd even tagged her with the rather nickname, "The Jilt," after the Glenn Davis and Bill Pawley broken troths. And she was wary she had a right to be. Nick, of course, was playing for keeps and did everything he could do to duck the limelight.

At first, you might think the boy had the strikes against him. For one thing, Liz was busy working throughout the early important stages and that meant only brief dates at night. Right away too, he bucked

I SAW IT HAPPEN

Not too long ago, a group of my school friends and I decided to sing carols in the neighborhood. It was raining and we were all cold, but still we sang from house to house throughout the streets. While we were singing in front of one house, the door opened suddenly and to our complete surprise Dana Andrews and his wife listened to us and even requested different songs, and finally invited us to come in out of the rain. I needn't add that Christmas Eve was certainly a pleasant experience for all of us.

Not long after Nick and Elizabeth discovered each other, he flew with Pete Freeman to Puerto Rico to help open his dad's new luxury hotel, the Caribe-Hilton. At that point Nick was so in love he couldn't stand the idea of that separation. He begged Elizabeth to go with him, and petitioned Paramount to let her stop work for a while on A Place in the Sun. Of course that was impossible and Nick made the trip without her. Almost as monotonous as the engine's drumming roar were Nick's anguished monologues, "I love her, I've just got to marry her, she's the only girl in the world for me." Poor Pete, who had to do the listening, suffered almost as much as Nick.

But those obstacles only made the outcome more certain for a determined character like Nick Hilton. When he was in San Juan, for instance, he made transoceanic calls to Elizabeth every night. And Nick Hilton had a few aces on his side in this particular game of hearts, not the least of which was the state of Elizabeth Taylor's impatient, frustrated ticker. He couldn't have entered a love game at a more psychologically perfect moment.

For the past year I've never known a girl more ripe for love and marriage than Elizabeth. She's been right in the full bloom of young womanhood and, as her record proves, she's been yearning to find the man she loved, marry him and live in adult life. To have held her back and smothered that natural impulse—as the Taylors wisely did not do—could have been disastrous. It could possibly have wound up in one of those too frequent and shameful stories which make headlines out of Hollywood—a young girl running wild, tragically off the track.

You can't hold back biology any more than you can make the moon stand still, at least, not without pretty terrible results. You can't substitute flirtation for the realities of love and the right and normal development of life, especially among the artificialities of Hollywood. The red signs read, "Danger!" when you do.

Elizabeth never wanted to. Neither did her parents. She started questing for the real thing the minute she felt the insistent mating urge. Both her romances with Glenn Davis and Bill Pawley were honest and sincere, though misunderstood and confused. Liz never deliberately toyed with a heart in her life. But Elizabeth Taylor is a great movie star and a great beauty—and there are penalties that go with both. There's no one nicer than Glenn Davis and it's a shame he was the victim of a publicity romance which backfired. That's the explanation of Elizabeth's first rallyhooed heart trouble. There were just too many young romance pictures and headlines to be stirred up by matching that famous pair, and Liz's studio can take the blame for spinning the story of a betrothal which never existed.

has to fall for sometime or other and he was a swell one too—handsome, manly, with prospects. The Taylors were delighted, and pleased to encourage Elizabeth along whatever path her eager heart led her. But again Elizabeth's fame and beauty made it a rocky one. Long distance misunderstandings, twisted headlines and jealousy wrecked that romance. Fear finally shattered their engagement, and the story has never been told until this minute:

On her last trip to Florida, Elizabeth drove away on an errand one night with one of Bill Pawley's best friends. They got back later than they'd expected, and found Bill waiting, livid with rage and jealousy. He bustled Liz into his car and roared away on a mad, reckless drive that could have ended tragically in horrible headlines. Stamping out his anger at the gas pedal, he showed Elizabeth a weakness she hadn't suspected—an ungovernable temper. When he brought her back at last, luckily all in one piece, she was shaken, trembling and afraid. That was the end of their engagement—right then. Elizabeth came home to California and the sad news came from Miami.

I dropped into the Taylors' home one evening as I've done often through the years, after Elizabeth's second heartbreak. I never saw a more miserable girl. She was sitting there alone and lonely, a fugitive from her lurid love publicity, fretting and frustrated. "I can't go anywhere, I can't see anyone but what it's a big thing—and of course that kills whatever chance I have! So I sit here at home—just at the time of my life when I should be enjoying myself."

A few days after that, Nick Hilton entered her life. Nick was new and Nick was different.

And to him it made sense when Elizabeth said, "I can't quit acting. I've grown up in Hollywood. Pictures are my life."

But can Elizabeth Taylor make Nick Hilton happy? Foolish question, maybe, but I happen to know that some of Nick's best friends groaned when they heard where his heart lay. "For gosh sakes, Nick," they pleaded, "snap out of it. Don't fall for a movie star. You can't compete with the studios, the glamor, the fame and the fuss. Come to—lay off!" I also know that the more they talked, the more determined Nick was to marry Elizabeth.

So, what kind of a girl is Nick getting—behind all the glamor and ballyhoo of Hollywood?

How will she add up as a wife?

I've known Elizabeth since she was nine years old, since the day her mother brought her to my parlor to sing and see if I thought she had anything for the movies. Her brother, Howard, delivered papers to my house. They're neighbors of mine in Beverly Hills and Francis and Sara have always been good neighbors and good friends. I know the sensible raising she's had, the stuff she's made of. It's the best. I love her and I can be pardoned for dabbing my eyes a little more than most at this time. It's like seeing my own daughter marry.

Once I spanked Liz mildly in my column for a wrong tip on a spoiled act I'd heard she'd pulled at the studio. Her mother called me that night and begged me to do something about it. Elizabeth was desolate and in tears. "Now Hedda's turned against me," she had wailed, "Now I haven't a friend left!" I had to do some tall reassuring. That's how sensitive she is.

Elizabeth Taylor Hilton's beauty is more than skin deep. She's a thorobred, a lady in what counts, her mind, heart, her background. The Taylors aren't wealthy but Elizabeth has been raised around wealth,

Strolling along the street one afternoon, Oscar Levant met a friend whom he hadn't seen in a number of years. "How are you?" asked Levant. In reply to this innocent query, the other began to unburden himself of all his troubles in a lengthy speech describing his poor health, his unfortunate marriage, his failure in business. After the man had spoken for thirty minutes Levant managed to interrupt. "Hold on," he managed to gasp, "I didn't mean literally."

breeding, and refinement. Art has surrounded her since she could remember intelligence, manners. She has graces and accomplishments; she draws, writes, sings plays the piano, can carry on a good conversation. Outdoors she's at ease, of course on a horse, at the wheel of a car, in the water. She knows color and clothes, she has tact and taste. Better yet, she has what is always the mark of a gentlewoman —consideration for others. For instance when her engagement with Bill Pawley broke up, she let the news come from him because she didn't want to hurt him.

She's sweet, but she has dignity and character, too. There's nothing cheap about Elizabeth. She would have died rather than be a promiscuous flirt, that's why she was so set on early marriage. She doesn't drink or smoke, and what eighteen-year-old girl do you know these days who prefers ice cream to a cocktail? What other star of her beauty and greatness could keep her balance so beautifully in the double life she has had to lead, split between a girl in person and a woman at the studio through those dangerous blooming years? Look what that trial did to Judy Garland.

Yes, I have always adored Elizabeth and so has everyone who knows her. I know that whatever she does she'll do right, with the right instincts. Nick Hilton has picked himself the prize of the lot.

But there are other binders to the union as important and promising as wealth, love and beauty. They took their vows solemnly in the Roman Catholic Church, which admits of no divorce. They took them after a respectable serious engagement of almost six months. They took them with the enthusiastic approval of both the Taylors and Conrad Hilton. In fact, by her marriage Elizabeth couldn't have expanded her family circle with more adoring set of in-laws.

Dad "Connie" Hilton worships her and was so proud of his son's conquest that he let the cat out of the bag before he was supposed to. It happened, remember, in New York when a reporter quizzed him about Nick's romance with Elizabeth or in Hollywood. "Are they serious?" he was asked.

"Serious?" blew up Hilton. "Of course they're serious! Why, they're going to get married May sixth!" Connie is simply wild about Elizabeth and grins widely whenever anyone accuses him of being as much in love with his daughter-in-law as Nick is. Of course he is—in a proud, paternal way. From now on he'll do everything he can to make her happy to be a Hilton. He already has. Before Elizabeth left Hollywood with her mother and Nick to shop for her trousseau in New York, the man who bought the Waldorf-Astoria told her, "Elizabeth, when you walk through the doors of the Waldorf, I want you to feel perfectly at home." So when she did, the clerk handed her an envelope. Inside was a tidy block of Waldorf-Astoria stock, making the future Mrs. H. a part owner right away!

As far as their future's concerned, I know that both Nick and Elizabeth want a family. They both have the makings of wonderful parents, but both share other ambitions, too. Elizabeth has A Place In The Sun ready to launch her at last on a really important adult career. Nick is knee-deep in his own business. But the stork has a way of making his own playdates.

Well—Mr. and Mrs. Conrad Nicholson Hilton, Junior, can take it from there. I'm not one to intrude on magic moments or predict events which rest in the hands of the Almighty alone. All I can say is that from where I sit, still dewy-eyed, they have everything.

It was worth waiting for—wasn't it? It was worth all the torment and confusion of changing into womanhood in a topsy-turvy town, worth the struggle to keep on keel and stay her own sweet self until the right man came along at last. So, bon voyage, Mr. and Mrs. Hilton, from me to you. And God bless you both. THE END

At 21, she's filled with a zeal for doing good, for continually learning and improving her abilities. This shows in her work. She's become so popular so fast that she's wanted for many more pictures than she can make. Sam Goldwyn was enough impressed with her performance in Our Very Own to want her to star again immediately with Farley Granger and Joan Evans.

When Ann's working, her day begins at six. Aunt Cissie's up long before that, mixing batter in the kitchen. Uncle Pat's out in the garage checking on the condition of her convertible. And almost as fast as Dagwood, Ann's up and away for at least ten hours. Aunt Cissie can usually count on her for dinner, though. The only place Ann really likes to dine out in is the Pump Room. The Pump Room's in Chicago.

Between pictures Ann's up early, too. Decked out in denims and a sport shirt she practices golf in the backyard, or answers her fan mail, or gets ready to make a personal appearance for one worthy cause or another. She even tries to cook.

"I'm afraid of the stove, that's all," says Ann. "When I make friends with the stove, everything will be okay."

Aside from that, everything is okay in that little house in the valley.

■ She got married the first time when she was 15. Janet and her husband-to-be were both high school kids, and what they didn't know about the world they wouldn't let anyone tell them.

The only thing that mattered was they were crazy about each other. It was August 21, 1942, and as they stood before the courthouse steps in Reno, afraid to go in, not wanting to stay out, they planned how they'd tell the judge or whoever asked them that they were old enough, and wise enough to do what they wanted.

Finally, they took hold of each other's hands and kissed each other quickly and dashed up the steps and into the door before another thought could enter their minds.

"We want a marriage license," Danny* said to the clerk. The clerk looked at them without interest and said, "How old are you?"

Janet looked at Danny, and blushed, and Danny looked at the clerk, and almost shouted, "I'm twenty-one, and she's eighteen."

"Okay," said the clerk. "Fill this out."

So they filled out the form together, and where it said, "I know of no legal objection to our marriage," they signed their names.

Their license okayed, they walked into the chambers of Judge Edgar Eather, and in the presence of two witnesses they were married. In the eyes of the State of Nevada, they were man and wife.

Had anyone told Jeanette Morrison then that, within four or five years, she'd be living in Hollywood, that Van Johnson net may marry Arthur Loew Jr., since she is admittedly in love with him. But two earlier arriages have made her wary about a third.

ould change her name to Janet Leigh, at she'd get married again, that she'd be ell on her way to stardom, she'd have told ch a person he was mad.

Of course, Janet's marriage to Danny dn't last very long. When the young uple got home, the parents on both sides ickly saw to that. The lawyers went to ork, and Janet felt that her heart was eaking. A schoolfriend who knew her ell when she lived in Merced, says, "It as just like Romeo and Juliet. I don't ow if Janet was really in love, but it dn't matter because she thought she was, d that's as good as the real thing when u're just a child and very emotional. But e used to tell me that she wanted to die, at people who loved each other should ver be separated. And she couldn't un- nd why her parents interfered. But ter a while things changed. The boy nt off to sea, and her family moved back Stockton, and she entered the College of e Pacific, and that's where she met Stanley ames and married him."

Janet's second marriage took place in the apel on the College of the Pacific campus en she and Stan were both juniors. Stan, l, brunet and very handsome had been a rekeeper in the Navy on the heavy iser, Canberra. As part of the Navy's 12 program, he was sent to the College the Pacific; and there, in August, exactly o years after she had eloped to Reno, net met him.

"It was very simple," Stan explained. "I st ran into Janet at chow hall. I was nding with a friend of mine, a girl named th Lewis, and she said, 'How would you e to meet Jeanette Morrison?' And I d, 'You bet.' (Continued on page 100)

A few short weeks ago she was in Ron living out of wedlock with Roberto Ro sellini, impatiently waiting for the Swedi authorities to approve her papers befo she could marry the father of her son.

In the United States, her picture, Stron boli, had failed, and Senator Johnson Colorado had accused her of immorali and stated, "I will do everything I c to see that they (Bergman and Rossellin do not set foot on American soil under o immigration laws."

In Hollywood, Dr. Peter Lindstrom r fused to recognize her Mexican divor and declined to state his future intentio Wherever Ingrid turned, society w against her. There was silence from h friends; silence from her bank, and silen from her daughter. This last silence w the most unendurable of all. For no ma ter what is said about this woman who so her reputation for love; she is a moth who loves her daughter, and she is cou ageous enough to want her.

Ingrid got in touch with her lawy Greg Bautzer, and told him, "I am goi to make the fight of my life for Pia. A I want to know about the communi property. Please file the necessary su at once."

Greg Bautzer went to work, and y saw the results in your morning new papers. INGRID TO FIGHT FOR CHILD . . . BER MAN DEMANDS ACCOUNTING OF HER MON . . . INGRID'S BATTLE FOR PIA BEGINS.

What Bautzer had done on Ingrid's b half was file a complaint for custody of P and subpoena Dr. Lindstrom to appe before him and give a complete deposit concerning $250,000 worth of communi property.

When Dr. Lindstrom received his su poena, he promptly turned it over to h lawyer, Judge Isaac Pacht. They had conference, and then they called in t newspapermen. For the first time sin the entire scandal broke, Dr. Lindstro willingly posed for photographs.

"We are going to assert," the docto lawyer began, "that Miss Bergman is n a proper person to have custody of th child. We will show that Dr. Lindstro by his action and conduct in this matt is the proper person to have the child.

"I will place before the courts all t facts with relation to this entire episo And I don't think there will be many d moments."

Thus, the battle began. Ingrid want joint custody of Pia, and Dr. Lindstro felt strongly that she should not have t child, that she was an unfit mother, th she had no right to take and rear this g after having gone off with Rossellini a begotten him a son.

The reporters, of course, asked how P felt about the entire mess. "I am sur said Isaac Pacht, "that the child wou rather remain in the custody of her fathe

Judge Georgia Bullock, who presid over the Children's Court of Conciliatio explained Pia's position.

"If the child is old enough," the Jud said, "it is my practice to talk to her order to understand her reactions to h environment and to both parents. T child's reactions to her parents would ha primary importance with me. As far I could, under the law and in considerati of the evidence, I would give weight the child's views."

Judge Bullock then went on to sa "There are, of course, so many things be taken into consideration in such evidence which points in exactly the opposite direction to the child's wishes. Or the child may have no decided preference. So many things. But I do believe this case is tremendously important and whatever decision is made will be criticized."

As the battle lines for the custody of Pia were being drawn, as Dr. Lindstrom prepared to file a cross-complaint in answer to Ingrid's—Miss Bergman was told that her chances of winning custody of the child in California were very slim.

After all, she was a woman who had committed adultery, a woman who had left her husband and daughter for another man. Under these circumstances, what court in the land would entrust her with the rearing of a 12-year-old child?

Just as Dr. Lindstrom was about to file his complaint, the phone rang. It was Pacht, the lawyer. "We've just had a phone call from Miss Bergman's attorney," he announced. "They want to have a conference. Perhaps we can settle the whole thing out of court."

What occurred in the first conference was a complete settlement of the Lindstrom community property. In her original complaint, Ingrid had charged that she had turned over to the doctor two sums of $182,000 and $154,000. In addition, he had control of their home, jewelry, personal property, and a lot of other assets. All of this was divided equally.

The conference continued. The doctor did not want Pia taken into court. He didn't want to subject the child to the ordeal of a trial. Her life had already been violently disrupted, and he saw in these conferences a way out, a way of saving her further mental hardship.

There was one point, however, on which he was firm. He didn't want Pia to ever come in contact with Rossellini.

As forcefully as he could, he made this plain. He agreed that Ingrid had a right to see her daughter. No doubt about that, but she had no right to bring his child into the Rossellini environment. Rather than agree to anything that would throw Pia in contact with the Italian director the doctor was determined to take the case through every court in the land.

"Dr. Lindstrom," his attorney announced, "is perfectly willing for Miss Bergman to see the child and to have her during summer vacations, providing Miss Bergman comes to California to be with her. But Dr. Lindstrom will not agree to anything which would provide for Pia's being taken out of the State of California. He wants her to be educated and to be brought up as a normal American. And he wants a normal mother-daughter relationship to be re-established between Pia and Miss Bergman as quickly as possible."

As the conference progressed, Dr. Lindstrom, who planned to file for divorce on the grounds that Miss Bergman's child-bearing love affair rendered her a completely unfit mother, agreed, providing the settlement was satisfactory, to file for divorce on some other innocuous charge such as mental cruelty or desertion. But first came Pia's welfare.

Up to this time, the final decision on the matter is that until she is 14, Pia will remain with her father. Then she will choose with whom she prefers to remain. And Ingrid, after she settles her many affairs overseas, will journey to the United States for a reunion with her daughter.

It's been more than a year since they've been each other. It will be a reunion that will recall vividly to Ingrid's mind the events of that year, and in considering this, and in looking toward the future of herself and her daughter, it will be a heartbreaking reunion, indeed. THE END

(Continued from page 37) Nor do I believe that God can be blamed for all the tragedies in the world. The tragedy of war, for instance. If we each lived according to the rules of the Bible, if we loved our neighbor and did unto others as we would have others do unto us, how could war ever be? The responsibility is in our hands alone.

And our lives are in our hands. I'm not a fatalist. I don't go along with those who say, "When your number's up, it's up, and there's nothing you can do about it." I think God gave us a certain control over our own destiny. He showed us by rules and by countless examples how to live happily and well.

I believe in prayer. I was about twelve when I was baptized. Now I go to a Protestant church, the Hollywood Beverly Christian Church, though not as regularly as I should. I suppose it's true that a man can be religious without going to church, but there's an inspirational value in a place of worship. You want to meditate there, to do a little extra thinking. Like many Protestant denominations, my church has little hard and fast dogma but is based on a literal interpretation of the New Testament. I'm not sure that all my beliefs are the same as those it teaches, but going there helps me.

Unfortunately, my rate of prayer increases with my troubles. There hasn't been a serious crisis in my life when I haven't prayed, and when prayer hasn't helped me.

I remember when my father died about nine years ago. We'd always been very close. He ran a shoe store, but during the last years of his life he had to give it up because of ill health. Naturally, I was grief-stricken when he died. Yet my faith in some sort of immortality helped me find peace again.

Even in a minor crisis, faith can help a great deal. When I broke my right thigh during a baseball game, I faced the doctor's verdict without fear. I knew that a broken thigh is difficult to heal. Sometimes the leg becomes deformed or useless. But I was sure that this wouldn't happen to me.

"You'll be on crutches till Christmas," the doctor said.

"I heal more quickly than most people," I told him.

I was halfway through Storm Center, my new picture, by Christmas. I'd thrown away my crutches long before then.

True, I was flat on my back for several months, but I don't regard that as a real misfortune. I don't think God broke my leg, though it's possible that in the pattern of things I was supposed to slow down and do a little reviewing.

It would be silly to say that those months revolutionized my way of thinking. But when a man is hurt, he can either be very rebellious or else learn patience. I hope I've learned a little patience.

There was a wonderful line in Kings Row—"Some people grow up and some people just grow older."

I believe that God intends us all to grow up, and that there are times when all of us ought to take stock and see if we are growing up or if we are merely growing older.

Sometimes it takes a tragedy to help us grow up. I don't think we can always analyze why things happen, perhaps it's because we don't see all the results immediately. But there will usually come a day when we can understand the purpose behind some misfortunes.

The late Franklin D. Roosevelt, while still a young man, was stricken with polio. There must have been moments when he desperately asked, "Why did this happen to me?"

But today we often wonder: Would he have been as great a man if it hadn't happened? And we consider how the long years of suffering and therapy contributed to his character. The struggle he went through and the patience he learned brought out the greatness which might otherwise have lain dormant within him. For each of us is the sum total, in a way, of everything that happens in our daily lives.

Faith can even help a child overcome tragedy. Though it is a diabolic master, tragedy can teach a child maturity. Two newspaper stories which appeared recently are examples of this.

In Memphis, Tennessee, the doctors told ten-year-old Betty Marbury that she must lose her right hand because of a malignant lesion. Betty believed in prayer and wrote to a Memphis newspaper saying, "I want those who read this letter to pray that I may not lose my hand and that I may soon completely recover."

All over America people began to pray for Betty. Ministers said special prayers. And Betty prayed, too.

But when all the prayers had been said, the doctors told Betty that the malignant lesion hadn't healed, that their decision to amputate could not be reversed.

Betty managed a brave smile, and then quietly and sincerely said, "It must be God's will."

Another youngster, thirteen-year-old Ruth Miller, faced the decision of losing her leg or her life. "I'd rather die," Ruth said. But she changed her mind. Ruth had always loved the outdoors and all the sports that went with it, especially skating. "I guess I may not be able to go in for it again," she said. "But before the doctors operate I want to have one more good skate." She had that skate, and then she went to the hospital.

It was the simple faith of these two children that pulled them through trying ordeals. And through their separate tragedies they achieved a sudden, common maturity.

I can't hope to explain why one little girl had to lose her hand and another her leg. Only God knows. Perhaps some day, when all the results are in, both of them will understand why they had to make their sacrifices.

But in spite of these great misfortunes, and in spite of all the suffering we see around us every day, I think of the poet who wrote:

God's in His Heaven,
All's right with the world.

And I feel within me that this is indeed the truth. THE END

But to Peter Lawford, Peter Lawford is a middle-yeared sophisticate, taken with a wench who will not have him. Brooding and handsome, he is Ronald Colman in a 1950 Graustark. Foiled, for all his splendid features and manners, he is the victim of his own undying devotion, a man in love in vain. As far removed from McDowell as Lionel Barrymore from Keenan Wynn.

All this, however, didn't come about in a day. Certain diplomatic censors might object to the word as unbecoming when used in reporting the emotions of the daughter of our ambassador to the Court of St. James, but the passion in this matter was not at all one-sided.

Sharman Douglas has been widely photographed with a long succession of creatures an Iowa farmer would label nincompoops—none of them seeming to have a sound tooth or the ability to put his arm around a girl without the aid of a block and tackle.

In her defense, though, her intimates state this was due to some sort of diplomatic protocol on dating and that Sharman is as earthy as a corn stalk. So, put our Peter and their Sharman in our back yard without a policeman. And the result? To put it mildly, they fell in love. They couldn't take their eyes off one another. From the moment they met, it was Peter and Sharman and no one else.

During the courtship, a chum of Peter, being well aware of his spendthrift views on the fair sex (he thinks the supply is inexhaustible), decided to send him a kidding wire. He was halted at the telegraph counter by another crony who, having talked to Peter about his love, knew the true seriousness of the situation.

"Are you trying to tell me Lawford is really interested in this chick?" sneered the wag with the wire.

"My boy," said the friend, "I will stake my Jaguar and whatever is left of my life on it."

The first meeting between Peter Lawford and Sharman Douglas was casual enough. Peter was a friend of Elizabeth Firestone, the talented heiress to the tire and accessory fortune, who has been earning a living in Hollywood as a composer. When Sharman, her long-time friend, came to Hollywood for a quiet visit, Elizabeth invited, among other eligible young men, Peter Lawford, to come and meet her.

It was a small cocktail party. People sat about chatting idly and Peter and Sharman gravitated toward one another very naturally. Having been born and brought up in England, Peter found the ambassador's daughter a very interesting conversationalist, and, in a sense, a bearer of news from home. When the party broke up, he asked her if he might call her. She said yes—and he did. In an hour.

From the very first, Peter treated Sharman differently from the others. An expert at getting his name and picture in the papers and magazines, Peter forgot all his training and did his earnest best to keep his meetings with Sharman a secret. They went for long drives, met at the homes of friends and avoided the spotlight assiduously.

But they both liked to dance and go to gay places, so eventually they went to a night club. It was Ciro's, and it was quite a night.

Now the only Hollywood folk who spend more time in night clubs than Peter Lawford are waiters. Consequently, when Pete shows up in the door of a fancy saloon, the head waiter generally gets a kink in his back bowing him to a table, as befits a guy who has bought the joint several times. Peter likes it, is said to insist on it, and is reported to gauge his regard of the place by the number of bends the head waiter can do per yard.

On the occasion of his visit to Ciro's with Sharman Douglas, he expected handsprings, at least. Instead, he was nearly knocked down by the head waiter who clawed his anxious way past him. Glassy-eyed, Peter turned to see what manner of celebrity could bring about such a switch—and he found himself staring into the face of Eleanor Roosevelt on her first visit to a Hollywood night club.

However, the word of their arrival got around soon enough. One callous cameraman nudged a fellow who knew everybody and asked, "Who's the dish with Lawford?"

"A kid by the name of Sharman Douglas," whispered the informant. "New in town."

"Sharman Douglas?" said the photog. "SHARMAN DOUGLAS!"

In the next half hour every flash bulb on the Sunset Strip had been popped and every sheet of film exposed. Peter, usually pretty sure of himself before a normal barrage of this kind, was trembling like a farm boy on his first big date. He never did get hold of himself, and they had to leave early. Generally very gracious with the fans surrounding the entrance to the club, this night he put his head down, took a firm hold on Miss Douglas' arm and dashed through the crowd to his car like an embarrassed murderer.

Back to the quiet life they went after that, but by now the cameramen and reporters were dogging their footsteps at every turn. They tried a night club once more, this time Mocambo, with Robert Walker and Elizabeth Firestone along, but the pressure was too much and they abandoned the project very early.

By this time love had moved into the lives of Peter and Sharman and marriage was a distinct possibility. That put a different complexion on the entire matter. While Sharman had not exactly lived in a glass house—there were such instances as her being photographed dancing the can-can with Princess Margaret of Britain—the family didn't want anybody throwing stones. And marriage to a film actor usually involves a rock fight of one form or another.

Word is said to have come from Papa Douglas that there was entirely too much publicity connected with his daughter's visit to Hollywood. Although Western Union's files are as sacred as the mails, a ransacking at night would probably disclose a message to Sharman going something like this:

"What's going on out there? What's all this nonsense in the newspapers? Have you gone mad? Come home immediately!"

Lest anyone get the impression that all this was a little unfair to Peter Lawford, let us state quite frankly that it was. While his conduct in any other town might have been less than exemplary (in regard to switching from one girl to another, that is), in Hollywood it was almost standard. It is true that Peter did a little better at it than almost any other star since Elmo Lincoln, but it was fair and, if you say it fast, innocent fun.

Almost before Peter Lawford knew what feminine beauty was he was after it. It seemed to come as naturally to him as a love of crackers to a parrot. He was no more than a bud on the vine of manhood before he was asking fabulously beautiful screen stars for dates. It is said that in those early years the girl had to pay the checks, as Peter's boyish pocket money allowance made no provision for the glamorous type of entertainment they had become accustomed to.

Young as he was, though, Peter seemed innately afraid of matrimony. Most of the young ladies he escorted about until he met Sharman Douglas were carrying torches, and Peter earned the reputation of being a nice boy who had a wide, dry shoulder on which a girl could cry. This wasn't exactly true. It is known now that Peter has more than a shoulder, and several of the kids he is credited with comforting are said to have discovered a number of very charming reasons why they could live without the husband or boy friend they had just dumped.

When Rita Hayworth left Orson Welles, for instance, it was Friendly Pete, the grass widow's true delight, who began taking her out. And before anyone knew what had happened, Rita was looking at the boy in public as though he were something she'd like to win for keeps. Peter admitted to being mildly in love, but it is to be noted that when the talk got real big he lost the Hayworth phone number.

man to be seen in public with her. It was never publicly announced that there might be something serious there, but soon he stopped calling her house, too.

Nora Eddington Flynn Haymes was another who fell for the smooth talk. Peter was her first date when she left Errol Flynn, and they were seen together a good deal more than the papers ever acknowledged. Her meeting with Dick Haymes and their resultant marriage broke that up.

There is a list of them a foot long. Gloria De Haven, Janet Leigh, Gloria McLean, Lana Turner are just a few of the Hollywood girls who ran to Peter as soon as their loves flew out the window. And consoling, while pitching, became something of a specialty with Peter. Our only interest in all this is to prove that Peter has avoided love and marriage with an uncanny regularity that must give it the label of deliberate intent. In other words, until Sharman Douglas, he was a hit-and-run artist in high gear.

As a further measure of understanding, let's look at Peter's other social activities. In order to preserve his identity as a single man too busy for serious obligations of his own, he has consistently attached himself to some happily married couple (at the time) and become a sort of brother.

There was Mr. and Mrs. Keenan Wynn (now she is Mrs. Van Johnson). They seldom went anywhere without Peter tagging along. Mr. and Mrs. Jackie Cooper. They had as much privacy as a pair of squirrels. Pete was with them constantly. And, for a long time, Mr. and Mrs. Frank Sinatra. Then, the Martin and Lewis comedy team and their wives. Peter even went on tour with them and danced in blackface nightly in their night club act for nothing. There were people who said this was all hero worship, but the insiders say it was his constant need of a haven from designing women that made him latch on to these families.

It was no wonder then, with a background like this, that the Douglas family shuddered slightly when they learned via the newspapers that their daughter was seen so much in the company of this actor.

Oh, yes, in certain smug circles actors are still considered characterless children of vice and depravity. And any daughter of a good family who attaches herself legally to one of these creatures can expect, at best, only pity from the family proper.

Again, it must be said in Peter Lawford's favor that he is not quite the type, genealogically speaking, of his compatriots. His father, formerly a distinguished general in the British army, is titled Sir Sidney Lawford and his mother, Lady Lawford. They are definitely the aristocratic type, too, unlike the usual mother and dad of the film stars who are as democratic-looking as apple pie. As a matter of fact, they are so aristocratic-appearing that another MGM actor, meeting them for the first time, was moved to comment, "They look as though he got them from casting."

But, sadly, the Douglas clan was either unaware of Peter's grand background or chose to ignore it, either attitude having the same effect. "Sharman, keep that actor out of our family."

Young love will go to any extreme to express itself fully. What may appear trivial to one man may be of the utmost importance to another. To Peter Lawford, his social life is next to his screen life, and it takes a serious upset to disturb his routine. Between pictures, he flies about the country to the famous society resorts and hob-nobs with the class he likes best. Before meeting Sharman Douglas, his entire winter tour had been planned and invitations accepted. He was to go to Palm Beach for the season there, then on to Long Island for a summer holiday.

Sharman had different plans. She was to stay in Hollywood for a month or so, then to the Douglas ranch at Tucson, and later to New York for a whirl through Gotham gay spots before leaving with her family for England where Pop worked.

Sharman Douglas (with her mother) was the first to congratulate dad, Lewis Douglas, after he received an honorary degree from the University of London. He's the U. S. ambassador to England.

When she went to Arizona, he got himself an invitation and spent a month there. Then he went to New York and, instead of Long Island, he bunked at the Waldorf to be closer to Miss Douglas.

During this, which might be called the adhesive tape period of the romance, Peter suffered the agonies of the damned. Sincere love had touched him and he didn't know quite how to cope with it. While the Douglases were extremely friendly, he knew that he wasn't entirely accepted and it frightened him.

There was talk, too, that Peter was merely doing a little front porch work, social climbing, trying to steal the keys to St. James Palace. This may have been right in a way, because Peter is admittedly class conscious. As a matter of fact, it has been reported that his former co-star, Lassie, developed the same character after working with him and would have nothing to do with any breed but his own.

But to give Peter his just due, he was sincerely and deeply in love. To the extent that, although he is notoriously thrifty, he bought an expensive bracelet for his love. Hollywood demanded documentary proof before they would believe it.

Peter made his biggest pitch for Sharman in Arizona, where he began to assume the attitude of a beaten man. There were two factions in Arizona. One, faintly glowing in the reflection of a star of Peter's magnitude, contended that he was a lad of fine breeding and first rate charm—and any union between him and Sharman would be acceptable to them. The other side contended that Sharman Douglas marrying a movie star was the most ridiculous thing they could possibly think of, a mortal wound to tradition.

No longer a happy warrior, Peter fought for all he was worth. When Sharman went to New York, he tagged along and dolefully continued his advances. He was getting nowhere fast, but Sharman loved it. Getting nowhere, that is, as a prospective husband. As a boy to offer love and, maybe. be a little in love with, he was wonderful.

The day Sharman Douglas flew to England was a sad one for Peter Lawford. No matter what the MGM press agents say, he took it hard. Some sources, close to the true picture, said Sharman wanted to stay, wanted to marry Peter and forget all she was destined to go back to. Others said no. The people who should know, however, say that Father Douglas put his foot down and told his daughter she would have to return to London with the family for at least a trial period of separation.

As in all matters of this kind, only the persons closely involved can know the real truth—and in this case they will not talk. It's interesting to note, however, that Peter flew to London, at the invitation of Sharman's parents, to spend Easter with her.

Peter, it must be concluded, is in love with Sharman—and in love for the very first time. Sharman Douglas is either terribly infatuated with Peter, or very deeply in love, too. Time and circumstance may take their toll, but it is a considered opinion that within a year these two young people will marry. It is also a certainty that if this does take place, Peter will be welcomed whole-heartedly by her family.

There are still those skeptics who hold to the belief that Peter now and always will be a hit-and-run lover; that he will forget Sharman eventually and return to his nomadic quest for kicks, pretty faces and trim figures. For the eventual triumph of true love, and in the sincere hope that Peter will find himself and finally decide he's Ronald Colman, we hope they are wrong. THE END

Nicky's answer is low but clear. "I will."

"Elizabeth, wilt thou take Conrad, here present, for thy lawful husband?"

Elizabeth looks at the young man who has pledged her his life. Her eyes are soft as twilight. A smile flickers across her face. "I will," she says.

Nicky places his right hand on Elizabeth's and repeats these words after Father Concannon: "I, Conrad Nicholson, take thee, Elizabeth Rosemond, for my lawful wife, to have and to hold, from this day forward, for better, for worse, for richer, for poorer, in sickness and in health, until death do us part."

Elizabeth answers in kind, and then Father Concannon says, "By the authority committed to me, I pronounce you united in the bonds of matrimony." Nicky slips a diamond marriage band on the third finger of his bride's left hand, saying after the priest, "With this ring I thee wed, and I plight unto thee my troth."

Mr. Conrad Nicholson Hilton, Jr., had the whole thing planned half a year ago. A few short weeks after he'd met Elizabeth he knew that no one else would do. He went so far as to tell his father, Conrad, who's an old hand at romance, having been married twice himself.

"Dad," Nicky said, "she's lovely, she's beautiful, she's gorgeous."

"Elizabeth Taylor?"

"Yes."

"You get that Taylor girl, son," said his father, "and I'll give you the finest three-month honeymoon in Europe any couple ever had."

Nicky didn't rest until he got that girl. He went about it intelligently. He knew Elizabeth liked beautiful trinkets, so last Christmas he dropped in on George Headley, the famous jeweler, at the Bel Air Hotel.

"Show me something nice," Nicky said to Mr. Headley.

"Blonde or brunette?" asked Mr. Headley.

"Diamonds," said Nicky.

Mr. Headley set a black velvet pad on the showcase, and on the pad he placed a pair of platinum earrings, each one composed of five enormous pearls and two diamonds.

"How much?" asked Nicky. "No. Don't tell me. I'll take them."

But Mr. Headley did tell him, and even so, Nicky took them. And Elizabeth took them.

I SAW IT HAPPEN

The summer Bob Hope rode in the Minneapolis Aquatennial parade it was terrifically hot and people had been standing for hours to view the parade. Finally Bob Hope rode by and as he passed a little boy about five years old went out into the street and gave him a popsicle. Bob said thanks and rode along, licking the popsicle and waving.

Ellie Kruger

Nicky knew that Elizabeth didn't like nightclubs, especially since the press had raked her over the coals for hearing Vic Damone sing in one of them. He didn't take her to nightclubs.

Sometimes they went over to his brother Barron's house.

"My brother's married, you know," he'd tell her.

"I know," she'd say.

"He has two children," Nicky'd go on. "They get along fine."

"Who does?"

"All of them. Funny thing. Barron's younger than I am, a year and a half—he's only 22."

"So?"

"So he's married. He has two children."

"Yes, you told me."

Barron and his wife, Marilyn, helped Nicky's project along. First place, they looked happy together. Second place, they told Elizabeth they were happy together. But they didn't have to tell her.

In no time at all, Nicky and Elizabeth were talking about that honeymoon. Neither of them is a stranger to Europe. Elizabeth was born in England, 18 years ago, at Number 8, Wildwood Road. Her father ran an art shop on London's Old Bond Street. And Nicky not only toured England, France, and Italy with his father two years ago, but he also put in time at a hotel management school in Lausanne, Switzerland.

Nicky knows the hotel business from the cellar up. When he was a young boy, his father gave him odd jobs in the various Hilton hotels, and he learned the angles.

Shortly after the honeymooners get home, Nicky hopes to be running a hotel in Los Angeles.

It will be a Hilton Hotel, of course, but it'll be owned and operated by Nicky himself. He has a proud and independent nature, and wants to keep it that way.

Since Elizabeth's also in the hotel business now, by marriage, she's getting more and more hotel-minded. When she was in New York putting the finishing touches on her trousseau, she learned that her agent, Jules Goldstone, had registered at the Sherry-Netherland. She rushed to the phone and called him. "What do you mean by stopping at the Sherry-Netherland?" she said. "That's not a Hilton hotel. Why aren't you staying at the Waldorf? That's our hotel."

Goldstone moved to the Waldorf fast.

Elizabeth and Nicky will probably move into the Bel Air Hotel after their honeymoon. (It doesn't belong to the Hiltons, but they'll get a good rate.) Then they'll look for a home of their own.

For a time there was talk of their living in the penthouse at the Sunset Towers, but that place is owned by the Kirkeby hotel chain, Hilton's rivals, and the suite rents for $600 a month. Nicky doesn't plan on paying $600 a month to rivals.

Among other gossip circulated around is that Nicky doesn't know what he's getting into.

"Being married to Elizabeth Taylor," cracked one columnist, "is like being married to a public utility."

But Nicky Hilton knew what it would be like long before he proposed, long before he gave her the four carat diamond engagement ring (insured at $10,000).

He lived in Bel-Air for years, attended Loyola University at Los Angeles, mingled with all sorts of movie celebrities, but Nicky never suffered from stars-in-the-eyes. He knew then, and knows now what marriage to a screen star means.

He realizes that no matter what he accomplishes in life, unless, of course, he will constantly overshadow him, because his wife is in a business which exists only by approval of the entire public.

Nicky knows that people will refer to him not as Nick Hilton but as "Elizabeth Taylor's husband." But that won't stop him from working his way to the top in the hotel business.

He knows, too, that Elizabeth will give up her career if it endangers their marriage. At this moment, he can't see any reason why it should. But Elizabeth herself has said, "I'll give up my acting if it interferes with our happiness."

Elizabeth has worked before the cameras ever since she was a youngster. She's never worked at marriage, and she's determined to give it everything she's got.

Both she and Nicky want children, and when these come, they'll be raised in the Catholic faith, as Elizabeth has promised. (In order for her to get married in the Church of the Good Shepherd, Elizabeth had to take six weeks of instruction from a Catholic priest. Elizabeth's a Christian Scientist, but no wedding ceremonies are held in her church.)

No one realizes how bitterly Elizabeth felt about the publicity which described her as a slinky siren who loved to break men's hearts. "I'm not anything of the sort," she's said again and again. "Why do they print such things?"

Mrs. Gladys Culverhouse, who took care of the Taylors when they lived in England, and now runs their house, has known Elizabeth since birth.

"She's going to make a wonderful wife," Mrs. Culverhouse has told reporters. "Elizabeth's the kind of intelligent girl who's always known what she wanted. The papers in America have made her out to be a girl who lives a fast life, but that's ridiculous. She's no such person.

"Naturally, she's gone out with boys like Mr. Davis and Mr. Pawley and Mr. Damone. But what girl hasn't? I mean, gone with boys.

"When she started going with Mr. Hilton, she took an immediate liking to him.

"Now she's proud of him, too. She respects him. He feels the same about her. That's why this will be the first and last marriage for both of them."

Certainly, if blessings have the power, and wishes do come true, Mr. and Mrs. Nicky Hilton, as of May 6th, 1950, will be having and holding each other for a long, long time. THE END

(Continued from page 28) were little, I came home on Saturday and in between cleaning and washing and ironing and hoeing out the house in general, I'd whip up a good old stew or hash, or even chili con carne if there wasn't anything else in the cupboard. I put the food in front of them on a well-nicked table and the only music they had was the din of the kids in the street playing baseball. I didn't have time to tell them stories, and if they didn't help themselves they were out of luck. With the result that they did, and fast. And today both of them have the constitution of an ox.

"Things have changed since you were a girl, mother," Betty tells me. "I have the children on a definite routine because I believe it will give them added security."

All I have to say is that if the kids don't learn to eat in a hurry they'll be out of luck at the dinner table with their mother. Betty eats as though the house were on fire, ringing a bell every five minutes for a change of course, and if you don't keep up with her you have the unfortunate experience of having a full plate removed from under your nose.

And if I may be indelicate enough to mention the diaper department, there wasn't nearly the rapid turnover in the old days that there is now.

Betty is scared to death that the kids will get sick or that something will happen to them, and I keep telling her to relax, that she grew up against odds that are something awful when you compare them to Lindsay and Candy. You can bet that Miss Hutton and I have had some eighty-cent phone conversations on the subject of the children, but Betty takes my raving rather well.

In fact, that's the secret of our success as a mother and daughter. We can shout at each other instead of at the world, and underneath it all there's something deep and lasting that a million spats can't touch.

As I said before, I'm not a mushy type of woman. If anybody wanted to find out if I was proud of Betty, they'd have to ask me, and even then I'd laugh it off. What I feel is inside, and is going to stay there. I guess I have a complex about being her mother. I am afraid that if I admit she's my daughter it sounds like bragging. But she's my girl, all right.

Back in 1921, though, I wanted a boy. I already had Marion, with blonde hair and blue eyes, and she was everything a girl should be. So I said to myself, "That's that. Now I'll have a boy."

I almost threw a pitcher at the doctor when he told me I had another daughter. There he stood, the big hulk, with five sons of his own, telling me to be happy. I started to mutter, but he ignored me, and smiled. "My wife and I always wanted girls," he said. "But we wouldn't trade any one of the boys. You'll see. You'll feel the same way about this girl."

And I guess he was right.

As it turned out, it seemed that Betty was always trying to make it up to me. Not that I cared after the first few minutes—it goes without saying that any mother accepts and loves every baby she has—but Betty from the beginning was more demonstrative than Marion. She was forever coming to me to be kissed, and to this day she'll pile into my lap and give me a hug that all but dislocates my neck. I think it's possible, too, that Betty showed her affection as a subconscious defense against Marion's good looks. Marion was always the pretty one, and people always seemed eager to tell that to Betty who had straight hair and no glamor. Of course, I was enraged every time anyone made a comment like that, but there wasn't much I could do about other people's tongues.

Betty always used to make a particular effort to please me. I remember the time the school was having a bazaar. The children were assigned various tasks and the parents were invited as spectators. On my arrival I was dumbfounded to learn that Betty was in the sewing room. There was little Betty loathed more than sewing. To this day she doesn't know a needle from an ice-pick.

Anyway, I walked into the sewing room and as soon as Betty spotted me her foot went down on the treadle of the sewing machine. There wasn't a machine in that room going anywhere near as fast as Betty's. She saw to that; she wasn't going to let me down. And she seemed happily oblivious of the fact that the needle wasn't threaded.

School for Betty was an open and shut case. On a Monday morning her mind would open and accept all the knowledge there was to absorb. By Monday afternoon her mind would close on it like a steel trap and nothing more would get in till Tuesday.

It's a facility she's had all her life; to learn quickly and to quickly put her mind in order so that she can learn something new. I suppose it contributes to what people today term her "bounce." She can always come to the surface smiling, successful and unhurt.

Probably the world's most confirmed tomboy, she usually played such violent games I always lived in fear of broken bones. But despite years of roughhouse, her only scar came when she was pushed off a jetty and cut her face.

It was almost as though she knew I couldn't afford doctor bills, and was determined not to be an expense. Those were lean days. I was divorced from the children's father, and worked for our living in an automobile plant in Detroit. Out of necessity, the girls learned to keep house and to cook (Marion learned to sew), and it was a hard life for them. Perhaps it would have been disastrous if the three of us hadn't been blessed with a sense of humor. We could always laugh off our troubles, and what is even more important, we thrilled in anticipation when we wanted something, and we knew that if we saved long and hard enough, we'd have it.

I was with Betty just this last Christmas, and after breakfast I watched her children opening their gifts. They sat at the foot of a tree big enough to fit into Sequoia National Park, and you couldn't see the children for the packages around them. I've never seen such beautiful toys. Unwrapping took hours, and after a while the children's eyes began to look a little glazed.

For some time I'd been thinking my own thoughts, thoughts a little on the gloomy side. Then Betty looked up at me from where she sat by the children's side. There was sadness in her face.

"Mom," she said. "Mom, they're not having the fun we used to have. I'm afraid they're missing something."

I knew what she meant. Back in Detroit, I'd start working at nights on the old toys along about September. By Christmas I'd had them repaired and painted with new clothes made for the dolls. And my girls were more thrilled with the made over stuff than they would have been with one (or six) of these modern dolls that talk and cry and eat and change the status of their diapers.

Even when they were in their teens and putting on a show at the Palace, I'd bring little surprises to the theater, things like jigsaw puzzles to entertain them between acts, and they made such a fuss you'd have thought I'd brought them parts of a Cadillac to fit together.

Betty and Marion seldom asked me for anything when they were little. Maybe because they knew I'd do anything in the world for them that was possible, and the minute somebody would trust me for fifty cents until next payday, I'd go into debt to satisfy their needs. I did manage a series of dancing lessons for each of them, which they considered the height of luxury. Marion finished the course knowing a great deal, Betty came out of it knowing nothing. Before the lessons were started she had perfected her own dance steps, and held on to them like grim death.

Already she had entered every dance contest in the neighborhood. At that time there was a craze for some six-cylinder step that they danced to "White Heat" and melodies of that ilk. To me it was more like an endurance contest, but dancing like this was right up Betty's alley. Although I didn't realize it at the time, show business was leading us a chase.

I never had to worry about Betty, young as she was, when she was singing and dancing in those days. She was too career-conscious to even think about boys, and it had been the same way in school. She'd been so intent on learning the lessons for the day that no impression was made on her by the occasional moon-eyed youngsters who followed her around. And the boy who swiped tin whistles and watches from Woolworth's to gain her favor finally realized that in his case, too, crime didn't pay.

When Betty was fourteen, she visited friends of mine who lived in Lansing, Michigan, and it was then that show business caught up with us. Lansing had a lake, and at the lake was a band, and Betty wanted to sing with a band ever since I could remember. She was offered a job while there, and made up her own mind about taking it. It's always been that way. Betty had lined up her career from the first, and I've always kept my nose out of it.

Many times, though, I've sat in on business conferences, but you couldn't open my mouth at those times with a crowbar, and my silence has paid off for Betty because it was appreciated by the men involved. Of course they never knew what I said afterward, when Betty and I were alone, but even that advice was given only

HOW TIME FLIES!

■ On the set of Road To Singapore Dorothy Lamour's been all hands and needles between every scene. Dottie's just taken up knitting and admits that the object on which she's lavishing all her spare time is a man's sweater. She's even having lunch served on the set so no time will be lost on her knitting and unraveling. But to date no one has been able to find out for whom the sweater is intended. "Just a boyfriend," says Dottie. Since the Lamour boyfriends are legion, that clue was considered hopeless.—March, 1940, Modern Screen upon request. I've hewed pretty much to that line in everything with Betty. Well, almost everything. I suppose I'll keep up a running debate with her about the children until they themselves call it off.

But I'm always there when she wants me. And right now she's so wound up with her career (she's just finished Annie Get Your Gun, and she's working on Let's Dance) and her daughters that she often calls on me to help her out at home. Betty has dropped all domestic duties with the exception of cooking, but other than that she's a total loss. I doubt if she knows where the brooms are kept. So I lend my support by hiring and training the help, getting things repaired, overseeing in general. Our taste is so identical that I can even buy clothes for her. Once in a while I make a mistake. Like that Kelly green outfit. She'd been wearing dark and somber clothes for so long that one day I couldn't resist plugging a bright green suit. To please me she bought it, but I found out later that she gave it away.

Betty is forever giving things away. Almost every item in my apartment has been a gift from her, and her generosity doesn't stop with material things. She gives of her self and her time to anyone she likes. She'll go on giving until she drops.

If I may be allowed one bit of bragging, I'd like to say that my biggest pride in Betty Hutton as a person is that she doesn't realize her importance as a star. Instead of pushing people around with her position in the industry (as some others do), she's more inclined to take a back seat and chum with the little guys. She knows what it means to be one. I remember the time she was on location for a picture where they had a table for the executives and the actors, and another set up for the crew. Day after day Betty ate lunch with the grips until finally the director cornered her and said, "When are you going to start acting like a star?" Betty blew up like an atom bomb and the smoke didn't clear away for days. I'm proud to say she'll never change from being a down-to-earth person.

I think a good example of her honesty and forthrightness was the statement she made when she and Ted split up for the first time last year. "It's my fault," Betty said simply. That statement not only shattered precedents in Hollywood comments but it showed her to be a true gentlewoman.

Betty has mellowed a great deal since her children were born. She has a greater capacity for tolerance now, especially toward me, because she realizes what it means to be a mother.

Sometimes when I have nothing to do I sit and wonder about how it will be thirty years or so from now. Maybe Candy and Lindsay will have children of their own, and Betty will be going slightly mad over their new-fangled ideas about bringing them up. Maybe Betty and I will be sitting on a porch somewhere fitting jigsaw puzzles together and arguing. But with all the arguments both of us will have, there'll be much laughter, there'll be much love.

I'd better stop now while I'm ahead, or I'll start talking like a sentimental fool.

"In a few days, I phoned Janet at the Alpha Theta Tau house and asked her for a date. The first date we had was on a Sunday. It was my birthday, and it was only an afternoon date. We went into Stockton and had some lunch, and I thought we were going to spend the whole day together, but she was awfully popular, even back then, and she told me she had a date for the evening. But I kept after her."

And because Stan Reames was a tall, personable chap, and he had a "pop" music band at the College, and the girls went for him, too—Janet became interested, and it wasn't very long before the pair was classified as "steady."

A year later, Stan Reames proposed marriage, and it was then that Janet was faced with the most momentous problem of her young life. Should she tell him about Danny and the foolish, impetuous elopement to Reno? If she told him, would it make any difference? Would it destroy or affect their love? Would it cloud their marriage?

These were soul-searing questions for an 18-year-old girl. These were the questions she knew one day she would have to face, and now that day was upon her.

Luckily, fate intervened. A letter from Danny arrived one day, and Janet placed it in a text book. The following day, Stan was carrying her books to class when the letter slipped out. He bent down and picked it up. When he saw the return name on the envelope, he asked her, "Who's this guy who's writing to you?"

Janet took his arm and looked into his eyes. "Stan," she said, "I want to tell you something." And then as quickly as possible, she told him everything.

Stan was wonderful. "Gee, honey," he said. "It doesn't make any difference. You were only a kid."

So they were married, and they spent their first honeymoon night in Monterey, and for ten days they took a motoring trip along the Coast, and then went back to Stockton.

Stan took his band and began beating the bushes for "play-dates," and Janet went up after a while to visit her parents who were working at the Sugar Bowl Ski Lodge in Soda Springs.

There is little point here in repeating the story of Janet's being discovered. You all know how Norma Shearer, leafing through an album one day up at the lodge, came across a picture of an extremely photogenic young girl dressed in ski clothes. "This girl is absolutely fascinating," Norma said. "She should be in pictures."

A few months later, Jeanette Morrison was signed by MGM to play the role of Lissy Anne in The Romance of Rosy Ridge.

Oddly enough, when Janet first reported to work at MGM in 1946, at a take-home pay of $43.80—the general impression she created was one of complete innocence. "She is the most naïve thing," one director said, "I've ever seen."

When the director was told that this young ingenue was currently married to a band-leader named Stanley Reames, he couldn't believe it. "If that's true," he said, "she's going to become one of the greatest actresses we've ever had."

That prophecy will probably be fulfilled, because Janet, in four years, has made more films (the count now is 12) than any other comparable actress in Hollywood. There is hardly a Metro picture in which she doesn't star, and when she's not working on her home lot, Howard Hughes borrows her for RKO. In four years her salary has boomed from $50 to $750 a week, and if her agent thought it expedient, he probably could get a new contract for her at virtually any reasonable figure, because next to Lana Turner and Elizabeth Taylor —Janet is just about the best box-office draw MGM owns.

As frequently happens in Hollywood, Janet's career and marriage didn't blend. As things went well with Janet, they went poorly with Stan. He had to disband his orchestra and take a job with the Bank of America. Gradually, these two youngsters began to grow apart. Janet was definitely joining the big time. She was moving fast in fast circles. She was on the way up. Stan was moving slowly, trying to find a niche for himself in a city already too crowded by thousands of returning servicemen.

the little apartment she and her husband had rented. She went to live with her parents who had come down from Sugar Bowl Lodge. She asked for a trial-separation. It lasted all of three days. On the fourth day, Janet, ever frank and honest, came to Stan and said, "I don't think we can make a go of it any longer. I'd like a divorce."

Stan bowed his head. "Anything you want," he said.

Janet got her divorce and her freedom, but in a short while she fell in love with Arthur Loew, Jr., whose father runs the theater chain bearing that name.

"Yes," she admits, "I know I'm in love. But we're not engaged. We're not planning to marry soon, and in fact, we may never marry at all."

Janet's attitude is understandable. She took the wrong step twice; she wants the third attempt to be right and final; she wants her next husband to have all the qualities the other two didn't.

Arthur certainly is more financially able than his predecessors. He's heir to a large fortune; he's learning the motion picture business as a producer's assistant. He is destined to inherit his father's mantle, and if Janet marries him, she will certainly know a luxury she has never experienced before. (The Loews are reputed to be worth some fifteen millions.)

"What I like best about Arthur," one girl who knows him confided recently, "is that he's a very thoughtful and considerate guy. You know what he's done? He's started a charm bracelet for Janet. Every time she's in a picture, he adds a charm which represents the theme of the film. For example, when Janet was in Jet Pilot, he put a little jet plane on the bracelet. When she was in Act of Violence, he added a gun. For Red Danube it was a little ballet dancer, and so on down the line. Girls appreciate gifts like that, because it shows a guy is really interested in you and your career."

As a matter of fact, most of the girls in Hollywood think Janet is out of her mind for not marrying Arthur Loew, Jr. quicker than she can say, "I do."

"He has everything," a starlet once pointed out, "and if I ever went with him, I think I'd propose in five minutes."

What this starlet and the others don't realize is that when a girl has twice submitted to the temptation of matrimony and has twice been hurt, she moves slowly and with much care before she takes the third and what she hopes will be the final plunge.

THE END

I SAW IT HAPPEN

One day I was hurrying along downtown since we were trying to get to see Louis Jourdan and other stars who were appearing in St Louis. I scarcely noticed the good-looking young man who was walking next to me even though his face seemed familiar. I did notice, though, that he crossed the street at the same time I did. I felt I had really missed the boat when a friend rushed up to me quite breathlessly, saying, "I never ran so fast when I saw you walking down the street with Louis Jourdan."

There wasn't much more to be said.

Shortly after the engagement was announced, and the date set, Mrs. Taylor and Elizabeth and Nicky went to New York to see plays and be given parties. Mr. Taylor was left holding his head.

Mr. Taylor is a reserved and quiet man. He has his own work, and his own life, and the only thing he knows about Elizabeth's career is that it's better handled by a woman—his wife. His part in the wedding, though, was a different matter.

A day after the women and Nicky had gone, 400 engraved invitations to the reception were delivered into Mr. Taylor's hands. Faced with the prospect of licking 400 stamps, he went around to the Beverly Hills Hotel just to make sure it would still be there at reception time.

"Will everything be in order?" Mr. Taylor asked the manager.

The manager sniffed his carnation. "Perhaps we can have the reception another time?" he asked politely.

"Another time?" said Mr. Taylor. "Another time?"

The manager bowed and shrugged his shoulders. "It is impossible," he explained. "Another party has made reservations many months ago."

Mr. Taylor rushed over to the Bel-Air Country Club to make new arrangements.

"You wish hors d'ouevres?" asked the manager.

"Naturally," said Mr. Taylor.

"Cold or hot?"

"Does it matter?"

"Hot hors d'oeuvres are more expensive."

"Cold hors d'oeuvres," said Mr. Taylor.

The manager wrinkled up his nose. "Cold smoked salmon?" he said. "At a wedding reception?"

"All right," said Mr. Taylor. "Hot. Make everything hot."

"Perhaps we should wait," suggested the manager, "until the lady returns—the mother of the bride. Because no matter what arrangements the father makes, when the lady comes there are changes."

"I said hot," said Mr. Taylor. "I won't have cold fish at my daughter's wedding reception."

Elizabeth called him long distance that night. "We're having such a wonderful time," she said. "I'm so excited."

"Would you like cold salmon," he said, "or hot frankfurters?"

"What?"

"Never mind, dear," he said. "I've already decided."

Mr. Taylor manfully kept his problems to himself, because he approved of Nicky Hilton, and he wanted to do his best for him. Mr. Taylor liked Nicky the first time he saw him. That was the evening he'd come to take Elizabeth to a party and had been introduced to the family.

"Seems older than his age," said Mr. Taylor to his wife, after they'd gone. "Seems as if he knows what he wants."

"I have a feeling about him," said Mrs. Taylor. "You know, intuitive. I think we'll be seeing a good deal of him."

The next time he saw Nicky, Mr. Taylor was even more impressed. They all had dinner one night at one of the Hilton hotels. An older man came up to Nick to confer on a point of management. Nicky gracefully excused himself from his girl and her family, and attended to his job. "He has a good head for business," Mr. Taylor said. "I like that boy."

For a while, though, the Taylors heard him more than they saw him. Whenever they picked up the phone Nick was on it. "May I speak to Liz?" he'd say, every evening between six and seven. The way Liz floated to the phone, and hung on to it, and then drifted off in a kind of trance told the Taylors more than explanations could.

She was acting like a young girl in love—which is exactly what she was. She isn't the sort of sophisticate many people imagine. Actually, Nick is only the second man in her life. For an 18-year-old movie star time moves quickly, and it's surprising that a girl as beautiful and famous as Liz has been engaged only twice.

Glenn Davis was her first big crush. But they were never engaged. No ring; no announcement; only a gold football that meant little more to her than a sentimental trinket.

There were plenty of dates, of course. Then there was Bill Pawley. After that, people talked about her and Vic Damone and Monty Clift. They didn't mean a thing, but when Liz goes out, the newspapers go to town.

This upsets Elizabeth and her mother and father. "If Liz ever retires," her father says, "it'll be because she can't bear the invasion of her privacy. She knows the value of publicity, but she's human, and a human being needs a private life, a room without a spotlight."

Nick understood this when he dated her. He knew how to evade publicity hounds, but he also knew that a certain amount of notoriety was unavoidable. And he knew how to handle Elizabeth.

When he came to dinner there were never any disagreements between them. Liz and Nick liked the same things, and what Nick liked and Liz didn't, she learned to like. They both enjoy parties and people. They both work hard at their separate careers. They both love to go horseback riding. At the beginning, Nick played golf and Elizabeth couldn't. Then suddenly she started asking her father about mashie shots and spoons and sand traps, and started practicing drives in the living room.

"This is getting serious," thought Mr. Taylor. "Only something had better happen before the rug gives out."

What happened was Nick invited Elizabeth to meet his father. Then the Taylors were invited to meet his father. Then they planned the wedding for the sixth of May.

"I want a big wedding," said Liz. "A tremendous wedding, with a white satin gown and six bridesmaids."

"Don't you think," said Mr. Taylor, "that it would be nice and romantic to do what Mother and I did—get a couple of friends together, and a license, and find a small church?"

"I don't know," said Elizabeth. "That doesn't sound binding, somehow."

"Not binding!" said her mother. "Why, Elizabeth."

"I mean, this is the only wedding I'm going to have, and I want it to be big."

"All right," said Mr. Taylor. "It's settled. If it'll make you happy, the wedding will be as big as my bankroll."

Mr. Taylor thought he'd have six months to gather his resources, because he'd asked Elizabeth to put off announcing her engagement till then. One day, though, Elizabeth came to him and said, "I'm afraid you'll have to release me from my promise."

"Why?" asked her parent.

"It's too hard," said Elizabeth, "being in love with Nick, and not being able to spend all my free time with him just because I have to keep the columnists guessing. And I don't think it's fair to Nick for me to spend time with other boys."

So the Taylors announced Liz's engagement, and Mr. Taylor began his struggle with the caterers.

"I keep thinking of Spencer Tracy," he told Liz one night. (At that time she was playing Spencer's daughter in Father of the Bride.) "All he has to do is stand up there and act the part I'm living. And he gets paid for it."

But Mr. Taylor was happy. The important things were working out well. He knew he'd done a good job on Elizabeth all these years. "When the kids used to come out to the beach house," he'll tell you, "and have their big Sunday picnics, Elizabeth wasn't some strange, glamorous freak just because she worked in pictures; she was just like the rest of them—and that's how it should be."

Mr. Taylor gave Elizabeth the kind of wedding she wanted, but he was firm on the subject of press photographers. No press photographers were at the reception. "That reception's important to Elizabeth. That belongs to her and Nick and their friends," he said. "That's something she doesn't have to share because of her career."

He's happy, too, about Nicky. "Liz wanted a husband who liked the things she likes and who understood her problems—as her mother and I have always tried to do—and now she has Nick."

I SAW IT HAPPEN

While spending the day shopping in Fort Walton, my sister and I stopped to look at a movie poster advertising a movie with Gregory Peck. My sister exclaimed, "Isn't he darling?" I laughed, but a young man stepped out of the crowd and said, "Oh, no, he's actually as ugly as sin." To everyone's astonishment, it turned out to be Gregory Peck who was there on location for 12 O'Clock High.

JOAN LANSING

The flowers that bloom in the spring make pretty posies I'd like to pin on local ABC stations for making my Sundays so full of grand and glorious entertainment. American Broadcasting Company Sunday shows offer listening pleasure for the whole family.

For instance, at 5:30 PM (EDT) over your local ABC station, the Goodyear Tire and Rubber Company presents an outstanding series of dramatic and inspirational programs on "THE GREATEST STORY EVER TOLD." From coast-to-coast listeners of all ages toast this program as one of the truly great programs on the air.

Famous commentator DREW PEARSON gives top-flight, provocative views and sometimes startling "predictions of things to come" at 6 PM (EDT). We tip our bonnets to Adam Hats who sponsor the dashing, daring DREW. At 6:15 PM (EDT) DON GARDINER and "MONDAY MORNING HEADLINES" make more news, giving you a smart head-start on headline happenings. "Air Wick" picks DON GARDINER as its clear-headed spokesman.

The Sunday schedule adds a musical note at 6:30 PM (EDT) when Hormel's "MUSIC WITH THE GIRLS" steps up the rhythmic down-beats . . . with a sprightly all-girl band femceed by lovely MARY ELLEN DOMM. Another happy hi-spot comes at 8 PM (EDT) when bouncy BERT PARKS says "STOP THE MUSIC." This super-show, featuring KAY ARMEN, DICK BROWN and HARRY SALTER'S ORCHESTRA, is jointly sponsored by Clipper Craft Clothes, Speidel Watch Bands and Old Gold Cigarettes.

From Maine to Minnesota, from California to Kentucky, all points in between and "all the ships at sea," Sunday at 9 PM (EDT) means WALTER WINCHELL time. The great reporter is sponsored by Richard Hudnut. Hollywood's leading "LOLLY" pops up with gossip and guests at 9:15 PM (EDT) on "THE LOUELLA PARSONS SHOW" for Woodbury. A real audience-participation extravaganza is "CHANCE OF A LIFETIME" emceed by JOHN REED KING for Bretton Watch Bands at 9:30 PM (EDT). JIMMY FIDLER sizes up movie star moods and manners and gives choice chatter for Arrid at 10:15 PM (EDT) topping off a great Sunday of leisure-pleasure listening on your local ABC station.

I hate to think what might have happened if Geary and I hadn't made an effort to improve ourselves.

I used to be a worrier, fussing around, getting irritated over imaginary problems. It didn't show much when I lived with my family; they were used to me, anyway. It came out jarringly when Geary and I started housekeeping. I wanted everything in the apartment just so. Every drape had to have the exact number of folds. Every chair cushion was puffed up to perfection. Every night before I went to sleep I found myself reliving everything that had happened that day, and worrying about all the things I'd have to do tomorrow.

This started to bother Geary, and when he actually admitted it, I became annoyed.

"It doesn't hurt if I want things right all the time, does it?" I snapped. "Why should you be concerned?"

Geary didn't blow up. He just looked at me mildly, as if he were considering something, and then he started to speak slowly. "Because," he said, "while it's nice to want things to go perfectly, it must be wrong to make an obsession of it. Because, if little things can cause you so much worry what will happen if bigger things go wrong? Take our future. It's not going to happen just the way we want it to. Take me. I'm not perfect and never will be. What's this all going to do to both of us if you can't accept it, and, you know, sort of roll with it?"

Suddenly I was ashamed of myself. Cluttering up my mind with little things instead of taking it easy and enjoying the good life I had.

to live in harmony . . .

There were other little things about me, and about Geary, too, for that matter, that needed fixing up. From childhood on I had had a habit of being critical of my friends, and didn't know it was unkind and intolerant of me. Geary had a failing of suddenly being abrupt when talking to someone. I was a little possessive. Geary flung his clothes around like a man will and left things uncapped. (I remember you used to toss things under your bed and drove your mother to distraction. I guess you've outgrown that!) They all came out bit by bit and we were faced with the problem of either correcting them and living in harmony, or . . . well, I don't have to go into detail about what happens to marriage when there isn't harmony.

There was one thing we were lucky about—we never just pointed fingers at each other's faults. We studied them, and got to understand them. Once you understand why a person does something that is annoying, it somehow isn't half so annoying!

Every once in a while when talking to Geary I'd notice that his words would get shorter and his silences longer. And if I tried to cut down on the silences he would get quite snappy. Then I began to realize that the silences generally ended with his making a very keen and intelligent observation on what we were talking about, or else with his coming up with a good solution if it was a problem that was bothering us. It came to me then that the silences meant he was concentrating.

Well, I could take it all right, but I began to wonder if he was the same way with prospects in his insurance business. If he fell into silences and got abrupt suddenly with them, it certainly was going to cut down on the policies he could sell.

MARLON BRANDO was 19 when he arrived in New York. He'd been expelled from two high schools in Evanston, Illinois, never seen a play in his life, and yet he wanted to be an actor. Several months later, before he'd had a chance to complete his course at the Dramatic Workshop, he landed a juicy B'way role, and Marlon's hardly had an idle day since. Sometimes the play was a flop, but Marlon always collected rave notices. For a long time he ignored Hollywood but when Stanley Kramer offered him the role of a paraplegic in his forthcoming The Men, Marlon agreed to give it a try. He's 26.

JUDY HOLLIDAY'S next movie is Born Yesterday and she still considers that something of a minor miracle. She'd played the role for several years on Broadway, but Hollywood tested several other actresses before they'd even consider Judy for the part. She was born in New York in 1923 and for a long time wanted to write and direct plays instead of act in them. But she forgot all about that when she joined a group of young people who could sing, dance and act—and were all bent on getting into show business. Judy's married to David Oppenheim. You've seen her in Adam's Rib.

NANCY OLSON almost became a teacher but gave that idea up on the very same day she won an oratory contest and learned just how pleasant the limelight could be. Paramount discovered her at UCLA taking dramatic courses and decided she was good enough to make movies for them anytime. She's five-feet-five inches tall, weighs 117 lbs and has blue eyes and golden hair. Nancy was born in Milwaukee in 1928 and you'll see her soon in Sunset Boulevard.

BEN JOHNSON is one cowboy star who really knows his way around a horse. He once broke the world's record for calf-roping and before he hit the movies was a yearly contender in every rodeo event. Ben was born in Pawhuska, Oklahoma, learned to ride when he was six and left high school in his junior year to become a stunt rider. John Ford discovered his trick riding abilities and signed him without a test to a role in She Wore A Yellow Ribbon. Ben's married to Carol Jones and you'll see him next in Wagon Master.

So I decided to talk to him about it. Before I got through he interrupted me.

"You're right!" he exclaimed. "Janie, you've hit one of my biggest failings and I didn't even know it was there!"

Well! I don't have to tell you, Elizabeth, that I felt like a regular little old somebody being such a help to my husband. And you know what? I couldn't stop there. I began to take an interest in his work, not meddling, mind you, but offering to pitch in if there was a little something I could do. There was. You know, today, I go through the telephone book picking out and listing people I think would be good prospects for insurance. And whenever he gets someone's policies to look over for analysis and suggestions for possible changes I've learned to do what is called the basic evaluation—comparing the man's income with the amount of his premium and the benefits he's getting! It interests me so much that every night I ask Geary if he has any new policies for me to work on!

I can't even stop there. Do you remember my telling you Geary was second high salesman in his company for the country a few months ago? Now he's the first. I always ask all my friends whether they need insurance, and I always laugh, but underneath I mean it! (Do you need any?)

But what I really wanted to bring out is that when husband and wife work together everything seems wonderful.

Geary doesn't even throw his clothes around anymore. And this is how Geary stopped me from being ultra-critical: He read a description of a man to me one night from a book.

"His manner of living was shiftless," read Geary. "His rooms were usually in a mess, his clothes scattered about everywhere, dust on top of all and rarely a window opened. He was miserly, or so most people thought. He would haggle about everything. He was considered uncouth, almost barbarian in his ways. . . ."

Then Geary stopped reading and looked

There is a radio commentator who also writes a column, and he dotes on writing, and reading publicly over the air, open letters to celebrities in which he advises them on conduct, morals, business principles and finance. Usually, these manifestoes get a response, often though, an indignant one. The letters make the listener believe this man is close to the stars.

Desiring a rise for his own sake, out of Bing Crosby, our man once read an infuriating letter to Crosby over the air. Nothing happened. Two weeks later, he read a second open letter, more arousing than even the first. During the third week, the commentator went to the Lakeside Golf Club in Hollywood for a round and the first person he saw was Crosby.

"Hello, Bub," drawled Crosby, walking on, "you still writin' that column for the paper?"

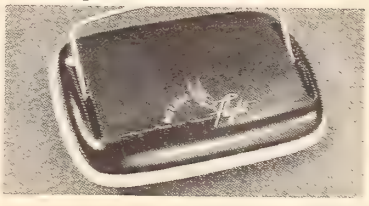
This bride didn't hint...

Alas, wedding gifts full of fancy glamour don't help a girl keep a house tidy. When a new husband dribbles ashes, she needs a handy Bissell Carpet Sweeper. So much easier than hooking up the vacuum each time!

This bride did...



She hinted hard . . . and got a Bissell Sweeper from her Cousin Bess. "Bless you, Bess!" says the bride, who uses her Bissell® every day for quick sweep-ups, saves her vacuum for periodic cleaning.

up at me. "What would you say about a man like that?" he asked. "Could you like him? Could you respect him?"

"Oh, he's horrible!" I said.

"Could such a man be your friend?" he went on.

"Oh, no!" I answered.

Geary smiled. "I hate to do this to you," he said. "It's a description of Ludwig van Beethoven."

I almost died. As Geary knew, Beethoven to me is just about the greatest musical genius who ever lived.

"Are you sure?" I asked.

"Sure," he said. "But I didn't read the full description to you. You've got to know all about someone before you can know him at all. If you're looking for faults you can always find them. Beethoven was all I read to you, but more. He was tender with children; he was a great lover of beauty. He was jagged-tempered because he was enraged by his deafness, and careless of his appearance and his rooms because they weren't important to him. Only his music was important."

It was something to think about. It made me look at my friends with new eyes. I knew that I'd come to the end of any loose talking about them.

Possessiveness is an awful thing to have around a new marriage. (So if Nicky wants to go somewhere, and you can't make it, let him go.) I have a couple of friends who used to start crying if their husbands even hinted about playing golf or going to a ball game with their old pals. I never had that much of a problem. I sort of like the idea of Geary going out by himself sometimes. When he comes home at the end of a long day away I can see on his face how much he's missed me. And that's not bad, Elizabeth.

You know, when I was younger, I read somewhere that marriage should enrich a girl's life. I didn't know what it meant then. Now I do. I had my own world before I met Geary, and now I have a new world—his. His viewpoint, his friends, his ambitions are another life for me. And through it, I keep finding out more about myself.

I guess maybe you can tell from this that marriage is marvelous. I guess maybe you suspected it all along. Anyway, I know that you and Nicky are going to be happy. I know you're going to find that dreams are even more beautiful when they come true.

So here's to the first year, and all the years after. Here's to you.

(Continued from page 52) of a settee expecting some part of the newcomer to fly loose and hit him in the face. When he simmered down to a state where introductions were possible, he shook my hand with a tight-fisted churning motion that rendered it (my hand) useless. Not easily charmed, I was charmed. Suddenly I found myself terribly excited by the silly inconsequentials he was shouting at the top of his voice, and I was deeply hopeful that everything was all right with him and his.

Don't laugh. When you meet Mario Lanza the same thing will happen to you.

We went across the street to a quiet Hungarian café which featured warm Italian red wine and a gypsy violinist, and we talked. He talked.

"I hate opera singers," Mario Lanza said. He shook a fist as big as a brace of plucked chickens under my nose and seemed about to spit out his front teeth. "Those fancy Italian opera singers. Every time I see one on the street I want to go up to him and punch him in the nose."

That off his chest, he grinned cheerfully.

"Who the hell do they think they are?" he roared, suddenly flipping back into his rage. "They sneer at good Americans because they don't think they love music or can sing. I'm a good one hundred percent American Philadelphia wop and I can sing better than any of them!"

He opened his mouth, his throat and his diaphragm and the beautiful high note that came out drowned out the violinist and every alien sound for several blocks around the café.

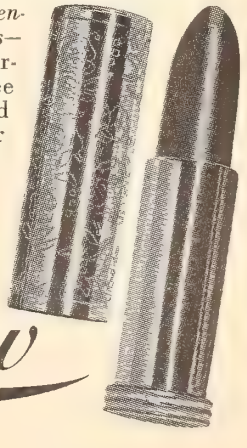
The fiddle-player swung into a medley from That Midnight Kiss, Mario's first picture at MGM. Lanza smiled and began to rock back and forth in rhythm with the music.

"You see," he said, "everybody loves me. They want to make me happy. This artist, this violin virtuoso, is playing now just for me. I love him, too, and I've never even met him."

If you can hum with a voice the power of a ram-jet rocket, he began to hum, oblivious of the stir he was causing among the rest of the diners.

"I love my wife," he sighed. "I have an Irish wife and an Irish daughter. Every Italian should have an Irish wife and there would be less trouble in the world."



He changed pace again.

"I love MGM," he roared as though he expected an argument. "See this jacket? I stole it from MGM. It used to belong to Wardrobe. It was made for Van Johnson, but he didn't steal it, so I did. It's a beautiful jacket and I am a very lucky man to be allowed to steal such a thing. Only in America could such a thing happen. Only in America can an opera singer steal such a beautiful coat and tell people about it. In Europe, where every third guy is an opera singer, they would claim they bought it or found it or something. They stink."

It was at this point that your reporter began to side with the element that said Mario Lanza was a lunatic. Here was a very handsome young man, looking very much like the boy who might live next door, alternately exploding and weeping with love of people and America.

With a face as impish as Puck, and a tousled top-knot of curly black hair, looking for all the world like a football player on a bender, he could suddenly burst into song in a crowded restaurant in the middle of the afternoon and fill the room with beauty. The man and the situation were incongruous. He had to be crazy.

However, Mario Lanza is, actually, just as crazy as every warm-hearted, spirited, proud, hard-working young man in this country today. He may be more excitable, but no crazier.

He was born in New York City, but at a very early age, his father, a one-time athlete who had been very badly gassed in the first world war, moved to Philadelphia where Mario, then called Freddie Coccoza, was brought up. The particular section of the city in which the Coccozas lived was called South Philadelphia, a district so noted for its brutality that a few years ago one of the fact detective magazines said there were more murders in a square-mile portion of the district in a single year than in a similar area anywhere on earth.

South Philly had never been noted for its production of musical or any other artistic talent. In a quieter mood, Mario Lanza explained it.

"To the tough kids I palled around with anything artistic was sissy, and it was as much as a kid's life was worth to openly express even a mild interest in anything sissy."

The people of South Philadelphia were pitifully poor, which was the only reason they lived there. Any education in any direction beyond grammar school was rare, and beyond high school completely unknown. A boy grew up and became a thief, a thug or a laborer according to his instincts. And the respect of his neighbors and contemporaries depended on his hewing strictly to this degenerate tradition. Freddie Coccoza's evolution from a child of the gutters to Mario Lanza, the greatest tenor since Caruso, is, then, a frightening as well as an inspiring miracle.

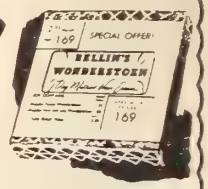
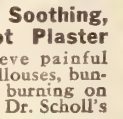
There is no corner of the earth that is not visited by music of some sort. It can be anything from the savage chants of aborigine natives of a jungle, the reedy whistles of the flutes of the oriental, the brassy jazz of Harlem to the ponderous, melancholy hymns of Wagner. There is music everywhere. And because South Philadelphia was mostly Italian, their music was the operas, played casually at home on a gramaphone, or hummed to babies by their mothers.



RCA, the company which now considers Mario Lanza among its three top record makers, decided some twenty years ago to see if it couldn't stimulate the sales of its discs in that neighborhood where Mario lived as a boy. As part of their program, they installed a fine phonograph and an amplifier with a huge horn, along with a sizable stock of operatic records, in a small music shop across the street from the Coccoza residence. The shopkeeper was advised that so long as he played the records good and loud all day, the equipment and records were his without cost.

"That was when I first knew I wanted to be a singer," Mario Lanza said. "I used to shoot agates with the kids in the street in front of the music shop, and whenever anyone sang a high note, I would break out in goose-pimples. I used to rub my arms so the other kids wouldn't see them. And sometimes when I couldn't stand it any more, and I had to sing with the voice on the record, I used to snatch up my aggies and run terrified that I would sing and disgrace myself."

No, South Philadelphia was no breeding ground for operatic tenors.



"The greatest thrill I have ever had in my life," Mario Lanza went on, "was when I knew I could sing. My old man had been sold a phonograph. He loved music, and he didn't have to make any excuses for it. He wasn't a kid. He used to go to the phonograph after dinner and slowly grind the handle of the winder. Then he

For the past several years a number of Physicians have reported amazing success in treating Psoriasis with LIPAN—a new medical wonder taken internally. would select a record, very carefully, even though he knew them all by heart, and put it on the machine. He would then sit in a chair and he and my mother would close their eyes and listen. I used to stand in the hall and chill and flush with heat. I used to open my mouth and make the Italian words of the songs with my lips. I learned all Pop's records that way."

After aggies and the other restless games of the children of South Philadelphia paled in interest with the years, Freddie Coccoza moved on to more rugged sports. Toughened by years of fighting with his fists and other hoodlum athletics, he became an expert football player and boxer. His features settled into the collar ad structure of today, his voice changed, and he found himself faced with the job of selecting a trade. But he wanted to sing.

"I knew I could do it then," he said, "and I knew I had the guts. One day I waited until my father and mother went out and I turned on the phonograph. I put on a Caruso record. I sang with him. Now I know I sang badly, but that day I thought I sang it as well as he did. I went sort of crazy. I put on all of the records, one by one, and I sang with all of them. I sang at the top of my lungs until I was hoarse, and then I lay down on the floor and made up my mind for once and for all. I was going to be a singer and nothing in the world would stop me.

"Lessons were out of the question. I got them all from the phonograph. I'd save every penny I could get together and buy new records, and whenever the folks went out I would sing. I knew more songs than any other singer in the world. And then one day, when I'd just finished a song, I turned around—and there was my father standing just inside the doorway. There were tears in his eyes and neither one of us said a word. We just walked toward one another and embraced—and we both cried. Pop, because he had always hoped I would someday be a singer and now he knew I would, and me—because now it wasn't a secret I had to guard anymore."

It was then I decided that Mario Lanza wasn't a lunatic after all, but an artist, maybe the greatest tenor artist since the late, great Caruso.

Mario Lanza, strong as a stevedore, healthy, as an airedale, still had to make a living to pay for some classical music tuition, so he moved pianos for a few hard dollars a day. One day the route sheet on the truck read "Academy of Music." Just another day, another dollar, and another piano. Mario and his fellow workers moved the massive grand onto the stage while the musicians puttered about the auditorium. A small group of them, however, were in one corner of the stage running through an operatic aria. Mario couldn't help it. He cut loose with something special from the vocal zone, and he hit the right note and held it. From the back of the auditorium, a loud bellow was heard. "Quiet!" it ordered. Then, "Who did that? Who sang that note?"

Fifty fingers and a dozen violin bows pointed at the piano mover. William Huff, director of the Philadelphia Forum, strode down the aisle and onto the stage. He looked at Mario open-mouthed, then he took him by the arm and into the office. In a week, Mario was doing the same thing for Serge Koussevitsky, conductor of the Boston Symphony—and a piano mover was on his way to operatic fame.

A hackneyed motion picture title card of 1920 fits in here—Then Came The War!

Private Mario Lanza was a pretty good soldier. He forgot everything but the war. He appeared in the Air Forces show, This is The Army, but only in a minor capacity. War and careers didn't mix well with him. But when he got out, he looked up his new musical friends and started in singing again. He signed a contract with Victor, he got a big time radio program, but he was not getting where he should vocally and he knew it was his lack of professional training that was responsible. He was at his lowest ebb, mentally, when he met Sam Weiler.

Sam Weiler was a real estate man who had made a lot of money and who was a patron of the arts. He heard Mario singing in Carnegie Hall and came back and introduced himself. He had an offer to make. He wasn't interested in making money, and he knew enough about music to know that he had heard a great voice that needed training. He offered to stake Mario to all the tuition he needed if he would stop singing publicly until he was ready. Mario leaped at the chance.

For the next fifteen months, Mario Lanza learned about music and voice. He was married now, but all of his expenses were taken care of by Sam Weiler. Mario had nothing else to worry about.

Then one day Sam Weiler said he was ready, and he booked Mario into the famed Hollywood Bowl for a concert. At the conclusion of that evening, the Bowl audience gave Mario the greatest ovation any artist appearing there ever got. They stood on their feet in the Hollywood Bowl that night and cheered for fifteen minutes for the kid from South Philadelphia who got goose pimples at the sound of music.

Louis B. Mayer, head of MGM studios, saw it from a box down front and sans agent, sans talent scouts, Mario Lanza got a contract. The studio engaged Maestro Spadoni, Caruso's coach, to work with him—and he was on his way at last.

Two pictures at MGM have resulted in the belief that Lanza is the screen's most exciting personality today. There are, of course, two schools of thought on that, but then that's inevitable. One thing is sure, the charm of the lad's personality is as contagious as laughter.

At home, Mario Lanza is part peasant and part Lord of the Manor. I went to his home to meet his wife and parents. As I had anticipated, it was a huge, sprawling semi-castle in Beverly Hills looking as though the furniture had been looted, instead of purchased, piece by piece. Mario howled a greeting to everyone and commanded his wife to present herself. Before he shut the door he had turned on the phonograph.

His mother and father, who live with him, sat quietly and listened to him talk. His wife, a pretty, charming girl, shut her eyes and listened to him sing on the records, almost as though she had never heard them before.

"These are the things a man loves," Mario told me later. "A home for Mama and Papa. My wife whom I love. My baby, Coleen. A swimming pool. A fine car. And to sing without fear. But none of these things would be mine without the patronage of a man like him." He pointed to Sam Weiler who had joined us and who sat happily in a corner gazing softly at the wonders he had helped create.

"There could be no artists without these patrons. There could be no music without music stores that played music for nothing, so that kids could learn to love it. There are so many things to be grateful for."

"But I am no sissy," he bellowed, his fists raised in fury. "I can still lick any kid on my street—and any of those fancy Italian opera singers with the high noses. The next one I see, I'll punch right in the nose!"

The family paid no attention to the outburst. Sam Weiler still gazed as softly, and Mrs. Lanza's eyes were still closed.

"But I love everyone," Mario said calmly, "and everyone loves me."

This man is indeed a lunatic, I thought. A wonderful lunatic. The most exciting personality in years, and without a doubt the greatest voice since, well, anybody.

And that's the way it is. He's yours to figure out.

There's always the topper, though. The final story. It took place one day when Mario had been at MGM a year. He was called into the front office of the studio on that day and was seated before a very distinguished group. Among the top brass of the studio, sat Jesse Lasky, a pioneer film-maker.

"Mr. Lanza," said a studio executive, "We have just concluded a deal with Mr. Lasky for him to make a picture with this company. He owns the rights to a story we want, and he has searched the world for five years to find a player capable of doing the role. He has come to us saying you are the only man who can do it. Would you agree to sing and play the life of Enrico Caruso?"

Mario Lanza just sat and nodded his head. Soon, he got to his feet and stumbled from the room. Down a long corridor he walked, and he couldn't see—because he was crying. Joyful and bitter tears. Tears that came from childhood and standing in a dingy hall silently learning to sing. Tears that came from singing alone in a darkened room while his mother and father were away at the movies. Tears that came from gratitude because he could steal a jacket that had been made for Van Johnson, and get away with it.

Mario Lanza, big, barrel-chested, vigorous American of Italian descent who is twenty-eight years old, married and has an Italian-Irish daughter of two named Coleen. That's him. THE END

Q. Is it true that Mrs. Henry Fonda committed suicide because her husband wanted a divorce?
—F. P., ALMA, MICHIGAN

A. No, it isn't. Few people know it, but Frances Fonda attempted suicide by taking an overdose of sleeping pills prior to her husband's request for a divorce. A brilliant, hyperthyroid woman who had once worked for the National City Bank of New York, Mrs. Fonda oversaw the Fonda finances. She herself had obtained a settlement of close to $1,000,000 from her first husband, George Brokaw. Her eldest daughter, Pamela, and the two children she had with husband Henry are owners in part of the fabulously successful stage play, Mr. Roberts. Frances Fonda was in charge of all those accounts. When her husband asked for a divorce, she understandably agreed to give him one. The financial settlement involved would have made her independently wealthy for life.

—M. G., Durham, N. C.

Q. Can Ingrid Bergman take her daughter to live with her and Rossellini in Italy?—HANSON B., NEW YORK, N. Y.

A. The custody plan approved by the California Superior Court specifically states that Pia will live and attend school in California. This means that if Ingrid wants to spend any time with her daughter, she will have to spend it on the West Coast. Dr. Lindstrom has been emphatic in his desire to keep Pia away from Rossellini as much as possible.

—CORLISS F., ST. JOSEPH, MO.

Q. Is it true that the Audie Murphy-Wanda Hendrix marriage went on the rocks because Audie is still suffering from shell-shock? —R. R., WACO, TEXAS

A. Nonsense. All this stuff about Murphy being unable to re-adjust to civilian life is so much press agent's poppycock. He just couldn't adapt himself to Wanda's way of Hollywood living.

Shirley met Black, who was an executive with the Hawaiian Pineapple Company while she was visiting in Honolulu and their romance started then. I say "was" an executive because young Black resigned his Honolulu post so he could be near the former child star.

But Charlie won't have to worry about where his next job is coming from. His dad is head of the Pacific Gas and Electric Company in San Francisco and has scads of money.

Young Black's family is very social and are sticklers for propriety and Shirley has an adoring public, many of whom look upon her as having been the victim of a very unhappy marriage. (For those who blame Shirley for its failure, there's a story on page 34.) So, Shirley, for those reasons, will not announce her engagement until she is free and has the final divorce decree in her own hands.

I happen to know that when the good looking, 32-year-old Black invited her to come to San Francisco for the very swanky Bachelor's Ball he did so because he wanted his mother to meet the girl he loves.

The photographs of Shirley taken with Black show her as a new Miss Temple, sophisticated and dressed to the nth degree in very chic clothes, looking vastly different from the curly-haired girl whose face used to appear so round and childish. This Shirley is beautifully slender.

Red Skelton checks to see if his name's included on the list of entertainers at the annual Friars' Frolic. Mr. and Mrs. Jimmy Stewart assure him that it is.

Informally dressed as usual, Harpo Marx threatens to club innocent bystander Edward G. Robinson. "He was looking at me," Harpo honked—indignantly.

Comics Dean Martin and Jerry Lewis were completely fascinated by this young lady's curly hair and long eyelashes—until they found out "she" was Bill Lundigan.

The hilarious shindig is one of the town's most popular events. Roz Russell, elegant in a satin dinner coat, and Brod Crawford chat together.

Betty Grable's rarely seen without Harry James, but Harry was on tour, so she came with Gloria De Haven. (Gloria made I'll Get By with him.)

Backstage, chorine Burt Lancaster, right, tries to cheer up Floradora girl Bob Mitchum—who doesn't seem very elated about the whole affair.

Red Skelton, the charmer in satin (complete with red wig) looks a little skeptical as dandy Dan Dailey kneels to make his earnest proposal.

Van Johnson and Jack Benny double on the fiddle—(It's "Love in Bloom"). Van partnered a Floradora girl; Jack was a simple fire-chief.

Freckled and pigtailed, "Annie Oakley" Hutton thought gay blade Errol Flynn looked a sight for sore eyes. He thought she was a sight, too.

Speaking of denying engagements, Paul Douglas and Jan Sterling had a spat after I said they were going to get married and Paul did a lot of talking about never getting married again.

But he is too crazy about Jan to keep that up for long and now the great big lug admits that they are going to be married in August. Paul is just beaming with happiness. On him, being engaged is very becoming.

Funny thing, Paul played in Born Yesterday on the stage and so did Jan. But at different times and different cities, he with the original New York cast, Jan in the Chicago company.

The other day I saw a friendly little domestic scene. It was noon at Romanoff's and Jan and Paul were lunching at a table for two. Virginia Field came in, saw them, and went over to their table to show them a letter she had just received from her and Paul's daughter, Maggie, who is in school in Palm Beach.

Jan, who will be Maggie's stepmother shortly after you read this, enjoyed the much scribbled letter every bit as much as Paul and Virginia did.

Pepsodent removes FILM–helps stop tooth decay!

Tooth decay is formed by acid that film holds against your teeth—acid formed by the action of mouth bacteria on many foods you eat. When you use Pepsodent Tooth Paste right after eating, it helps keep acid from forming. What's more, Pepsodent removes dulling stains and "bad breath" germs that collect in film.

FILM NEVER LETS UP! It's forming night and day on everyone's teeth. Don't neglect it. Always brush with film-removing Pepsodent right after eating and before retiring. No other tooth paste can duplicate Pepsodent's film-removing formula. No other tooth paste contains Irium* or Pepsodent's gentle polishing agent.

Don't let decay start in your mouth! Use Pepsodent every day—see your dentist twice a year.

wick, the young Englishman who holds an amateur golf championship. First, Janie liked Clark (he's a dead ringer for Lew Ayres in appearance) and then she liked golf.

Her favorite partner on the links is Ginger Rogers and it was amusing to hear the two girls debate at a cocktail party over which one had won the most games.

I am glad Jane seems happier. She still has moments, I know, of great depression about her personal life. She is not a play girl. She does not like to date a lot of different men. I think she sincerely wants to fall in love again, marry and settle down to family life with her children. (For evidence of this turn to the story on page 57.)

Since it seems impossible to hope that she and Ronald Reagan will ever reconcile, I hope she will meet someone with whom she can fall in love. It could have been Lew Ayres—but it wasn't.

As a rule I do not approve of telling my readers about diets because I feel that no one should diet unless they have consulted a doctor.

But Hollywood has gone overboard for a new diet, many of our beauties have dropped pounds, and still feel so well that I am going to pass it on to you.

Some people call it the "MGM Diet"—because so many stars on that lot were on it. I hear MGM paid a fortune to Mayo Clinic for it and here it is free to you. But please bear in mind that it means what it says—TWO

News that Joan Crawford is adopting another little girl—her family will then be four adopted daughters and a son—reminds me of a very funny thing said by her oldest child, Christina, when Joan told her there would soon be twins in the nursery.

One of the most "different" parties this month was held backstage at the little Las Palmas theater after a flock of movie stars opened in Light Up The Sky and a lot more movie stars sparkled in the audience.

Guy Madison was the star of the stage show with Benay Venuta and Jean Parker as his leading ladies—and all their friends were out front to cheer them on.

That is—everybody but Gail Russell, Guy's wife. She was quite conspicuous by her absence, but these two still have their battles—and perhaps this was another feudin' spell.

Betty Hutton, Benay Venuta's close friend, laughed so loudly at her antics that some of Benay's funniest lines were lost—but nobody minded. That Betty is a show in herself whether she is on stage or in the audience.

She was with Milt Pickman, a beau she alternates with Bob Sterling. But I think Betty will think a long time before she gets serious about anyone.

Joan Evans, in the front row, with her parents and a young socialite, was in her daring decolletage, as usual. For a fifteen-year-old girl, Joan sure wears 'em low. From the back, she looked like she must be wearing a bathing suit. (For another discussion about the appropriateness of Joan's clothes see page 44.)

Joan Caulfield, in a beautiful pink dress, held hands all through the play with Frank Ross. They are soooo in love and Joan is just blooming now that she's Mrs. Ross.

When the show was over—about fifty invited guests trooped backstage for a champagne supper on stage—and since the set represented a swanky hotel suite, it was all very comfortable and lots of fun.

Kirk Douglas is one of the most amiable guys I know. Very few things annoy him. But Kirk has a red hot mad on at press agents for nightclub cafes who couple his name with "phony" dates and even girls he has never set eyes on.

Kirk says, "This is an abuse that has been going on for ages. Most actors just shrug and let it go. But not me! I'm going to raise hell about it!" (and he didn't apologize about that hell).

"In order for the cafes to get mention in the columns they pretend that certain well known movie couples were there 'holding hands and gazing into each other's eyes.' If you date the same girl for several weeks, you are no longer a good new 'twosome'. So what do they do but make up a date for you—sometimes another actress, more often than not, a girl you've never set eyes on who can use the publicity!

"There is plenty of harm done. For instance, my name was in the columns last week as dating a different girl in a different cafe every night of the week. I've got news for you, and them. I haven't got that much vitality and I don't like night clubs that much.

"As for the ladies I'm supposed to be with—I'm sure they are all very charming but I don't intend to be made to appear like a nitwit of a playboy in the public's eyes just because some newcomer needs a little publicity.

"That's my story—and I'm going to insist on it."

Bette Davis is the talk of the All About Eve troupe on location in San Francisco—she is having such a good time and is in such wonderful spirits.

The company is working in the old Curran Theater and between scenes Bette puts on Charleston records and gives with some hot steps from that revived old dance.

How different from the Bette of six months ago who was little Miss Gloom herself. Then, she was miserable with worry about her marriage to William Grant Sherry. Now that their troubles are aired and out in the open, she is like a person who has successfully come through an operation and is on the road to recovery.

Bette still is nervous about going to public places even though her lawyer hired a bodyguard for her. So she and Anne Baxter take turns hostessing suppers in their hotel suites.

After everybody goes, Bette and Anne, who have become very good friends, usually sit and "hash" for hours.

Did you hear the one about the "car caller" at the première who got tangled up about Deborah Kerr's name and yelled loudly over the public address system:

Dropped over to the blue-and-silver salon of Rex, the hat man, in Beverly Hills, to pick up my new chapeaux and ran smack into Joan Caulfield being fitted for her wedding hat.

She can't be superstitious because the gent who was putting his okay on it, even to the way the veil should be draped, was Frank Ross!

Some people believe it is unlucky to let the prospective groom get a look at the wedding finery before the Wedding March strikes up.

Joan just laughed. "I think Frank has such good taste," she said, "and, after all, I want him to like the way I look on my wedding day, more than anyone else. Fact is, we just came from Orry-Kelly where my wedding dress was fitted."

Yes, Frank thought it was lovely. He certainly has good taste—and in more than one department, too.

Phil Reed is an honest fellow as well as a handsome one. Phil admits he was scared to death searching the Donald Nelson house for a burglar who stole $10,000 worth of Nancy Oakes' jewelry.

Phil and Nancy had been out dancing. When they returned to the Nelson home, where the heiress was visiting, they noticed a panel in the door had been broken and the latch had been slipped.

"In the movies," Phil grinned, "I often play a daring guy who rushes into situations like this, pops the bandit on the jaw, and returns the jewels to the gal.

"But in real life—whew—it sure is a different feeling wandering through rooms where someone who likes to use a gun may STILL be lurking!"

The Nelson party was held the very next day after the house had been robbed. The robbery had a definite note of mystery. Although several valuable pieces of Mrs. Nelson's jewelry and $150 in cash were in plain

A MOTION PICTURE FOR THE MILLIONS WITH THE Samuel Goldwyn TOUCH!

sight on her dressing table, the thief ignored it and took only the things belonging to Nancy.

All the guests turned amateur detectives, examined the broken glass door panel and came up with all sorts of theories. "The real detectives are puzzled," laughed Mrs. Nelson. "But these amateurs solve the robbery every five minutes."

At the Donald Nelson party honoring Nancy Oakes, I had a chat with Peter Lawford's mother, Lady Lawford, and while she absolutely denies that there is any serious romance between Sharman Douglas and Peter, she admits Sharman is the one girl Peter has met whom he cannot forget.

When the chance came for him to go to England to see his aunt who is ill, he grabbed at it so quickly that even Lady Lawford was amused.

Some of the gossip writers have printed that Ambassador and Mrs. Douglas do not like the idea of their attractive daughter marrying an actor. I doubt that. If Sharman and Peter really fall in love I believe that the parents on both sides will give their blessing.

Peter is a personable young man and well born and while he was visiting in London the Douglases could not have been nicer to him.

Personal Opinions: Lauren Bacall is too thin, much too thin—although I never thought I'd ever say that about anybody the way I've been dieting. But I must say for Bogey's Baby, she certainly does her best acting in Bright Leaf with Gary Cooper. Ditto Pat Neal, in the same picture. . . . Jan Sterling, who will soon be Mrs. Paul Douglas, is very much the same blonde, chic type as his ex-wife, Virginia Field. Well, don't the psychiatrists say that men fall in love with the same type over and over? . . . . Errol Flynn was REALLY a good boy and didn't step out on his bride-to-be, Princess Ghika, for almost six weeks while he was finishing Kim in Hollywood and she was in Paris. But the strain must have been a little too much, because Errol, who enjoys the society of pretty girls, did ask Claudette Thornton (a startling beauty) to dine with him at the Encore Cafe just a few nights before he left to join the princess in Jamaica. At one time, I believed this marriage would never come off. Now, I've changed my mind. . . . Understand that Ann Blyth has seven red evening gowns. The way that girl looks in red, I don't blame her. . . . I am worried, and so are all her friends, about Ann Sothern who is so depressed over her long illness that she cries all the time. If Ann is one of your favorites, please drop her a note—just Hollywood, California, is enough for the address—and tell her how eager you are for her to be back again on the screen. She's really such a swell girl.

Your letters this month certainly prove one thing—your undying loyalty to Frank Sinatra. In your wild campaign to defend Frankie Boy, some of you have blamed his troubles on Ava Gardner—and surprise, surprise—a few have even insinuated that Nancy doesn't understand him. But Nancy understands him too well. Anyway for your money, Frankie is still A-1.

In all my mail there is a note of disappointment, or anger or disillusionment about players who step out of line and get in the headlines.

Some of you have mentioned some silly recent publicity involving John Derek—pictures of him "diapering" a doll, for instance. Publicity gags do get ridiculous.

And some of the younger girls are a little shocked over the deep decolletage worn by many of our young starlets.

Thank you for your interest—and please keep writing.

That's all for now. See you next month.

MOVIE REVIEWS

Picture of the Month

Wounded on the battlefield, Marlon Brando awakes in rage and terror to find he's paralyzed from the waist down.

Now a paraplegic, he learns to accept his fate. His buddy, played by Jack Webb, accustoms him to hospital routine.

Teresa Wright, the girl he was engaged to, asks him to marry her. He refuses, knowing he'll never walk again.

Doctor Everett Sloane urges them to marry. Finally, having found the courage to start a new life, Marlon consents.

THE MEN

Cast: Marlon Brando, Teresa Wright, Everett Sloane, Jack Webb.
United Artists

From the first sound of drums as The Men opens, you know you're in for an experience. You see the soldier, Ken Wilozek (Marlon Brando) shot, you watch him fall, you hear his voice from the hospital bed where he lies in an agony of pain and bitterness. "At first," the voice says, "I was afraid I was going to die. Now I'm afraid I'm going to live." The Men is a story of paraplegic veterans. A story of the soldiers who didn't die —or, at least, who only died a little. Paraplegics are immobilized from the waist down; they're sentenced to life in wheel chairs. They're sentenced to trying to make their way in a world which can only pity, and stare, and never understand. The rehabilitation of such men is the basis of this picture. All the acting is magnificent—Everett Sloane's, as the doctor who works his heart out, knowing he can never do enough; Brando's, as the particular boy whose problems are singled out for discussion; Teresa Wright's, as his fiancée. And the men themselves are magnificent—at once hopeful and hopeless, sweet, and cynical, funny in the bawdy way of soldiers. "Old bladder and bowels" Brock, they call the doctor. "If you wasn't so sexy, you'd remind me of my mother," they say to a skinny little old nurse. The Men is both heart-breaking and inspiring. In evaluating the human spirit, it says many things. It says there are men who have suffered too much, and are brave beyond belief. It says we must not forget their sacrifice, nor accept their broken lives lightly.

ANNIE GET YOUR GUN

Cast: Betty Hutton, Howard Keel, Louis Calhern, Edward Arnold.
Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer.

Dazzling to look at, enchanting to listen to, "Annie" is everything that a musical should be. Betty Hutton plays Annie Oakley, the world's best markswoman, and she plays her from A to Z. She shoots, she sings (she sings soft and she sings loud), she's a ragged little character all covered with freckles, mourning about how "you cain't shoot a male in the tail like a quail"; she's a vision in evening clothes, all pink and white and beautiful. She's gay and she's sad, and all with a western accent. It's her picture. Howard Keel (the second-best shot in the world, and Betty's love interest) is attractive, has a big, Nelson Eddy-ish voice (which Betty mimics superbly), and J. Carrol Naish makes a delightful injun chief. Now and then, there's a movie which has a kind of magic, a happy atmosphere that infects its audience. This one is like that.

BRIGHT LEAF

Warners.

Gary Cooper's family's been run out of a tobacco town called Kingsmont because Gary paid attention to the daughter of the biggest tobacco grower (Donald Crisp) in the county. Years later, Gary comes back. Still got that daughter on his mind. She (Pat Neal) is a real nutty-type young girl, likes to stir up trouble, sets her poppa to fighting with Gary again, just for kicks. Then a guy with a cigarette machine (it rolls them automatic) comes along—in those days, cigars were the thing—and Gary goes to borrow money so he can start manufacturing cigarettes. Only person he knows with money is Lauren Bacall. She operates what's coyly referred to as a "rooming house for ladies," but you should see those ladies. Anyhow, Lauren's grown sleek on her ill-gotten gains, but she's awful ethical when it comes to other people's ethics. Doesn't like Gary taking her money and kissing that high-born lady behind her back. When Gary ruins high-born lady's poppa, high-born lady ruins Gary, and the whole thing is based on a book, but I didn't read the book.

TICKET TO TOMAHAWK

20th Century-Fox.

This is about the early days of railroading, and a traveling salesman (Dan Dailey), and a trigger-happy girl (Anne Baxter) who's never been kissed. A train named Emma Sweeney is the star of the picture; she's got to get to the town of Tomahawk by a certain day in order for her operators to acquire their franchise. (Dailey's Emma's first passenger.) A passel of ornery stage-coach devotees don't want no railroad runnin' through the west, and they try horrid tricks (Rory Calhoun's one of the villains), but Emma makes the grade. Ticket to Tomahawk's an odd combination of musical and western, with a huge, Technicolored cast. Its very weight makes it move rather heavily, despite everybody's talent.

THE SECRET FURY

RKO.

The title of this picture is explained when our heroine, supposed murderess Claudette Colbert, is packed off to the looney bin, and her doctor (Elizabeth Risdon) starts studying charts with big jagged peaks in them. "I call these," she says, "the mountains of the secret fury." Claudette's chart doesn't have any mountains because she's no murderess, she's just a trifle overwrought. Why? Well, on the day she's supposed to marry Robert Ryan, some guy pops in, claims she's already married to a man named Randall (of whom she's never heard); the evidence that she and Randall really are hitched piles up; Randall, when she tracks him down, is slain right in front of her, and she's put on trial for it, and a couple other little things like

How should you greet your date mate?

- ☐ Dash out when he "honks"
- ☐ Ask him into the house
- ☐ Take your own sweet time

"One toot and ye're oot!" (As the Scottish lecturer said—to the old lady with the ear trumpet.) Does the toot of your joe's jalopy send you scurrying out? That's unsmart. Ask him into the house for a word with the family. Then leave promptly, on your merry way. Even on "difficult" days you'll be poised, comfortable. For Kotex gives softness that holds its shape—because Kotex is made to stay soft while you wear it!

Which neckline's best for your figure?

- ☐ Halter
- ☐ Camisole
- ☐ "Little Boy"

Could be you're the buxom type? Or maybe a build-up is what your figure lacks. No matter. Choose a "Little Boy" neckline and lament no more. It's camouflage for either figure fault. And for solving "certain" problems, why not let Kotex be your choice? You see, the extra protection you get with Kotex helps add scads of self-assurance . . . belittles "accident" misgivings, thanks to that special safety center.

What helps, if you've that "lobster" look?

- ☐ Antiseptic lotion
- ☐ Tinted makeup base
- ☐ A flame-colored formal

You got yourself barbecued just before the big dance! And with white marks left by your swim-suit straps and bracelet. Next time, take your sunning sensibly. Meantime, ease the broil with antiseptic lotion; plus a tinted makeup base, to cover up. The first two answers above are right. Always right for your sanitary protection needs is one of the 3 Kotex absorbencies. You'll find Regular, Junior or Super just suited to you.

Should you talk to a house-party guest you haven't met?

He didn't happen to be around when introductions were going on. So now, when he speaks—you're a snub-deb. Defrost! According to Emily you-know-who, it's correct to talk with any guest. Even if you haven't met officially. You can talk back to your calendar, too (when it taunts you with "outline" qualms.) Just remember, Kotex has flat pressed ends that prevent revealing outlines. Unquestionably. Lets you stay in the party picture . . . fluster-proof . . . and so self possessed!

For extra comfort on "those" days, should you—

- ☐ Stay in bed
- ☐ Go square-dancing
- ☐ Buy a nylon belt

Comfort doesn't call for coddling—or "square" fests. Your best bet's a new Kotex Wonderform Belt. It's made with DuPont nylon elastic—non-twisting—non-curling! Gives 118% stretch, yet it's strong, smooth-feeling; wisp-weight. Dries fast. Stays flat even after many tubbings. And see how much easier, quicker the new firm-grip fastener is to use! For extra comfort—buy the new nylon elastic Kotex Wonderform Belt.

that. You'd be in the looney bin too. There are four deaths and a bit of blackmail before you get out of the theater, and a real maniac tries to polish off Claudette. Exciting, but terribly implausible.

THE BIG LIFT

20th Century-Fox.

Shot in Germany where it happened, The Big Lift is the story of the American planes which ran food into Berlin when the Russians were blockading the roads to that city. Montgomery Clift and Paul Douglas play two American sergeants involved in the proceedings, Cornell Borchers and Bruni Lobel, German actresses, are the love interest, and a wonderful actor named O. E. Hasse makes a delightful Russian spy. The picture bends over backwards to be fair in dealing with the complex mess which is Germany today. Never hysterical, it kids the Russians, and while it overlooks none of the evil the Nazis worked (Douglas, as a passionate Germanhater doesn't let anybody forget about Buchenwald and Belsen), it still says that some Germans are decent, anxious to learn about democracy, anxious to bury their old ideas, and help make a better world. The Big Lift is timely, terrific, and most—and best—of all, sane.

THE ASPHALT JUNGLE

Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer.

This is a movie about a bunch of men who execute a perfect robbery. Being a John Huston production, it's also a wonderful series of character studies. There's Doc (Sam Jaffe), the brains. Fresh out of jail, he wants to make one good haul, then go to Mexico and study women the rest of his life. He's courtly, philosophical. There's Alonzo Emmerich, the front. He's a middle-aged man of property, respected in the community—and entirely corrupt. He keeps a young girl, very blond, very dumb, in his house at the beach. There's Dix (Sterling Hayden), the "hooligan," betting on horses, hoping to raise enough cash so he can go back to Kentucky and settle down where he was born. You get to know these people, and the others—the bookie whom money makes nervous, the close-mouthed hunchback, the girl who loves Dix. You meet corrupt policemen, and honest policemen. The picture has depth you don't find in ordinary cops and robbers stuff, and there's not a bad actor in the cast.

20th Century-Fox.

The Gunfighter's about a famous killer named Jimmie Ringo (Gregory Peck) who wants to break with his past. He'd like to go back to his wife and little boy (whom he hasn't seen in eight years), he'd like to live on a farm, be at peace. But he doesn't have that kind of free choice. Every town he hits, there's some little big-shot eager to bait him, to decide "he don't look so tough," to be "the guy who got Jimmie Ringo." So Ringo keeps moving, without rest, hunted by the law, and the lawless. As Peck plays him, he's a real, pitiful human being, aging, sad, tired. You know he's fated to die the way he's lived—by violence—yet you keep hoping something will happen to change that fate. The cast is flawless—Millard Mitchell as an ex-outlaw sheriff, Jean Parker, Karl Malden, Skip Homeier, Anthony Ross—you can't say good enough things about them. Same for Peck and Miss Westcott. Beautiful, beautiful setting. Here's a western with heart.

CHEAPER BY THE DOZEN

20th Century-Fox.

Cheaper By the Dozen is the Technicolored memoirs of a real family—the Gilbreths. Mr. G. (played by Clifton Webb) was a noted time study engineer; Mrs. G. (played by Myrna Loy) bore him twelve children, and these facts are supposedly cues for wild, uncontrolled laughter. Somehow, though, the picture isn't very funny. I don't know exactly why. It's pleasant enough, as it creeps along with occasional glimpses of old-fashioned bathing suits to lend it spice. The wind-up of course comes with the heart attack and death of father Gilbreth, and to me, this is no sock comedy finish. In fact, to me this is no sock comedy. I don't care what they say at 20th-Fox.

THE DAMNED DON'T CRY

Cast: Joan Crawford, David Brian, Steve Cochran, Kent Smith.
Warners.

Joan Crawford starts out as a poor oil field worker's wife with big ideas, works her way to the top as mistress of the country's biggest crook (David Brian). David, "forceful and polished leader of an international crime syndicate" (that's right off the studio synopsis), hires a social secretary who teaches Joan to drink elegantly (a vermouth cassis is more refined than whiskey and water), and speak un peu de French. But gambling circles are rough. You never saw so many damned people get murdered, and some of them snivel a little, despite the picture's title.

ROGUES OF SHERWOOD FOREST

Cast: John Derek, Diana Lynn, George Macready, Alan Hale.
Columbia.

Robin Hood's dead. So is King Richard. Wicked King John is back on the throne, and up to his old tricks, taxing the people, and hanging 'em when they can't pay. Young Robin (son of old Robin) goes and gathers what's left of his pa's merry men—and they're off to harass the king, and defend the peasantry. If you've ever seen any screen version of "Robin Hood," it's just like this. The girl young Robin loves is named Marianne, just like the girl old Robin loved. John Derek acts like he feels silly in his green chemise, but Diana Lynn looks pretty.

Every movie-goer is a talent scout, and our readers have an uncanny knack for picking tomorrow's stars.

I've just come home from seeing Annie Get Your Gun and I think I've made a terrific discovery. Howard Keel who plays opposite Betty Hutton has a wonderful voice and a very sunny personality, but I don't think I've ever seen him before. He's headed for stardom, I'm sure. Mrs. R. Gillespie, Pawtucket, R. I.

Well, a few months ago, hardly anyone in Hollywood knew Howard. He started the first day of shooting with high hopes and promptly broke his leg. Luckily the movie was shelved for awhile, giving him time to recover. He's six-feet-four inches tall, weighs 195 pounds and has blue eyes and brown hair. Howard's married to Helen Anderson and MGM says you'll be seeing a lot of him.

Recently I saw a very pretty girl in a small part in Adam's Rib. She played the girl that Judy Holliday's husband was running around with and I think she's got that certain something to make her a star. Do you know who I mean? Natalie Willis, Haverford, Pa.

Yes, that's Jean Hagen and she began her dramatic life ushering in Broadway's legitimate theaters. It was a good chance to watch professional acting, but Jean criticized the performers so loudly, word got back to writers Hecht and MacArthur. They thought she had a point though and let her understudy the lead. After that she won roles in Another Part of the Forest and Dear Ruth. She's Indiana born and married to Tom Seidel with whom she co-stars in A Life Of Her Own.

Next to Gene Kelly, I think Gene Nelson is one of the best dancers to hit Hollywood in a long time. I thought he was sensational in the Daughter of Rosie O'Grady, and I'd like to see him in more of the same. David Hammer, Bakersfield, Calif.

The critics thought Gene was pretty sensational, too, and in the face of all the offers he was getting, he went out and bought his wife a mink coat. Otherwise, things are still normal at his house. Gene was born in Seattle in 1920 and learned to ice-skate almost as soon as he could walk. He's six-feet tall, weighs 150 pounds and has blue eyes and blond hair. Next: Tea for Two for Warners.

Now you can really start to build a movie-music home library without crowding the family out of the house! MGM Records have started issuing substantial slices of sound-track songs on long-playing records. "Annie" is one of the best, with Betty Hutton at her most extrovert, playing Annie Oakley, helped by Howard Keel's romantic baritone, plus Keenan Wynn and Louis Calhern joining them in a hearty treatment of There's No Business Like Show Business. All the rest of the famous Irving Berlin score is on this platter, including They Say It's Wonderful, Doing What Comes Natur'lly, and Anything You Can Do.

YOUNG MAN WITH A HORN—Doris Day and Harry James* (Columbia).

This Columbia long-playing item includes Harry's instrumental version of Melancholy Rhapsody, which was written as a theme for the film (Johnny Johnston made it as a vocal on MGM). The other sides are all standard tunes. Harry's horn is backed by his rhythm section on Man I Love and Limehouse Blues; by the whole band in a bright treatment of Get Happy, and the remaining four sides are pleasantly sung by Doris Day, who sounds to us as though she hasn't lost the enthusiasm and sincerity of her Les Brown band-singing era. Her four numbers are I May Be Wrong, The Very Thought Of You, Too Marvelous For Words, and With A Song In My Heart.

ERIC COATES—*Music Of Eric Coates (Columbia).

OSCAR LEVANT—Levant Plays Debussy* (Columbia).

BILLIE HOLIDAY—*God Bless The Child (Decca).

A new version with choir background of the beautiful tune Billie helped originate.

ANDRE PREVIN—Previn by Request* (Victor).

Six more piano numbers by the amazing young musician from the MGM studios, including one of our preferred tunes, Bewitched, Bothered, and Bewildered.

METRONOME ALL STARS—*Double Date (Columbia).

ART TATUM—Piano solo album (Capitol).

The world's greatest jazz pianist plays Dancing In The Dark, Nice Work If You Can Get It, and other old favorites.

RAYMOND SCOTT—*Dedicatory Piece To The Crew And Passengers Of The First Experimental Rocket To The Moon (Master).

Raymond Scott's music is as odd as his titles. He has recorded ten new sides, each coupling an original opus like this one with a standard tune, such as Sometimes I'm Happy, Dinah, etc. Good vocals by Dorothy Collins.

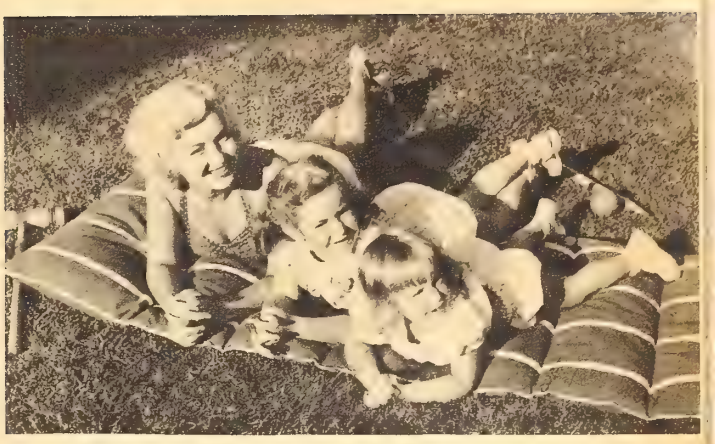
Here's new insight into an amazing character who never stops running. by Jim Burton



■ You probably heard the broadcast. It was the kick-off show for the 1950 Cancer Fund Drive, with a nation-wide hookup, an all-star Hollywood cast—and, of course, Bob Hope. He sang with Jo Stafford, acted with Roz Russell, kidded with Jimmy Durante, signed off with "Thanks For The Memory" and dashed to a waiting car headed for the airport and New York.

Two technicians in the control booth stared after him for a full minute, before one of them commented, "I just don't see how he keeps it up. Some starry evening he's going to pitch right over on his face."

Practically everyone who has worked with Bob Hope during the past two years has made a similar observation. It's impossible to watch the unrelenting way he drives himself without nervously wondering when the breaking point will come.

She's Hollywood's sexiest show girl, her legs are worth a million. But Grable's glitter works like a clock—and she turns it off at five.

■ One recent afternoon, Victoria James, aged six, sat viewing Wabash Avenue, in which her mother, Betty Grable, came at her like a creature out of another world. When the scene flashed on where Betty blew her top and pitched a few dozen shoes around the room, Vicki stared in amazement, then tugged anxiously at her father's sleeve.

"What's the matter?" she whispered. "Mama doesn't act like that at home!"

Vicki hit it right on the nose: Mama doesn't act like that at home. In fact, Mama doesn't act at all. About the last thing you'd suspect at the James house is that Mama ever wears tights.

To Vicki, Mama is a beautiful, golden-haired lady who, around eight months out of the year, gives her a good-bye hug after breakfast at 6:30, goes off to work, and shows up again at 5:30 P.M. to have dinner with her, Jessica and Daddy. Then, after another hour or so she tucks her into bed with a sweet-scented kiss.

It would be impossible for Vicki to imagine that Mama is Hollywood's sexiest show girl, that her boss at Twentieth Century-Fox gratefully (Continued on page 95)

hollywood's six loneliest stars

Ronald Reagan vainly searched two continents for happiness.

Rita Hayworth fled, too—sought peace with Aly and Yasmin.

Hollywood is full of lonely people. It would take a fat volume to list them all. Comic or terrifying figures on the screen; sophisticates or madcaps in public; lavish hosts or sought-after guests—alone, they are the lonely ones with tears for companions.

It has always been this way. As long as Hollywood has been news, there have been juicy stories of the erratic adventures of the stars. The stars, explained the newspapers, had too much money, or too much fame, or too great a craving for narcotic thrills. The real villain was never unmasked. No one ever suggested that it was the maladjustment brought on by years of loneliness that forced those sudden, pathetic escapes into unreality.

When we select six stars, and say that these are the loneliest in Hollywood it is presumptuous of us. But we do it only because these six are the obvious ones, the stars, who more than the others, feel their loneliness, wear it better, have a current reason for melancholy.

The first is Shelley Winters . . . Picture a Christmas party at Paramount studios. It's one of the most famous events to attend on Christmas Eve. Fellowship and good cheer are everywhere. This particular year it was no different. Movie celebrities filled the big room until the walls bulged. Wine flowed freely; laughter was loud and carefree. In the center of the gayest group was Shelley Winters. She sat on the edge of a table, her golden hair like a flash of sunlight in the dark—and she was the gayest of them all.

Fifteen minutes later, one of the girls at the party was walking down the dimly-lit hall when she heard an odd, mournful sound coming from one of the empty offices. She opened the door stealthily, and there alone, her face turned toward the open window and the starlit sky, Shelley Winters sat on the floor, sobbing.

This is not an unusual story; not an isolated incident in a full life. Just an honest breakdown by the gayest girl in moviedom. For, you see, Shelley Winters is lonely.

She's impatient, too. Undisciplined, uninhibited as a puppy, she's lonely because she hasn't found a playmate of her own calibre. And when the party is the merriest, she will sit on the floor and cry for this companion she hasn't been able to find.

No one can deny that she's searched. The list of her escorts is as long as the arm of an ape. She's flitted from man to man like a squirrel seeking winter food. Each time there's been a new one, Shelley has blossomed. She's appeared in public places on the arm of a lad with possibilities and acted as though that was it, here was the boy. Then there would be a line or two in a column. "Shelley Winters and So-and-so turned a lot of heads last night as they skipped three blocks down Sunset Boulevard."

Then, for a dozen nights, Shelley would sit home alone, or go to a drive-in for a midnight cup of coffee, or lie wide awake in a nine o'clock bed counting the shadows on the ceiling, hoping to find the face of a male mad-cap there. Then she'd find the face at another party. She'd suggest on their third date that they take a dip in the fountain in the square in the center of town—and the bum would run like a coward. And she'd start her search again . . .

The anatomy of loneliness is varied and secret. No two people have the same requirements for happiness, the same reason for despair. But there is one thing all lonely stars have in common. They lack the tendencies for fraternity that a perfectly normal, well-adjusted person has—and most of them select their intimate companions warily, with infinite, soul-searching patience.

Take Lizabeth Scott, one of the six. A naturally lighthearted girl with the healthy body of a peasant and the face of a cover girl, Lizabeth spends many lonely hours gazing out of the window of her hill-top home, wishing she were someplace else, with a man, with a good pal—anywhere but on the hill-top alone . . .

John Agar's loneliness led to trouble—drunken driving.

Shelley Winters can't find a playmate.

BY HEDDA HOPPER

One mistake, one broken dream—that's all the world will take from Temple. But Hedda Hopper's gone to bat for her!

Shirley attended the San Francisco Bachelors' Ball with socialite Charles Black, whom she met in Hawaii. She denies engagement.

■ Last winter, right after her ugly divorce proceedings, Shirley Temple flew to Hawaii, her second home. Three times before, she'd been there, in '35, '37 and '39, but then it was different. Then she was the dimpled darling of the world, and Hawaii had treated her like a princess. Now she was a front-paged Hollywood divorcée, the target of gossip and whispered scandal.

She was almost afraid for the plane to land. But when it did there were three thousand people waiting to greet her, waiting to deck her with leis, waiting to take her into their hearts again. Shirley was overcome with gratitude.

Then, six weeks later, she flew back to Hollywood. When she arrived, there was no welcome at all—only photographers with blinding flashbulbs, and reporters with nagging questions. She was back on the defensive.

One newspaper featured a blast at Hollywood's morals under the headline, "Bergman, Hayworth and Temple," linking Shirley unfairly with two really shocking cases of moral offense. A columnist boldly announced—and wrongly—that Hollywood producers were afraid to put Shirley Temple in a picture for fear of public disapproval, that she was casting poison, that she was through.

On her desk were stacks of mail, most of it cruel. Cranks gathered outside her home and lectured her for her sinful ways. Every time she was seen with a friend it was headlined as a new romance.

She was a Hollywood divorcée, wasn't she—and fair game. Well, it wasn't fair to Shirley. I think it's high time someone went to bat for her. I'm sick and tired of the dim light she's been put in, and I'm outraged to see the shadow cast by another chasing her out of the sunshine she rates.

AT VANESSA BROWN'S HOUSE THEY CALLED IT MUSIC. BUT I'M NO FOOL—I CALL IT MADNESS.

■ All I did was drop by Vanessa Brown's house one Saturday afternoon to return a book. I rang the doorbell and the only answer I got was a deafening crash, followed by a squeak.

Being well brought up, but curious, I ventured around to the side of the house. Vanessa was home, I saw, and she had company—a room full of musicians (they looked like musicians) who were having a jam session. They stopped when Vanessa noticed my head resting on the windowsill.

"Do you play?" she asked.

"Only the radio," I answered forlornly.

"Well, come in and listen," she invited cordially. "You've never heard anything like it."

I never have. But I've never seen six (Cont'd on page 38)

Nobody laughed when Vanessa Brown sat down to play. Betty Lynn, Rand Brooks and Wanda Hendrix find some real talent in their mids

Wanda prepares to out-Benny Jack on the violin while the rest of the band pulls itself together. Dick Erdman is drummer, Rand Brooks is behind him with a guitar, Brett King's under the tuba. Betty has a zither, Vanessa a slide trombone.

During an intermission, while the other musicians rest their ears, Rand Brooks shows Wanda and Betty how he strums on the old guitar as Lucky in the Hopalong Cassidy series.

Vanessa and the gang go out to the veranda for a buffet supper of tuna salad, cold meat and apples. The food looks too pretty to eat. (Salad recipes on next page.)

The music goes round and round at Vanessa Brown's party—and it comes out soap bubbles. Betty Lynn provides zither accompaniment for Brett King and tuba.

Dick Erdman, who filled Brett's tuba with soapy water, settles down for a hot lick at the drums. "Just call me Krupa," he told Wanda. But having stuffed her ears with cotton, Wanda remains unmoved during the performance.

Vanessa's Tuna Crunch Salad

- 1 No. ½ can Star-Kist Tuna (Fancy Solid Pack or Chunk Style)
- 4½ tablespoons chopped sweet or dill pickle
- 1½ tablespoons minced onion
- 1 cup mayonnaise
- 1½ tablespoons lemon juice
- 1½ cups crisp shredded cabbage
- 1 small bag potato chips, coarsely crushed
- lettuce
- tomato wedges

Combine tuna, pickle, onion, mayonnaise and lemon juice; chill in covered dish until ready to serve. Add cabbage and toss together. Just before serving, add half of crushed potato chips and toss lightly. Heap into shallow, lettuce-lined salad bowl, sprinkle rest of chips on top, garnish with tomato wedges. Serves 6.

people have more fun. Vanessa went back to the piano. Wanda Hendrix gave her violin a pleading look and began to saw. Rand Brooks put a guitar on his knee. Brett King wrestled with a tuba while Betty Lynn decided which end of her zither was up. Dick Erdman drowned them all out as he pounded a set of drums.

"New composition?" I asked gaily.

"It's the 'Johnson Rag,'" Rand replied in a tone that made me feel like crawling into the tuba.

"Don't worry," Betty said. "We'll perfect it—one of these sessions."

The sessions usually occur on Saturdays. But you never can tell. Sometimes, they happen on a Sunday. No one's very good. No one's very serious. Which means they always have the time of their lives.

I settled back to watch. Suddenly the room was comparatively quiet. Everyone's eyes were fastened on Brett and the tuba. His eyes were closed and he was blowing hard. He didn't know that he was blowing bubbles.

"What talent," Wanda gasped.

Brett's eyes flew open and he held his instrument at arm's length, which is quite a feat if you've ever held a tuba. "Aw, all it takes is soapy water," said Dick Erdman (who'd supplied same). To add to the confusion, Dick suddenly broke into a drum solo, a hangover from his days in a high school band. (Continued on page 79)

I don't want sympathy

by Kirk Douglas

I was the poorest kid in town, but don't pity me. I learned what love meant, I learned about faith . . .

■ I wouldn't trade my wrong side of the tracks background for a Fifth Avenue mansion. I mean that. The proudest youngsters you see are the ones whose families don't have much, because those youngsters are secure in being loved, and love makes up for no money in the bank.

I'm glad now that I lived at the bottom of the hill instead of at the top. Without that beginning I might not now have my greatest asset—the devotion of my mother and father and six sisters.

I never wanted pity—although at one time I was a pitiable figure. I remember the afternoon I was doing some typing on the seventeenth floor of a New York skyscraper. At the moment I had turned to look out of the window and ask myself, "How can (Continued on page 80)

She's all that's beautiful, she's glamor with a sigh—yet Ava Gardner's afraid to love, afraid to be herself . . .

THE STRANGE FEARS OF AVA GARDNER

■ I'd hate to be Ava Gardner. Maybe this sounds crazy. After all, what girl in her right mind wouldn't want to be gorgeous, famous and irresistible? I repeat. Not me. Don't misunderstand. What I have, Ava Gardner is lucky to be without. And if a camera ever came near me I'd probably shoot first. So it's not sour grapes.

All I know is, there's one thing in the world that's harder than being an actress—and that's being Ava Gardner, too.

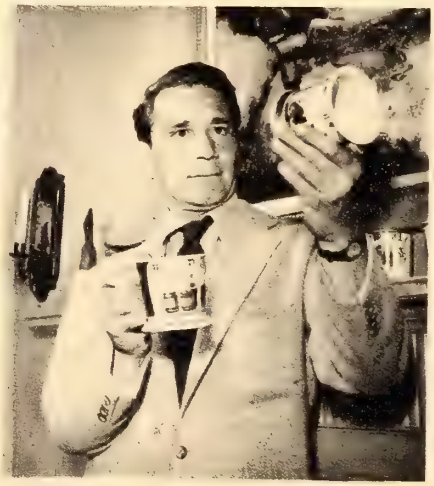
Show you what I mean. One day, quite a while ago, I stood gazing at this fabulous creature and finally, I said, "Ava, honey, I guess you have just about everything."

She looked through me as if I were a glass wall, and she said, "Leslie, sometimes I think I have nothing at all."

Sounds silly, doesn't it? A woman like that. Why you just know she couldn't be happier. Only you don't know my friend Ava—the girl who thinks she has nothing at all; the girl who's pursued by so many strange fears she needs a file case to sort them.

All right, so you don't believe it. Everybody has fears, you say, what's so amazing about that? Well, doesn't it strike you as pretty amazing when a woman like Ava is afraid of losing a man?

Don't laugh. She was afraid not too long ago, and what's more, she lost the man —forever. He married someone else.



Ava was seeing quite a bit of Howard Duff at the time, but that was a blind to avoid publicity; the sort of publicity she got in her skirmishes with Artie Shaw. This man she loved was not an actor, he was in business and because his marriage is happy it wouldn't be fair to reveal his identity. But he was a plain, not startlingly handsome guy, and hardly the sort you'd picture for Ava.

■ He used to be a student in Professor Michael Gordon's drama class. I sat next to him. Every time he looked my way I smiled. When he didn't, I worried. You can see how it was with me.

With him it was different. All he cared about was acting. One day when he was very busy ignoring me for some notes he was scribbling, I nudged him with my elbow.

"What are you doing?" I said.

"Writing a biography of the character I'm playing," he said, not looking up.

"Oh. The lead?"

"No. A walk-on. I walk across the park looking lonely."

"Are you nuts!" I exclaimed.

"Look, he's supposed to be real, isn't he? There are a hundred ways he could look and behave. I have to know the one way he'd walk across the park. To know that I have to know his whole story."

One day, a couple of weeks later, a distinguished looking man in his fifties rang my doorbell. He had grey hair, a crisp mustache, and was wearing a fur-collared coat.

"Sorry," I said, starting to close the door. "You have the wrong apartment."

But I couldn't close the door; he had his foot stuck in it. I was terrified. I could just see the next day's headlines, YOUNG ACTRESS FOUND DEAD.

A moment later, it dawned on me, the man was Richard Conte, all rigged up for that walk-on role!

"You crazy fool!" I shouted, and started to laugh, and I guess, right then, I fell in love.

A little over a year later, he telephoned me from Hollywood.

"Come on out," he said.

"What for?" I asked him.

So I dropped the phone and caught a train, and on May 21, 1943, we were married.

At that time, Nicky was working on Guadalcanal Diary, and we practically spent our honeymoon on the set. Oh, I'd dreamt of lazy hours at the beach, of outdoor dining to violin music, of dancing under the stars . . . But what I got were the sounds of guns booming, of planes whining as they dived to attack, of machine guns frantically rat-tat-tatting. The studio had transformed those peaceful beaches and hills into a convincing replica of Guadalcanal. And every evening my groom came home exhausted, unshaven, smeared with jungle slime.

Nothing seemed normal any more. Once Nicky had to leave me for three days to go to a different location, and on one of those days I decided to learn to fish. I rented some equipment at a dock, and I (Continued on page 99)

It's hard to be a teen-ager, especially if you're a star. Ask Joan Evans who has more critics than cocktail parties, and for every laugh, two sighs.

"EVERYTHING HAPPENS TO ME"

■ If you're under twenty-one, you can't win. No matter what you do someone older and wiser is around to tell you that it's wrong. And if you're a teen-age movie star, I pity you.

Take the case of Joan Evans. A couple of months ago, a radio commentator blasted her on the air. He told her that she should be mortified about the way she behaved at the Academy Awards presentation, that she looked twice her age and acted half of it, that her red evening dress was cheap and that her makeup was an inch thick.

"Well," said Joan, when the attack was over, "I guess I'm in. When he takes a crack at you—you're in."

Those were her words, but she was hurt deeply. She'd been misunderstood by that radio commentator, but there was no way of getting back at him.

Now I saw Joan at the Academy Awards; I saw the way she looked and acted. I'd like to tell you about it.

You know, Award night is one of the biggest events in Hollywood. To Joan it was as important as a high school prom, magnified a thousand times. So she thought about it for months in advance. planned for it, hoped (Continued on page 92)

■ It was bad enough when he whistled in his dressing room—that was worse than breaking five mirrors. But on his way to the studio commissary, not ten minutes later, Richard Todd followed a black cat under a ladder, caught it by the tail, and proceeded to pat it (the cat).

"Nice kitten," he said serenely.

A group of extras from his set watched for a moment in horror. "Hey, Dick—you shouldn't be doing that," one of them shouted hoarsely.

Richard Todd looked up and grinned. He continued stroking the coal black fur. The cat purred gratefully, and lightning didn't even strike. Richard was doing what he felt like doing, and as usual, people were telling him not to.

"You shouldn't!" was a familiar phrase. He was practically raised on it. And today, he has the same respect for those particular words as he has for "you can't" or "you mustn't." Not much. He accepts them graciously, then happily ignores them.

However, on one occasion he met a man who said, "You should." The incident occurred at a cocktail party in London. Vincent Sherman, the guest of honor, was in England to direct The Hasty Heart. He'd brought along a great script and had lined up a fine cast. But one of his actors was missing—a player who could portray (Continued on page 97)

Gossip's cheap. It comes easy about the Toppings. But they won't let words wreck their marriage.

BY MARJORIE HAYDEN

The people in the portrait at the left (Lana, her daughter Cheryl, and Bob Topping) look as happy and as placid as you'd expect any young, wealthy family to look. But don't let the gossipers hear you say that. Only two years of marriage, and they've built up a case about that lady and her home life. Lana, they say, is going through a crisis. Unless she and her husband solve certain recurring problems, Topping and Turner will part.

Problems? What married couple doesn't have them? Arguments? Sure, the Toppings have a few. If you're not in love your wife can go off and shoot herself, and you won't argue. Otherwise, arguments can happen.

What's the basis for all this gossip? Nothing much. A rumor printed, a comment overheard, reports of a sudden cancellation of a trip to Japan, reports of a stormy quarrel in Mexico . . .

It isn't nice to delve into the privacy of anyone's married life. It isn't polite, and besides, you come up with all kinds of ridiculous stories—like the one a radio commentator told recently. Lana, he said, received a black eye as a gift from Bob. Actually, Lana hasn't had a black eye since she fell down the cellar steps when she was eight years old.

Well, let's delve a little ourselves to get nearer the truth. To begin with, Lana married Bob Topping after a very brief courtship. Too brief, say the gossipers, she had to combine the courtship and the honeymoon and the first year adjustments to marriage. That's too much of a challenge.

It's a challenge, all right, but other women have met it, so did Lana. It's pretty rare to find a young wife who, during the first two years of marriage, hasn't asked herself, "Why did I do it? —Does he love me?—Do I love him?"

dead end street. It was built in the early days of modern architecture when a sunken bathtub was the last word in plumbing, and a movie star felt cramped if she could see both ends of the drawing room. Originally, it belonged to Dolores Del Rio and Cedric Gibbons, and there aren't many more places like it in Hollywood, or anywhere else.

There's a big wall surrounding it, and huge trees hiding it, and heavy old doors in front of it that would put fear into a welcome mat. Tremendous lawns lead down to a fenced-in swimming pool with its stone bath house, and to the tennis court with its own little house.

austere and forbidding, but the people inside destroy that impression.

The master of the house, for instance, likes to wash his argyle socks in the imported black marble sink in the bathroom. No one else can touch his argyles; the colors might run. For him they stand still as he puts the socks on stretchers and hangs them along the wall.

The bathroom, with its imported marble and indirect lighting, and the silver-leaf dressing room next to it are fancy enough for a C. B. DeMille epic.

In fact, as soon as you enter the house, you feel like looking for an usher. The large entrance hall leads to a cocoa-and-white reception room where built-in white couches stand on either side of the fireplace. Oil paintings (one of them is a street scene by Van), soft fur rugs and green plants in wall boxes complete the decor.

"There's too much space, and not enough room," says Evie.

"Exactly," says Van.

What they mean is, they'd like more room for the children and less for the furniture.

Both Evie and Van have wonderful ideas about decorating, but so many pieces are built in (the couches, the record player, the bookshelves) they don't get much chance to express themselves.

Evie finds an outlet in lamps. She can buy almost anything and make it into a lamp. There's a brass toy stove with tiny kitchen utensils on it that she transformed, and an old coffee mill that won't ever see a coffee grain again.

Upstairs, in her bedroom, there are blackamoor lamps on bedside ladder tables. The bed, itself, is extra-size with an upholstered headboard. Here, as in almost all the rooms, the walls become windows above a height of eight feet, and great eucalyptus trees look in.

Upstairs, too, is the boys' wing, and the den. You reach them by way of a thickly-carpeted staircase. The den is at one end of a room twenty by forty feet in size. In one corner of the room there's a small piano, crowded bookshelves and ten-foot long couches, as well as a leather game table and chairs.

At the den end, there are more bookshelves, a large, triangular desk, and Van's home-movie equipment. Leather bound volumes of his movies are stacked on the shelves. (He's just finished The Big Hangover, and the Duchess of Idaho). Evie calls that collection, "the blood, sweat and tears section." They also have a collection of movie prints, and a cameraman—namely, Van. You can find him almost any free day—when he isn't playing tennis with Evie, or swimming, or off skiing at Aspen with the Gary Coopers—sitting on the floor surrounded by miles of black celluloid.

"Got some wonderful stuff," Van says. "A movie of Liz Taylor on vacation—that's a pip. Movie of Lana Turner's daughter's birthday party. And a complete record of our kids for the last three years." (That's how long Evie and Van have been married.)

Van doesn't like other people to take pictures of his children. It's not professional jealousy; he just doesn't want them posing when they feel like playing. "It's all right if the kids like to pose," he says. "But ours aren't hams at heart."

The boys, Neddy and Tracy (Evie's children by her marriage to Keenan Wynn) like to stand around and watch Van. It doesn't matter what he's doing—painting in oils, splicing a film, reading a book—they'll be there at his elbow.

BY GEORGE BENJAMIN

■ How old do you have to be to be too old—30—40—55? When do you have to put away your nylons and pose with a parasol? "Not yet!" cry the stars who've been romancing on the screen for twenty years. More and more, the young newcomers struggling to grab a hunk of stardom, are giving up, are going home to Punxsutawney.

Hollywood producers have to face a grim fact. They must either give a break to newcomers, or they must sit back and watch thousands of people walk out of movie theaters.

And Hollywood's big stars have to face a grim fact; they're not getting any younger, even though their roles remain the same.

Greer Garson, for one, was rudely awakened a short time ago. Magnificent trouper though she is, she had tears in her eyes as she read the reviews of Julia Misbehaves. The critics weren't kind. Sure, they said, it was a lot of fun to see her romping around in opera length stockings, but that role should have gone to someone twenty years younger.

Twenty years younger? Just how young or old is Greer Garson? No one knows officially. Studio workers say she's in her late thirties. Others insist she's closer to fifty. If you look in the Motion Picture Almanac, where all the stars are listed, you'll see that Greer has a birthday, although she wasn't born in any particular year.

Luckily for Greer, she's decided to act her age, even though she keeps her age a secret. In The Miniver Story, sequel to Mrs. Miniver which made her one of our most beloved stars, she may again establish herself as a ruling favorite. Who is Jane Wyman?

BY IDA ZEITLIN

■ Every night she'd say the Lord's Prayer. Then she'd add her own particular passionate plea. "Please, please, dear God, give me wisdom—" With wisdom, she'd never have to cry herself to sleep or care whether Mary Lou liked her or not. Wisdom would make her happy.

She was eight then, but she'd already learned that wisdom doesn't come in a gift-wrapped package. It took her longer to discover that the search for wisdom is fundamentally the search for oneself, that until you've found yourself, any promise of happiness is just a big fat mirage . . .

Most of her life Jane Wyman's been somebody else. She's been Torchy Blaine, the flip babe, the brittle sophisticate always making with the wisecracks. She was also—paradoxically—the girl who walked a little alone, guarding the core of herself against invasion, wary of people who seemed to be moving in on her. If you tried getting too close to Jane, the protective curtain dropped. You could come so far, and no further.

There were moments, at first, when she looked inward, bewildered. "This isn't me. Why in heaven's name don't I stop?" There were long years when her assumed personality built itself up, layer by layer, and Jane thought she was happy within its shell. The other self lay buried so deep, it was practically lost. Only it refused to stay buried.

Let's answer one question before you ask it. None of this bears any relation to Jane's marriage and divorce. Go up and down the land, and you won't meet a finer person than Ronnie Reagan. She'll be the first to tell you so. No matter what pattern her life had followed, Jane would have had this private battle to face and to fight alone . . .

As with so many problems, its seeds were planted in childhood. Jane was the daughter of her parents' later years. A much older brother and sister were already married. She grew up in a home where her father was ill and required most of her mother's attention. Therefore she was lonely. At school, there were some girls to play with. After school, there was no one. With a sick man in the house, you couldn't have a bunch of noisy kids around . . .

One day she visited a schoolmate whose mother, a lively young woman, came out and jumped rope with them. To Jane, this was a minor miracle. That (Continued on page 60)

She was the flip babe with a wisecrack on her lips

She knew it was as silly to expect her mother to jump rope as to fly the trapeze. But wishing was Jane's escape from reality into the never-never land where dreams come true.

She was a proud and sensitive child. Sensitivity made her vulnerable; pride kept her fiercely bent on hiding the wounds. Present-day psychology tells us that the gap between one generation and another often makes understanding difficult. Between Jane and her mother lay almost two generations. Her mother had been brought up by certain standards which were right for her, and must therefore be right for her daughter. One was plain dressing. Younger mothers wrapped their kids' hair in curl-papers. Jane's hair always hung straight. Other kids sported silk stockings on special occasions, and white shoes tipped with patent leather. Jane wore cotton stockin She did own a pair of white shoes, which were strictly church. The minute she got home, off they came. Blouses a skirts were a must with the other kids. Jane wore dress Trying to get the effect of a skirt and blouse, she'd tie dresses so tight that the only effect she got was a busted stri

Jane's mother hadn't studied psychology. She didn't kn that nothing's harder on a child than being different from rest. In her old-fashioned clothes, Jane felt as self-consci as a poor relation. Children can be cruel, and there may ha been slights enough. But even where none were intended, J looked for them. Any knot of giggling girls stirred une suspicion that she was the target of their giggles. Each thru real or imagined, struck deeper and deeper. And with e thrust she carried her head higher. They could hurt her, sure, but she'd die before letting them know.

From school she'd go home to find solace in the game of chairs. This consisted of placing chairs in a circle and pretending they were people. She'd talk to them and have them talk back to her. All the chairs loved Jane, all the chairs thought her clothes were simply wonderful. She didn't have to worry about the tone of a voice or the look in an eye. She knew they'd always be kind and affectionate.

Like every child, she craved the tangible evidence of affection. She wanted to be hugged and kissed and patted on the head. Her mother was shy of demonstration, as many older people are with children. Jane herself finds it hard to say, "I like you" to a friend. Her actions will make it abundantly clear, but words stick in her throat.

This inability to give expression to feeling may have come from her mother. As a child, Jane was on the receiving end. Unconscious of the stresses and strains that go to make up a human personality, instinct told her that behind the wall of reticence her mother loved her. Just as instinctively she groped for articulate tenderness. She'd keep her room shining neat, hoping to be praised. She'd pick up scattered newspapers and shove the living room furniture around, hoping someone would say how pretty it looked. Mother didn't have many clothes. In her favorite daydream, Jane somehow earned enough money to buy a new dress and toss it grandly into her mother's lap. For years she basked in the warmth of that prospect . . .

Republic Studios couldn't persuade him. Roy knows his rights. He's a father, and a father-to-be, and an American. He stood his ground.

"Next year," he says grandly, "we'll all go to England."

He may change his mind about that. All of the Rogers household means Roy, Dale, Virginia and Emily (who run the place), Cheryl, Linda and Dusty (who run Roy and Dale), six horses, 15 dogs, 35 pigeons and three hamsters. You total it.

Dale doesn't let that amount throw her. Only a couple of weeks ago she walked up to Roy and said, "You know, I've been thinking. If it's a girl, we'll have to get ourselves a boy."

"You sure you've been thinking?" asked Roy.

"Don't tease," she said, "in my condition. What I mean is, I don't want Dusty to grow up surrounded by girls."

"Listen," said Roy, "we have six horses, 15 dogs, 35 pigeons and three hamsters. A little boy will get lost."

"I'll watch him," said Dale.

"Promise?"

Dale promised. So if it's a girl they'll adopt a boy. And if it's a boy they'll probably buy a few more horses.

They have the names picked out already (for the children, that is). A girl they'll call Robin Elizabeth, in public, and Stormy, in private. The boy they'll name John Hillman (after Dale's father and brother).

Dale broke the news about the baby to her other children one by one.

She told Cheryl first.

"I hope it's a girl," Cheryl said. Cheryl's of the old school. She thinks little boys are made of "rats and snails and puppy dogs' tails." To convince her that little boys were really human beings, Dale let Cheryl give Dusty his bath, hear his prayers and put him to bed. Maybe Dale should have let her experiment with someone else. Cheryl's still set on a girl.

Linda Lou, who is tolerant and almost too good-natured, took the news differently. "I hope it's a boy," she said, "so Dusty'll have someone to play with."

Dusty has a more objective attitude. A few months ago he came across a nine-month-old baby when he was out visiting with his Mom and Dad. Immediately he took charge—picked the baby up, put it down, rocked it, sang to it, watched it sleep. He was completely fascinated.

"What would you like," Dale asked him, "a brother or a sister?"

"Aw," he said, "I'd rather have a baby!"

A few moments later, he came up to Dale, looking a little unhappy.

"What is it?" asked Dale. "Did you change your mind?"

Dusty shook his head. Then suddenly he shot the words out. "Will you like the new baby better than me?" he asked.

Dale bent down and swooped him up in her arms. "You're Dusty," she said. "Nobody can ever take your place."

Dusty was satisfied. When she brings the baby home from the hospital, Dale plans on letting all the children pitch in and take care of it. She wants them to know from the start that the baby isn't hers alone, but belongs to all of them.

Dale isn't new to motherhood. When she was very young and married to someone else, she had a boy, Tommy. Not long ago, Tommy married his college sweetheart. Dale's marriage to Roy brought her a ready-made family—two girls, and sometimes, she thinks—two boys. The big boy is Roy.

"Every time I see him talking to his dogs or puttering around with the pigeons," she says, "I see a twelve-year-old kid back in Duck Run, Ohio, 'prettying up' his prize pet for the State Fair.

"He's been crazy about animals all his life, and nowadays when he lets his hound dogs come into the house with muddy paws I feel just the way his mother must have felt back in Duck Run years ago—exasperated, of course, but full of tenderness toward a kid who'll never really grow up."

Dale senses that part of the secret of Roy's tremendous popularity is this boy-like quality. Children feel that he speaks their language, that it wasn't so long ago when he was a kid himself, milking cows, planting corn, wandering barefoot.

"I wish I could've known him then," Dale says. "He went to a little red schoolhouse, teased his three sisters, hung around the grownups when they had Saturday night shindigs. He learned how to be a first class 'git-box' pounder and square dance caller himself before he was in his teens. When he was fourteen, his class at school made a trip to Hanging Rock, one of the scenic wonders of Ohio, and he still remembers it as one of the highspots in his life.

"I guess our kids won't get any more thrill next year when they go to England than Roy got those years ago at Hanging Rock."

With his kids along, though, Roy may get the thrill of his lifetime.

He's happy about the new baby. He and Dale have decided to turn the guest room into a nursery, and let whatever guests come sleep in the den. If the family gets any larger, they'll turn the den into a dormitory and turn the guests out into the guest house. It all depends on the kids.

In fact, the Rogers' whole attitude about children has given them wonderful reputations as parents. What they try to teach the children most is kindness and consideration for every living creature. One of the reasons they have so many animals is that they believe that if the children grow up loving animals, they will love everything human.

Roy can be stern. He doesn't believe in sparing the rod when a child is crying out to be spanked. But with every punishment goes an explanation, and a child is never spanked in anger.

"To be a good parent," Dale says, "you have to know your children as individuals. All three of our children have different personalities, and different problems—Cheryl's imaginative in the extreme, Dusty has a temper, Linda Lou is sometimes too unassertive. You shouldn't have children unless you can give them individual attention."

When the baby arrives, Dale will drop most of her outside activities, except for some movies, to give all her children all the attention they need. And when he comes home after work, Mr. Rogers will get his share.

It's a pretty big family. Go ahead, count them. Then multiply that number by happiness. THE END

private cooling systems

by connie bartel, fashion editor

■ Is it possible to keep cool, when the heat rises from the very walls and pavements, and the humidity is doing its best to wilt you?

We think it is. Heat—and coolth—are at least partly states of mind; you can't help feeling cool if you look cool. Therefore, say we, install your own private cooling systems, in the form of special summer grooming and mercury-dropping, fashions. It ups the morale!

First, lots of showers, naturally—and lots of light cologne splashed on afterward. Plenty of fragrant summer undies, especially crisp cottons. And then, when you're brushed and polished and fresh and smell beautiful, slip into the coolest-feeling, coolest-looking, lightest-weighing fashions you can find.

Such as, for instance the airy coin-dot sheer Virginia Mayo wears opposite—a refreshing dress if we ever saw one. For hot days when you must pound pavements and look townish, try the squared and dotted sheer on page 64, or the silky dark cotton on page 65—both godsend dresses that make you feel "dressed" but keep you cool.

On your own front porch, in the country or for dancing evenings—bare your shoulders. The lighthearted bare-back fashions on pages 66 and 67 will show your tan—but if sleeves are suddenly necessary, quick!—a matching jacket, and you're covered.

And for the super cooler of all—there's always the ocean and a quick splash in the spray—in the most minimum suits you can find. Namely, the sophisticated stripe on the plaid faille on page 68. All coolly calculating—all designed to make your public marvel—"hot weather agrees with you!"

■ Virginia Mayo, soon to be seen in Warner Brothers' The Flame and the Arrow looks as appealing as raspberry frappe, in the color of the same name. Her airy coin-dot sheer dress has floating cap sleeves and drifting full skirt—as sweet a summer look as we've seen.

The dress is Bemberg rayon sheer. Raspberry, aqua, grey, or toast. Sizes 10-18. By Barbette. $8.95

A police report of a few months ago stated that John Agar was arrested late at night and taken from his automobile to a station house in a drunken and belligerent condition. He'd allegedly started a fight with another motorist over a simple infraction of courtesy on the road. Agar was alone. . . .

Robert Walker fought his loneliness in the open. He didn't hide in a dark corner and curse it. He railed against it and set himself up as something of a crusader. It got his name in the papers.

Walker found the right weapon, and he used it. He bought a quiet home to share with his sons in a pretty valley where very rich people live. At every post in the valley there's a warning: PRIVATE—KEEP OUT . . . BEWARE OF DOG . . . TRESPASSERS WILL BE PROSECUTED. . . . But at the Walker gate, there's a simple legend, written by a man who knew loneliness better than the others, and who knows its terrors. The sign has one word on a white shingle—WELCOME.

When she was in Hollywood, Rita Hayworth was high up on the list of lonely ones. She'd been through the mill. Married twice, despondent, fed up with waiting for the one man when she knew it was too late, she left Hollywood, in desperation, with Aly Khan.

Rita was a star of the first magnitude, and after work at night, she could have had a hundred dates, but when the butler announced the names of the bidders, they all came out of his mouth Joe Schmoe. Lucky Rita. Love is now a burning passion with her, but she couldn't and didn't find it in Hollywood.

Ronald Reagan, last but not the least lonely of the six, can't lose his loneliness in or out of Hollywood. Since his separation from his wife, Reagan has been the embodiment of the solitary male with nothing to do, and no place to go. He's traveled to Europe, been toasted by the society folk of two continents, but he is still buried in solitude and unhappiness.

All this isn't new. It's no invention of our current crop of actors and actresses. The melancholy order has been with us since Edison first showed his little box with the crank and the glass eye to an actor. And the actor said, "Hold that horse for a minute, and let me get in front of that thing, and see how I look."

The classic example is Garbo. Experts on Hollywood behavior say that Garbo never smiled unless she got paid for it. Why this sour puss on the greatest of all the Swedes? Was it the fact that she wanted money? Well, yes. But it was something else, too. She was brought to America as a lure for a famous Swedish director the studio wanted here.

By the time the director came, and decided that Hollywood was no place for an ambitious Swede, somebody had discovered Garbo. When she tried to follow the director home, she was all but tied down and covered with dollars. She stayed, but neither hell nor high water could make her compatible for the rest of her brilliant career. "I tank I go home now," became a national joke, but Garbo wasn't kidding.

She was a lonely, friendless woman, ever in a strange land. Misunderstood, bitter because of her loneliness, she's destined to go down in film history as Hollywood's richest lady hermit.

Back, too, in another day, there was John Barrymore, who sat alone night after night in his monstrous mansion, and brooded on the lack of companionship. He found a friend at last in a bottle, and it never left him. And when he died, two men, only two, kept the death watch, and wept.

Charlie Chaplin, the genius, the funniest man alive, counted his intimate friends and became a bitter man. He found no solace in the cheers of the crowd. The cheers disturbed whatever human relationships he might have been able to nourish, the cheers pressed him into his current shell of loneliness.

No, there's no novelty in loneliness in Hollywood. Look at the list in the Passport Bureau. You'll find the names of many stars there—seeking passage to far places where they are not so well known, and where they may find a friend, or a lover who will fit into their private lives.

Ingrid Bergman has been quoted as saying that she was unhappy for many years here. She was married, but marriage, unless it is a proper mating, is no panacea for loneliness. And along came a hot-blooded Italian as possessive as a zoo-keeper and Bergman tossed everything aside. Why? He offered her love; he offered her a shelter against loneliness. Condonement is not our intention, we merely state facts.

Cary Grant, at the height of his stardom, walked the spaceless beaches of Malibu in the rain and in the moonlight searching for an answer in the moonstones. He spent endless days watching the sea break on the shore and recede to nowhere, likening it to the adulation that surged and left, leaving nothing or no one to remain a companion. Until one day he found that companion.

And the King. Gable, the handsomest man in the world. Encino was his home—the wide acres of ground he had bought with Carole Lombard. White fences and green fields were all that was left when she died. He spent years there, walking new furrows, petting friendly dogs and whispering into the ears of horses who couldn't answer back or laugh with him. "Gable is back and Garson's got him" was a big yak. Gable was back all right, and melancholy had him. And when he was married, the writers had a field day. She's not very pretty, they said. She's probably forty. They didn't know she was an answer to a long-said prayer. A woman who could walk into a room and make his heart swell with delight that she belonged to him.

Deep in the heart of every movie star there is a core of warmth. It must be there or they would not be good actors. But by the time they have achieved stardom, circumstances have coated the core with a hide of iron. To get to the center of their warmth it is necessary to break down a lot of barriers. They are not like ordinary people. A friendship to an actor of star prominence is a thing to be scanned very carefully. It is to be expected, then, that few proffered friendships stand up under the screening.

Frank Sinatra, for instance, is without doubt one of the kindest, most considerate men alive. His generosity is unbelievable. But he has made more enemies, and lost more friends, than any other star in the business. It is not altogether his temper, or his willingness to settle matters with his fists that is the cause. It is his anger against the position which makes it necessary for him to distrust people. That's the truth about Sinatra.

And loneliness is the truth about the others—the six—Shelley Winters, John Agar, Lizabeth Scott, Robert Walker, Rita Hayworth, Ronald Reagan. We've seen them at their loneliest. Seen John Agar on his solitary nocturnal drives to the ocean front. . . . Seen Ronald Reagan climb the stairs of a small hotel to his bachelor room, a more despondent sight than a figure alone on a bridge at night. . . . We've seen Shelley Winters look around the room at a cocktail party, almost as if to say, "Has he arrived yet? Have you found his face in the crowd?" . . . We've seen Robert Walker battling it out alone, ashamed. . . . Seen Rita Hayworth fleeing, unmindful of the taunts. . . .

And when the lights are on in Hollywood at night, and the gay couples are dancing in the clubs, you can almost feel the searching eyes of Lizabeth Scott, scanning the city from her window on the hill, asking, without words, "Why is he taking so long. . . ?" THE END

"He's a brute!" the newspapers cry. Some call her a pampered queen. But the facts behind the Davis-Sherry breakup are even more confusing.

BY ARTHUR L. CHARLES

In public, Sherry is quiet, almost mousey. Bette does the talking—here to Billie Burke.

■ A short time ago, William Grant Sherry, reputed to be a former prize fighter, a former wrestler, and known to be a former husband of Bette Davis, charged through the gates of RKO studios and, despite the newspaper reports which set the damage at only one almost-black eye, made a small shambles of a section of the establishment.

This act of violence cost Mr. Sherry his wife (so she says), and his two homes, one at Laguna Beach and one in fashionable Toluca Lake, in the San Fernando Valley. Mr. Sherry, in fact, hit the jackpot of misfortune.

He also earned for himself the wide-eyed respect of countless men married to famous women, men who had never in their wildest dreams seen themselves shedding any real blood in the presence of their fancy meal-tickets. Mr. Sherry became a hero of sorts. A fool, perhaps, but a gladiator under that $200 suit.

You have seen Mr. Sherry's pictures. He has a firm jaw and apparently a fairly muscular body. His eyes are direct. But, until you have seen him in person, you will not know that the pictures lie. Dorothy Kilgallen perhaps described him best in a column recalling their first meeting.

Expressing doubt that William Sherry had ever in his life smashed furniture, torn up rugs or committed any of the ferocious acts Bette Davis charged him with, Miss Kilgallen described Sherry as "a lower-case Milquetoast character, deer-eyed, semi-pixieish, a balding soul wearing funny little droopy bow ties, seldom speaking and then softly." It pictures Mr. Sherry, in person, in public, beautifully.

But in private, Bette Davis says he is murder on roller skates! In a surprise action for a divorce and restraining order against him in Santa Ana, California, early in November, 1949, Miss Davis told a judge that she feared for the safety of herself and her daughter. Irk William, she said, and no chair within his reach was worth a nickel.

If this seems confused to you—it is. Either William Sherry is a two-faced, hot-tempered monster, or Bette Davis isn't telling the truth. Either William Sherry is a lovable little man with funny bow ties, or a thug in his own kitchen. And Bette Davis is a sweet, terrified housewife or a woman who can drive a simple man nuts.

The gossip about the separation is that Sherry, six years Bette's junior, has tried valiantly to make a success of the marriage and that Bette has put every obstacle in his way. This, of course, is all gossip, with no actual facts available from either party as to their real family life.

The gossips also have it that when Sherry charged into that RKO party, he found his wife being extravagantly attentive to the actor she was co-starring with—and not a camera was turning. The gossips go on to say that Mr. Sherry proceeded to boot this actor around for a good five minutes. At any rate, the picture was closed down for several days. Whether Sherry shut it down, or the company just decided to do it that way, is anybody's guess.

The marriage between Bette Davis and Sherry was a pretty silly thing from the beginning. No man sincerely in love with a woman, and convinced that she was sincerely in love with him, would have countenanced the deal he made. Till death do us part was cooked immediately, because Mr. Sherry signed an agreement before the ceremony stating that if and when the marriage ended, he would make no claims on the property. In other words, Bette Davis could try it out, and if it didn't work, it wouldn't cost her anything.

That makes William Grant Sherry about as much a cave man lover as Butch Jenkins. Hardly the type of man who would break up the joint after a couple of beers and a harsh word.

And by Mr. Sherry's own admission he was a bit of a Simple Simon around the house. Announcing stoutly that at last he was going to tell all, after their last separation, W.G.S. pleaded for understanding by explaining to some hardboiled newspaper reporters that he used to do the housework, cook the dinner on occasion, take his wife's shoes off when she got home from work, bring her her slippers and a drink, and, on maid's day off, iron a frock or two for his love. It is difficult to believe that such a personality could ever destroy a Duncan Phyfe table with an angry blow.

In his public declarations, William Sherry has been the very soul of cooperation and honor. With the exception, of course, of that one time he told all to the press. At the first filing of the divorce papers, he admitted frankly that he alone was to blame for the trouble. He said he was a violent man, given to rages, and that if his wife would come back to him, he would go to a psychiatrist for treatment. Like a small boy whose girl had spurned him, Mr. Sherry wrote all this down in a letter to Bette and left it with her lawyer for delivery.

(Continued from page 49) she may be ashamed of her doubts, she may be the happiest girl in the world. Lana's friends will tell you that she's been through this same sort of emotional turmoil. Lana is an extremely earthy, human girl. She has her share of faults, and it takes an understanding man to know her. She feeds on flattery. This isn't unique. All women do in one way or another. A couple of well-placed compliments will go far toward winning her love and friendship, and it is possible that even so worldly a man as Bob Topping must still learn that after two years of marriage, friendship with a wife is just as urgent a matter as love. But men have learned harder lessons than this.

The trouble is not that Bob fails to be attentive. When Lana was 30 on February eighth, Mr. Topping presented her with a magnificent diamond and ruby cocktail ring. However, like many another ardent young husband, he may be too possessive, for there was no huge birthday party—a surprise of the sort which usually delights her.

It is true that Lana has "settled down," yet people don't change overnight. Bob is considerably more retiring than Lana. Although he likes to go out, there are few places where he's frequently seen, and he knows that if he takes Lana to the less sophisticated spots she's likely to attract a great deal of attention.

Only recently, Lana wanted to go to the Encore Room, a newly-popularized rendezvous for the younger set. Bob wanted no part of it. The way the little argument started was the way most apparently trivial things begin. Lana, while working on the set of No Life of Her Own, heard some of the extra kids talking about how everything jumped at the Encore.

"It really throws you," one of the girls said. "Where else could you find Hoagy Carmichael sitting at the piano and characters like Dan Dailey and Donald O'Connor clowning around? Simply everybody goes there for a fast flip."

Lana went home to her Bel Air mansion, and as can well be imagined, she voiced her desire to see the Encore Room somewhere between the roast pheasant and the coffee. She wanted some laughs to relieve the monotony of picture work. Bob Topping likes to please Lana even though, like any other husband, he may hope she forgets the idea of the moment.

A short time later they drove up in front of the Encore. Observers claim that Bob suddenly changed his mind and said, "We're not going in there."

"Why not?" Lana cried. "Everybody goes to the Encore but me!"

They went, but they didn't have the best time in the world. A couple never does under such circumstances. Add to this little situation an occurrence of a Monday night when Lana and Bob went to catch the antics of the "Firehouse Five," and rumor gets another booster shot.

On this occasion, Bob didn't feel much like dancing, so Lana spent the evening doing the Charleston with Jimmy Cross, their house guest who had accompanied them. Far less than this has started Hollywood tongues flapping, even though, in this case, Mr. Cross has romantic interests elsewhere.

Obviously Lana, who is exceedingly proud of Bob, would have liked to dance with him, but husbands the world over are well known for not wanting to dance when they don't want to. It is understandable that Bob might not have wanted

Bob Topping, though, may sometimes forget that a girl of Lana's spirit can't lose the fever left over from her experiences of other years. Those who know Lana well can remember an incident which occurred at the now defunct Century Club about eight years ago. She was so intrigued with a new dance step that she persuaded one of the musicians to teach it to her in front of an audience of hardened Hollywoodites. The name of the step will place the date for you—it was the "Shorty George." At the time, Lana was already an important name, but then as now she had no affectations.

Snobbishness is no part of Lana. (Nor of Bob.) For example, her marriage to Steve Crane was against the warnings and advice of her studio and all her friends. Crane, at the time, was known more for his gambling proclivities than anything else, but Lana fell in love with him and that was all that mattered. He could have been a ditch-digger or an itinerant fruit-picker—it meant no difference, for Lana's heart always has ruled both her head and pocketbook.

Most of the Toppings' problems seem concentrated on where to go. This conflict of tastes, say the gossipers, is the greatest single threat to their marriage. Will Bob eventually be able to dominate Lana in these supposedly small matters? Or will she swing him around to her way of thinking? With a girl as breathtakingly exciting as Lana the temptation for any man is to bottle her up completely for himself, but this is very nearly impossible. Lana still retains many of the traits she possessed when she was plain Judy Turner of Hollywood High. Even at seventeen she had that strong sex attraction. She didn't fall in love with any man she met, but woe to a swain if he were jealous every time other boys began to flock around.

The great fascination about Lana today is that the boredom that affects so many of our glamor girls has never taken hold of her. She's always been thrilled by music—hep music. She'll drive for miles to listen to a hot combination some musician has told her about. She's always been the same way about dancing. To give you a slight idea—Lana loves food to the point where between pictures she'd rather puff up and drive her studio a little batty than restrict herself to a regular diet. Lana loves food—but she'd rather dance than eat. Understanding these things about Mrs. Topping, it isn't hard to see why there are rumors of discord in her married life. But rumors neglect the fact that Lana doesn't give up easily, once she's in love—and she is in love with Bob Topping. That's for sure.

Even after Lana split once with Steve Crane, she went back to him. She carried a torch for a long time for Attorney Greg Bautzer who is now Ginger Rogers' heart-throb. She even cast pride to the winds and followed Tyrone Power across country.

Ty, it is said, had come to realize that they didn't have the same tastes in social life and had bluntly told her so, in the end. After that, Lana seemed to feel a lack of something in herself in the way of social development. She sought out the company of "blue-blood" types and was for a time rumored engaged to John Talbot. Friends expected that Lana, once completely out of love with Ty, would revert to the fun-loving type of guy she'd always gone with.

ered each other. Bob personified certain things that Lana has always wanted. A rich man's son, he had the social position denied her through her early years, although Lana had no particular desire to marry wealth.

With Bob, Lana began to lose her feeling of social inferiority. Although he is still a comparatively young man, there is very little Bob hasn't done or seen. He's a world traveler. He's known to every fashionable restaurant and night-club headwaiter throughout Europe and America. Rarely is anything new to him and the resulting sophistication creates a contrast to Lana who views each new experience with great zest.

"Bob Topping is the most man Lana ever met," a friend said recently, "and she loves him no matter what the gossips say."

Sometimes, Hollywood "humorists" might tell you, her love gets a little noisy. When they took a trip to Ensenada, they quarreled bitterly. Finally they sent for a friend, and with company, they made up happily, returning home ahead of schedule. Still, since this was on the eve of their departure for the Orient, they didn't want to risk being alone on a long sea voyage—and cancelled the trip. This doesn't seem like the action of a couple bent on destroying their lives together.

In his own way, Bob has been protecting their marriage. He's been thinking about organizing Bob Topping Productions, or a company which he controls, and including Lana in the plans. Lana, however, is a practical girl. Her career is the one thing that belongs to her alone. If she goes along with Bob in this idea you can be sure that the gossips are way off base.

If she doesn't? Well, their friends will tell you that no man is really smart about women, and that the real way for Bob to keep Lana's continuing interest would be not to tie her down in any way, much less in a mutual business enterprise.

A wise marriage counselor once said, "Some time after the first year of marriage a certain selfishness sets in. The girl who has waited so long for her prince to arrive is determined to make him over, and if she succeeds, discovers that what he had that first attracted her is lost. The same is true of the young husband. The time has now come when they are alone together, if they can't take it, they're lost."

We're betting that the Toppings can take it; we're betting that when they're old enough for wheel chairs, they'll be taking them together. THE END

The family likes to relax together in front of the vast fireplace in the living room. Van keeps the coffee table stacked with boxes and jars of candy. "The kids expect it," he says defensively.

Neddy'll haul out his xylophone and Van will let him play it for about five seconds before he grabs the hammers and starts banging. Or the two hamsters'll come strolling in. ("A hamster," says the dictionary, "is a rodent-like creature from Europe with cheek pouches.") The hamsters are the boys' pets. They also have a young husky.

Van doesn't mind the husky, but the hamsters send shivers up his spine.

"You're not used to them," says Evie. "They're cute."

"So are rats," says Van bitterly, "if you happen to like rats."

But the hamsters will stay as long as the kids want them.

The Johnsons get along fine, even though rumors have tried hard to wreck their lives.

"We decided right from the start," says Evie, "that it was no use denying every item that appeared in the newspapers. It just seemed best to ignore the rumors and go on being happy."

"And it's smart to leave Hollywood once in a while," says Van, "to get a new perspective, to escape from the movie talk, and the rumors."

Right now they're planning a holiday in Acapulco. Not because of any gossip, though, just for a rest.

While they're at home, they do a lot of entertaining. Some of it is formal in their beautiful dining room that overlooks the terrace and the pool. The heavy glass dining room table reflects the silver of the candlesticks. The multi-colored glassware, the blond furniture, the built-in glass buffets are all reflected in the ceiling-high, mirrored walls.

Friends of the Johnsons are Rosalind Russell and Freddie Brisson, Loretta Young, the Ricardo Montalbans, Deborah Kerr and her husband, the Henry Hathaways, Ann Sothern, and the Gary Coopers.

These friends are willing to be entertained informally, too. Outside, at the small barbecue, Van stirs the coals and broils the steaks like an expert. The barbecue was a gift from Red Skelton. It's heavy enough not to be blown away, and light enough for Van to carry on his back wherever he wants to go.

Most of the time, though, he lets it lie, especially when he and Evie are invited out to dinner at aforementioned friends' homes, or to parties where they dance the night away. This season, at the Bal Masque Charity Ball, Van did a Charleston with Lana Turner that brought down the house.

"I'm proud of you, honey," said his wife.

"I guess I never told you," he said, "I used to be a song-and-dance man."

"I guess you told me," she said. "But if it'll make you happy tell me again."

So he told her again. Evie's the understanding type, and Van understands her. Which may be why it's so nice for the kids to have them both around the house.

During the war years, Bob worked harder than any other entertainer in Hollywood. Every one of his radio shows, between May, 1941, and November, 1943, were broadcast from army camps or navy bases. He made six exhausting personal appearance trips to the major battle-fronts. It was relatively easy to understand why he did it. His reward was always there before him—the happy, smiling faces of weary, homesick men in uniform.

But when the war ended, everyone expected Bob to relax and take it easy. Even his personal physician suggested that it was about time for Bob to start coasting.

"The war's over," he said. "Cut down your schedule. You'll live longer, you know."

"Aw, cut it out, Doc," Bob replied. "I never felt better in my life."

And to prove his point, he took off the next week on a man-killing personal appearance tour of 35 cities. The whole of 1949 went that way. He made three movies, Paleface, Sorrowful Jones and The Great Lover, broadcast 42 weeks of his regular radio show, appeared as the guest star on eleven major network shows, and made countless visits to servicemen's hospitals. To round out his year, Bob flew to Alaska in near-zero weather and entertained the troops of six army camps at Christmastime.

A few weeks later, Bob told an interviewer, "Last year, exhaustion almost caught up with me. This year, I'm spotting it six points."

What Bob meant, in plainer words, was that in 1950 he intended to defeat exhaustion by completely outrunning it. He got off to a fine start. He never stopped running—to Washington, D. C., Philadelphia, New York—giving and receiving awards, broadcasting, signing contracts, acting. During February, he completed Fancy Pants, his newest comedy for Paramount.

Early in March, while rushing back from Palm Springs, Bob drove his car into a ditch and suffered a shoulder separation. It would have put most anyone else in bed. But Bob recuperated by doing benefit performances. With his shoulder still in a sling, he left on a spur-of-the-moment personal appearance tour of eight cities. He ended up at New York's famous Paramount Theater where, for two weeks, he played six shows a day and broke all existing house records.

In New York again, for Easter, he did a 90-minute television show sponsored by Westinghouse. Bob showed up for rehearsals like a commuter pausing for a cup of coffee. When asked to do a scene over he'd comment, "What—at these prices?" (His take, for one television show, was $40,000.) But later, when the gallery had gone home, Hope went back to a small hotel room he'd hired for the purpose and rehearsed the scenes in private. The night before the telecast he rehearsed till dawn.

This isn't the sort of routine you'd expect from a man who was just out for a dollar. This is the routine of a serious funnyman, determined to master a new medium. But why should Bob Hope be worried about mastery? He's tops in any medium that includes comedians.

There isn't another entertainer in America who, acting in his right mind, would bite off a schedule of work like his. (In a few weeks he'll start The Lemon Drop Kids, then he'll tour 60 cities, then he'll begin his fall radio series.) It doesn't seem possible that even Bob Hope can sustain the pace much longer. Somewhere along the line either the man or the schedule has got to run out.

The question is: How does he do it—and why? If you want to study Hope you have to do it at a dead run. Or, better still, talk to someone who knows him well—his brother Jack, for instance.

Jack Hope has been Bob's manager since he first became a star. He has a staff of five people, an office next door to Bob's home, and he acts as advance man on Bob's tours. Jack gets tired just watching his brother work.

"Still," says Jack, "he'd be absolutely miserable if he had any less to do. He likes being busy every minute; he'll go out of his way to give people a laugh. He thinks that's why he was put on earth, and he lives accordingly.

"Take last Christmas as an illustration. Just five days before, Bob and Dolores were sitting home talking about how this year they'd stay right in the living room on Christmas Day. The phone rang; it was General Symington in Washington, asking Bob if he could leave the next morning for Alaska to entertain the troops up there. Bob immediately said yes, and then meekly went in to talk to Dolores.

"'Oh, no!' she said, when she heard the news. 'This year you promised to stay home and play Santa Claus for the kids!'

"'Why don't we take the children with us,' Bob said. 'We can all go, you know.'

"Sure enough, the next day, after a big scramble with suitcases, the Hopes were flying to Alaska."

It takes an understanding and devoted woman to make that kind of quick adjustment to her husband's plans. But Dolores Hope has long since realized that she is destined to share her husband with the world for the rest of her life.

"It's not a lot different than being married to a traveling salesman who's on the road six months out of the year," she recently told a friend. "But I'd rather have a part of his time than a whole lifetime with anyone else. I could never give our children the zest for living that Bob can in just a few minutes each morning. They go to school with enough laughter to last the whole day."

The only place where Bob has even temporary release from the pressure of his activities is his comfortable home in Palm Springs. Very few people know his unlisted telephone number there. On those light weeks when he has only his radio show to do, Bob spends Wednesday through Sunday in Palm Springs, coming back to Hollywood on Monday morning for the rehearsal. But even there, Hope cannot get away from work. More often than not, his writers will come down to start writing the next week's script.

In his youth, Bob shared the spotlight with his five brothers. Here's the whole family. Bob, aged 13, is in the lower right corner. Jack, now his manager, is in the center of the back row.

Why does Bob set the pace? He has nothing left to prove to the world, but somehow he has a great deal left to prove to himself. He remembers back, beyond the growing up years in vaudeville, beyond the hungry, hand-to-mouth years of breaking into show business. It's easy to soothe memories of hunger, uncertainty and buffeting. You get tough, you look for security in terms of dollars, you live big and plushy to show the process server you're out of reach.

Hope doesn't live big. He still lives in the first house he bought when he arrived in Hollywood many years ago. He has no swimming pools or yachts or airplanes. This man is not just making up for the lean years.

The people who attribute Bob's absorption in work solely to economic reasons are missing the point. Although he's a very wealthy man, the fabulous money he earns will always surprise him. One evening in Oakland, when Bob came back to the hotel after a two-hour performance in the Civic Auditorium with a $19,000 check in his hand, he said to a friend, "Gee, look at that. Nineteen thousand dollars. Remember when we used to get $5 a day for hoofing in Cleveland?"

Bob remembers back to the early days. When he was one of six sons, the kid who never got a full share of the attention he needed; he yearned for the spotlight. He found it when he put on an act. Sure—money was important. But all his life, Bob has been running in one direction: front and center. He's got to be "on." He's got to hear the ecstatic roar of an audience that is with him all the way. His security comes only in front of an audience. And the laughs have to be guffaws.

He has developed a whole way of life that depends upon constant activity for nourishment. Nothing else can satisfy him.

Doris Day, who's been singing on Bob's radio show for three years, believes that the real secret of his driving energy is his turn-it-on, turn-it-off constitution. "Bob could fall asleep sitting upright in a hard-backed chair, and wake up two hours later feeling more refreshed than most people are after eight hours' sleep."

"Many times driving back from Palm Springs," another friend says, "Bob will drop off for 15 minutes, and when he wakes up, will take up the conversation exactly where he left off. I'm a guy who needs my eight hours, but Bob gets a lot out of those catnaps."

Bob's brother feels that Bob will always have the thought that this might be his last week's work, and, if he isn't good, people may not ask him back again.

"Self-consuming though his career has been," Jack says, "it has brought great rewards to Bob. The greatest of them all are the people who laugh. Bob really means it when he says, 'Thanks for the memories.'"

Bob himself says, "There's nothing in the world like hearing people laugh. It's the greatest noise there is. I was talking to Jack Benny the other day, and he said he was going out on tour this summer for the same reason. And the longer you are in show business, the more you need to hear it.

"Without live audiences to play to, I'd be cutting out doilies in no time. But I won't have to worry about that for quite a while, as long as I take care of myself, and keep the old ticker in shape."

How long can he keep that ticker in shape? There's no answer. The only thing Bob knows is that he must keep going, because without his spotlight he wouldn't have a schedule. He wouldn't have anything.

"The orchestra?" said Wanda.

"No," said Dick sadly, "the sheet music."

About this time, someone came up with a sensible idea—having Vanessa go through the classics. No one laughed when she sat down at the piano, as she really plays. She'd taken piano lessons when she toured with the stage production, Watch On The Rhine. She'd still be taking them, if she had the time. Anyway, a piano teacher recently moved next door, so there's still hope.

Next, someone asked Betty to render the Third Man Theme on the zither. That's why Betty had borrowed the zither from the Fox music department. But she was somewhat disillusioned to find that Anton Karas didn't come with it. (Karas wrote the music.)

Since specialties were in order, Wanda volunteered to out-Benny Jack with the stirring strains of Love In Bloom. She drew the bow across the strings several times before the others made her change her mind.

The sun had gone down—perhaps in desperation—when the session came to a close. The gang staggered outside for a buffet-style supper. They weren't as weak as they looked when it came to devouring the food. Vanessa had reckoned with their appetites and was prepared. She'd spent the morning moving the contents of a grocery store into her kitchen. And she'd prepared a tuna salad that seemed much too beautiful to spoil by eating. The musicians, however, expressed their regret; and the salad was soon gone.

Then there was time for relaxation. Relaxation for everyone but Rand. He's "Lucky," Hopalong Cassidy's sidekick, and he stayed busy, autographing slips of paper for the neighbor's children.

Peace was really too much to hope for. "Let's have just one more tune," suggested Vanessa.

One tune led to another and all of it led to bedlam. I had to leave in the middle of a solid beat. (It almost landed on my head.) But before I headed for the door, I borrowed another book and vowed that when I returned this one, I'd bring a harmonica, too.

"Have fun?" Vanessa asked.

"Out of this world," I told her. "Why, Vanessa, I'm really gone."

I'm tone deaf, too, but I'm sure no one noticed. THE END

I SAW IT HAPPEN

December 31, 1949, was our last vacation day in Hawaii, and some friends and I decided to make it one we'd never forget. At 1:00 A.M., after seeing the New Year in, we took one last spin along Waikiki Beach, hoping to meet some celebrities we could talk about back home. Suddenly a sparkling 1950 car drove up alongside ours, and a handsome person stretched out his head and yelled, "Happy New Year!" Surprised as we were, we quickly answered, "Happy New Year, Clark Gable . . . Happy New Year, Mrs. Gable!"

Suddenly the figure of a man hurtled crazily past my window. "That's funny," I thought. Nothing else. I turned back to the typewriter and watched the words race across the page: "Dear Mom, I have a lot of good news to tell you. . . ." Good news? Good God!

I rushed back to the window, and stared down at the crushed, broken body seven floors below, splattered against a jutting roof. Moments later a siren cried out from the street and the impact of my first encounter with death broke through my mind's numbness.

A great sense of shame flooded over me. Why had I gone back to the typewriter? Obviously I was completely preoccupied with myself and oblivious to everything else. I went to the desk, whipped the sheet of paper from the typewriter, picked up my topcoat and walked to the elevator. It was dark now on the street. A whisper of rain fell against my face as I pushed my way uptown against the tide of people.

This dead man. If he hadn't jumped, where would he have been going now? To an apartment in New Rochelle? Home to a wife and two kids? Or had he killed himself because he had no wife and no one to love? Was he an embezzler? Was he driven to suicide in the agony of incurable cancer? I let my imagination conjure up a dozen stories. Might make a good play, I thought, in the calloused tradition of struggling actors who turn everything into roles for themselves.

Abruptly, I shrugged the whole idea away. After all, thousands of men were unhappy in love, stole money, suffered inhuman tortures, but they didn't kill themselves. This man couldn't take it. He jumped. So he jumped. I had enough to think about without worrying over him. Yet, I did think about him every now and then through the years that followed. In fact, when the editors of MODERN SCREEN asked me to set down my thoughts on faith and philosophy, I thought about him almost immediately. And I knew finally why he had killed himself that day. It was simple, after all. He had lost faith.

What is faith? A conviction, a creed, a belief in God?

How should I know? I'm Kirk Douglas, an actor. Some people like to see me perform. Some would rather watch two old men playing chess. Actors should act and not take on the mantle of psychology professors. The way I look at it, we leave brain operations to great surgeons, educating to teachers and religious matters to the ministers, rabbis and priests. Still, a promise is a promise and I'm going to say a few things my way.

To me, faith is not a nebulous thing. One's religion should be the confirmation of that faith. In other words, when you go to church you take the faith with you. You don't go to get it pumped into you.

Faith covers a lot of territory. It is a strength within oneself, for one thing. For example, since I was a tiny kid I had faith in my father. He was a junk dealer for a time. Naturally, some brat had to point that out to me in derogatory terms. So, I went to my father and asked him why he did what he did.

"Son," he said, "it takes a lot of people to keep this world going. Senators, bricklayers, street-sweepers, presidents. Now, I've got to admit that sometimes I don't like my job, but just imagine what would happen if all the people in the world let this stuff pile up and nobody took care of it. Why, boy, people soon wouldn't be able to move around."

Then he winked, slapped me on the fanny and told me to go rustle up some coal down by the tracks. After that it never occurred to me to ask how anybody earned a living. Some people have more, some have less. All I knew was that part of what I had to do every day was pick up coal and coke along the tracks. If I did that we'd have a nice warm house.

Did you ever walk along and get the feeling that with each step you took you were walking up in the air, stepping higher and higher? Maybe you can understand what I mean if I explain about the hill above our home. There were fine houses up there, always freshly painted and sitting elegantly behind thick, high hedges. I used to trudge up the hill carrying groceries, but as I moved along I seemed to be walking into the air. I'd imagine that I could walk alongside the second-story windows, that I could look in on the old lady who had been sick so long and ask her how she was. Or I'd picture myself watching a man in another house sitting alone and drinking as they said he did ever since his wife died. After awhile I could even see myself kissing the beautiful girl who lived in the handsomest mansion of them all, because from where I walked I was a grown man and not a kid years too young to know his heart's desire.

Yeah, I was doing fine. Then I'd hear a car coming. I'd step over to the side of the road while a fancy convertible swooshed by. I remember how I felt then. There was a terrible urgency inside me to get going—to work, to run through life as fast as I could toward the things I wanted. And thanks to my parents I never once shook a fist at those fancy cars, swearing to be rich and famous just to get even. From the beginning I had faith that I'd get where I was going.

And even though I delivered groceries at the back door I went in the front entrances of those houses many times. Nobody ever looked at me in my threadbare hand-me-downs and exclaimed, "Pater, who let that little tramp in here?"

I didn't have any lasting quarrels with anybody, even when I was puny and kids in my neighborhood used to beat hell out of me. I thought that's what everybody did so I made up my mind to get stronger and beat tar out of a few kids myself. Today I read how I used to heroically get up at 5:00 A.M. to deliver newspapers, come home, gulp down breakfast and be in school by eight, carrying my miserable little lunch of two scrambled egg sandwiches. Know something? Those sandwiches were fine. Nobody could make them like my mom, and there must be a thousand kids living the same way.

They work because they have to, and every day as they scratch out their living they dream of how it's going to be. Later on they learn something else—that they've been having a wonderful time and that they wouldn't trade places with the rich kid on the hill because they'd be bored to death in a week with nothing to do. I know now that the one worry I'll have with my own youngsters is that they won't have to go through what I did—and that their toughest competition in life will be those kids from the wrong side of the tracks.

Once, when I was a little older and came home pooped from a day in the steel mill, my father looked up over his evening newspaper. He stared at me for a moment and then said, "Know something, boy? Work is the one love a man has that will never let him down."

Later on while I was on summer vacation from St. Lawrence University, I worked in a can factory in Rochester. I was sweet on a girl who had quite a bit of money. I can still remember her because she was about as attractive as any girl I've met before or since. Wonderful and democratic, and her name wasn't Kay, which I'll call her because she probably has five kids by now, along with some guy she's made happy for ten years.

Kay had a bright red convertible and used to pick me up at the factory after work. Sometimes she'd bring me my lunch until I asked her not to because the boys at the plant began to pour it on. Kay and I used to dream a little, and but for my determination to become an actor on my own we might have wound up together. Her father was a great character. He never asked me what my intentions were, but one evening after I'd kissed Kay goodnight, he came up the walk.

"Why don't you stick around awhile," he said. "I'd like to talk to you."

I sat on the front porch while he went into the house for a couple of beers. We talked about this and that. Then he got down to cases. He'd give me a loan so I could concentrate on my university work instead of having to pick up odd jobs on the side. There were no strings attached. When he finished talking we both sat there pondering the idea.

"On second thought," he said, "I think it isn't a very good idea. You know how to work. If you stopped now you might lose faith in yourself."

Thinking back on it, he was dead right. Too much of a helping hand at that moment might have taken away from the thrill of accomplishment. On top of that I'd never really have known if I could've done it on my own.

It is true that you'll find more honest faith among people who have to struggle for a living than among those who have a great deal of money. A young person working hard toward a career doesn't have time for doubts. If he wants to get into the acting profession, for instance, he'll realize that the one thing nobody seems to need is another actor. But that won't stop him. Sooner or later he knows that the business will have to move over a notch and let him in. Look around you in school or at your office. Locate the griping individual and you'll find someone without real faith in himself.

Getting right down to it, faith is something you develop, not a soothing ointment applied in some great emergency. You don't get it by rushing to someone when you're worried and being told "have faith and everything will be all right." Perhaps that sounds like heresy, but try thinking about it in reverse. If you don't have faith, try seriously to find it through religion. Suddenly you'll discover that you weren't made a present of a pious attitude, that this attitude only comes with the enjoyment of the struggle of living.

I have one more anecdote. It's romantic, but it's grim, and I can vouch for the truth of it because I was in on the beginning and the end.

A boy I knew met a girl I knew. He really fell for her, but they had trouble. She'd been pursued by dozens of men. He ran into her ex-beaux everywhere.

One day I bumped into him on the street. I asked about the girl. "That's washed up," he moaned. "Last week we had a date to meet for lunch at the Beverly Brown Derby. We talked on the phone and she said she'd be over in fifteen minutes. She never showed up."

"Isn't it possible that something happened?" I suggested.

"Yeah," he snapped, "something happened all right. I tried to reach her for several days. When I finally got her apartment a guy answered the phone and said she had a message for me—she didn't want me to call her any more."

How about that? I offered my condolences, but sure enough, a month later I met the two of them. They were married and very happy. She had changed quite a bit, though. She wore a black veil. Even so, you could see that she had been in some sort of accident. My friend found out why she never kept their date at the Brown Derby; why she didn't even call. She couldn't because she'd been in a terrible automobile accident. As for the guy in the apartment who'd told him not to call any more, he was the girl's father. When she got out of the hospital her father came out from the East and she made him promise to brush off the boy.

After all, she reasoned, could he love a girl who had one glass eye?

The answer was: He could. Something told him she wouldn't have stood him up without a good reason. He camped on her doorstep until he found out. Well, this all happened two years ago. Plastic surgery has removed the scars, and even without the sight of one eye she is more attractive than ever.

As for my doubting friend, you've never seen anyone with more faith in himself—and everyone else. He's a complete success in love, business and as a person.

Let's put it this way. According to my philosophy, you have to work to have faith, it doesn't come with your birth certificate. Sometimes a miracle can happen to help you along. But don't count on it. Count on yourself. THE END

She'd kiss him goodnight after a date, and a couple of evenings later you'd find her at some hideaway with a different escort, acting like the honeymoon would start tomorrow. This was her way of releasing emotional tension. The man she really loved she wouldn't let come too close.

Anyway, she overplayed her hand. She was too light, too gay, too flippant. Underneath she was suffering from such a great lack of assurance that it was frightening. She had a haunting fear of her own shortcomings built up in a mind that was brimming over with imagination and with painful memories of the past. She couldn't relax; she could only appear cool and distant.

Naturally, the man was puzzled. No matter how much he tried he couldn't convince himself that Ava cared. She'd done such a good job of keeping their romance a secret he could hardly believe it himself. So one day, after three years of doubting, he married someone else.

"If I'd have acted differently," Ava told me, "I might have been the girl."

"You mean you wanted to marry him?" I asked.

"I mean I made the biggest mistake of my life. And I acted like a fool."

"You just acted human," I said, and Ava laughed harshly. She wouldn't let herself off that easily. If there's any blame around, Ava's the girl who wants to take it.

Even so I didn't get it. No one drops Ava like a hot potato. That's really foolish. "How come?" I said. "Why did he take off like that?"

"I don't really know," said Ava. "I guess that when things reach an emotional breaking point one little incident can destroy it all. One afternoon, a friend of mine and I decided to visit him, and tried to phone him. The line was busy, so my friend, who likes off-beat schemes, told the operator it was an emergency call, a matter of life or death. Of course, it would happen just when he was talking over a big business deal. Imagine how he felt when a voice broke in saying, 'Honey, we're bringing over some ice cream. What will you have—chocolate or vanilla?'

"Sounds funny now, doesn't it, but it wasn't then. We went over, and that was the last time I saw him."

Okay, you might say, so Ava's heart was broken a little, but he's just another guy, another incident. In Ava's life there are plenty of men, and she can be choosey; she can act the way she wants. You think so?

Let me tell you about the day Ava asked me to introduce her to a neighbor of mine. "He's nice," Ava said. "Can you arrange a date?"

"Sure," said I, reaching for the phone. Well, I got this boy on the phone and I said to him, "Look, darling, I'm going to do you a big, fat favor. I'm going to fix it so you can date Ava Gardner."

I listened to what he had to say. Then I hung up.

"Well?" asked Ava.

"Well, I never!" said I. "He said no, twice."

"It doesn't surprise me," said Ava. "But what was his reason?"

"Money," I said. "He says you have too much money. He knew a girl once who had too much money. She was the princess of all snobs and she was his last princess."

"Oh," said Ava.

There wasn't much else she could say. What does a girl have to do? Give up her career so someone can buy her a lemonade? There wasn't much else to say, but there was plenty she could think; there was plenty of material for any complex she wanted to build.

Maybe if people let her alone it would be different; she'd be able to work out her own problems in her own time. But people, especially gossips, don't leave Ava alone. Remember back a little to all the fuss that was created when Ava showed up "with" Frank Sinatra in Texas? Big romance, everybody said. Maybe. Ava never told me she loved Frank. She did tell me they'd always be the closest of buddies. Believe it or not that can happen in show business. And that's the main reason Ava suddenly went down to Houston without telling anyone.

She'd had a call from Sinatra. The guy was terribly unhappy. More than that, he was in trouble. Sinatra's a walking time-bomb and when he's upset he can very easily blow up. This time he was under a doctor's care. Ava snapped him out of it.

You can get pretty snippy here and say, why didn't Nancy snap him out of it? Well, he'd tried rushing back to Nancy before, and it didn't work. The bolstering he needed right then, Ava gave him.

A lot of trash has been written about that episode. Sinatra was supposed to have fired some shots in a hotel room after he and Ava had had an argument. Ava was supposed to have called the police, but I know Ava never called "cop" on anyone. The truth is Frank did fire two shots up in the air out of a window. When Ava came rushing in he was sitting in a chair all broken up over the gag. Ava didn't think it was so funny.

I'm a married gal and I don't particularly approve of the running around that goes on, but Frank was separated and Ava was free. Funny about Frank. He doesn't seem to be afraid of anything, but he is. Ava's afraid of a lot. People like this have a way of getting together, even though putting their problems in the same basket never works out.

The unusual thing about Ava is: she's honest. People don't expect that. They think actresses are phony and when they

HOW TIME FLIES!

■ When Jane Wyman was assigned to Honeymoon for Three she scratched her head and said, "Boy, that's a thought!" Ever since she and Ronald Reagan were married they've been so busy in pictures they haven't had time for their own honeymoon. Now, according to Jane, they're going to wait until their baby is born in January so that all three can take it together!—October, 1940, Modern Screen.

It's this same honesty in Ava that's the root of some of her seemingly strange fears. When we talked once about her marriage to Artie Shaw, she made a frank and willing confession. "I made plenty of mistakes there," she said. "I was rather young and quite cocksure at first. You see, I had always been spoiled at home, and my first marriage to Mickey Rooney hadn't taught me much.

"The longer I lived with Artie," she confessed, "the more I feared I wouldn't reach his intellectual plane." Ignoring the fact that Mr. Shaw is famous for gleefully letting any girl he's with realize that she isn't in his mental league, Ava went on: "I tried to join in on his friends' conversations and participate in his interests, but I always had the fear that I would embarrass him. It got to be a phobia with me until I was almost continually being thrown for a loss. I know now that I tried too hard to be what he wanted me to be. I read at every free moment, anything I could get my hands on. Not realizing that you can't become a Ph.D. in a couple of years, I even took a course in English literature and economics."

At the time I didn't tell Ava that as I listened to her it occurred to me that husband Artie would have done well to take a course in the Appreciation of Girls who Are Regular Guys. Perhaps then, fear wouldn't have been the destructive factor in their marriage. If Artie had tried to meet her intellectually, she might not have had the dread of being held up to contempt as mentally mediocre.

In retrospect, it is easy to understand why Artie still holds a fascination for Ava and why she grasps every opportunity to see him.

In a way, Ava always has been on the outside looking in. Originally she was a North Carolina farmer's daughter. She adored her mother, Molly, who died more than five years ago, and her father, Jonas, who long before Ava came to Hollywood was forced by illness to give up his farm and store. When he died, no girl ever grieved more over the disillusionment that came to him when he was forced by circumstances to run a boarding house for teachers in Newport News, Virginia. Ava, ever since, has not forgotten her simple background. She is proud of it, but she still lacks assurance. Because of this, unimportant things frighten her. The plush spots, for instance, fill her with dread.

There's a smart little dress shop called Allardale's on the Sunset Strip. It's not unusual for celebrities to go there, wait on themselves or help take care of other customers when the regular salesgirls are busy.

I dropped in there one day recently. Ava Gardner came up, acting like she was not Ava Gardner, and said, "What can I do for you, Modom?" She was wearing a bandana on her head, no stockings, flat-heeled sandals and a basque-waisted, full skirted blue and white cotton striped dress. She explained that the saleslady had gone out to lunch.

"Let's see how much stuff we can sell," Ava exclaimed, "but for Pete's sake don't let any of the fancy customers know who I am."

"Why not?"

She looked uncertain for a moment, then shrugged her shoulders.

"All right with me," I flipped, "but don't worry about being recognized in that outfit of yours."

We began trying on clothes. Ava slipped into a stunning grey suit that fitted her the way only she can be fitted.

Joan Lansing

"Do you think this will be all right for London?"

A customer came in and Ava ducked for the rear of the shop.

"Wasn't that Ava Gardner?" the lady asked.

"Gosh no," I replied. "That's sort of an idiot cousin of mine. She likes to come in and pretend she looks like a movie star."

Ava came back in a few minutes and I went out for a coke. When I came back she was struggling to get a size forty into a size fourteen dress. After we lost the customer I said, "How much can you kid anybody?"

She shrugged. "Poor gal, I didn't want to hurt her feelings. I hope that sometime when I'm twenty years older somebody will flatter me like that."

Funny thing about Ava. She can call up a producer and talk to him right smack out in language that would give pause to a truck driver. She'll face up to the big shots and make them back down. I've seen her go out of her way to be friendly with outspoken people in the industry and watched them warm up to her in a flash. Usually their attitude toward stars is an unspoken you-stay-on-your-side-of-the-fence-and-I'll-stay-on-mine. They seem to sense in her a person who wants to be liked. But she seeks friends outside of the industry, people who'll accept her as just another girl.

When Ava finally reads this she's liable to bat me right over the head with her copy of MODERN SCREEN. I haven't meant to make it appear as though she's wandering around like a lost doll in a sea of bitterness and confusion. She is a completely competent actress and confident in the knowledge that she has developed a craftsmanship second to few in her profession. The nice part of it is that unlike many another top star her eminence in the profession doesn't cause her to look on other people as though they were termites crawling out of the woodwork.

One day I stopped to say hello as she sat in the studio commissary. She was at a secluded table with Howard Duff, and at her most beautiful best. Her Irene gown was the clinging kind that seemed to know it had something worthwhile to cling to. Her hair was smartly set in an upsweep and her only jewelry was a pair of diamond earrings, the graceful, dangling kind. During our chat I asked if she had seen one of our mutual friends.

"Oh, her," Ava said. "I refuse to talk about her."

"What happened? An argument? Did you steal one of her men?"

"Are you kidding, Leslie?" she laughed. "Why, I'm terribly fond of her. It's just that she's so beautiful I'm afraid to sit in the same room with her."

She was joking, but not completely. Ava Gardner has never thought she possessed incredible charm and she hates to have people tell her she's beautiful.

To understand, you'd have to come with me to her home early some morning and find her sitting in the tiny dining room, hair piled frumpily on top of her head, sipping coffee, answering the phone and waiting for the daily barrage of requests from newspapermen and photographers.

Tell her she's beautiful. Go ahead. She'll laugh in your face. She'll probably tell you the truth—that her first date back in high school never called again. That almost any girl can be beautiful when she has high style clothes and years of polish as the result of being educated by studio makeup men. You'll listen to her, but you won't believe her even when you know that she believes it herself.

When the cameramen come, she'll pour herself into a ravishing gown and earnestly work with them to preserve what she thinks is an illusion. Then she'll tell you that this glamour is just window dressing—that the night before she didn't have a date. That in the middle of the night she went hiking alone in the hills.

Ava, having skipped the normal social life that comes to most girls, now can't enjoy cronies. She doesn't know how to loaf around with friends. She has too many defenses to ever relax her guard. She's glamour plus and she's lonely with a loneliness that can't be cured by jumping across the subtle lines of social distinction in Hollywood.

"You see," she said recently, "this business of acting takes up a murderous amount of time and I'll admit that I'm paid well enough for it. Still, I seldom have the opportunity to develop friendships with other girls. I don't have time for luncheons and card parties."

That's why she finds companionship in places like the dress shop. At one time she looked at a stunning dress hanging in the window. "I'd like to buy that creation and wear it to Mocambo tonight," she said "that is, if I had a date."

"Too bad," I jeered. "I'll bet your phone rings twenty times tonight."

"Maybe," she admitted, "but the man I'd like to call me won't. He'll be like that friend of yours who thought I had too much money. Then there'll be a couple of the other kind who'd like to get their hands on the bankroll I haven't got."

"Uh-huh," I agreed. "And the good old tired business man who wants to be seen with a celebrity and get his name in the columns."

"Not to speak of the monster type," Ava added. "There'll be about six of those. They've been turned down seventeen times by names beginning with A in their little black books. Along about seven-thirty they'll get down to the G's, and about that time I'll get into my slacks and take a hike into the hills."

"I get your point," I said, "but you'll hit the right type one of these days. All you have to do is keep on breathing. What gets me is will you know him when you do?"

She thought that over. "I've never been hard to please. The thing I want most is companionship and loyalty—a man who'll always be in my corner. I'm tired of going through life afraid of displeasing someone I love."

Ava is not really afraid of men. She's afraid of failing them. She'd rather not marry than risk another divorce. Men aren't afraid to take that risk with her. Give a smart man two dates and he'll propose. He figures that with a girl as reasonable and intelligent as Ava they can make a go of it together. What he doesn't realize is that this enchanting girl has spoiled his timing. He'd have to know her for a couple of years before he, himself, would be able to handle her emotionally.

But let's not be ridiculous. Somewhere there's a man for Ava—and she'll find him. When she does, she wants to have three children and a house in Pasadena.

And right now I'll go out on a sturdy limb to say that all of her fears will fade away with the sound of the wedding bells, because none of her fears are strong enough to beat real love. THE END

"I'm coming out," I told her. "I want to talk to you."

"Well, I'm home," she answered, "as usual, so come on."

"That's what I want to talk to you about," I said, "being home." But that wasn't all. I had some information which made me pretty sure Shirley Temple was far more sinned against than sinning, for one thing. For another, while there are always two sides in a divorce story, I had a very solid conviction that Shirley's side had never really been properly presented in a fair light. There was something that didn't ring true to me about this one-sided post-divorce star stigma; why should Shirley pay in popular esteem while John Agar felt no pain and went merrily on his way, unscarred? I wanted some questions answered to clear me up on that and also some others, and from Shirley herself: What was she going to do about her life from now on, her career, her home, her baby, her heart, her happiness?

Shirley met me at the door, pretty as a picture in Chinese silk pajamas, blue top and golden yellow trousers. Only her hair, which she's letting grow long and which was nipped back primly in a tight hair-do, gave a hint that she was what she was, a grown-up woman and a mother.

"How's my girl?" I kidded.

"Fine and dandy," she fibbed gallantly.

How could she be? Suppose you had spent your twenty-two years as Shirley Temple had spent them—up until say about three years ago—with not even a suspicion of a slap from life on your adored wrist. Suppose everybody worshipped you, imitated you devotedly and everything you did made people sing your praises. Suppose you were not only famous, sought after, rich and universally loved but also newly married to the prince charming of your choice.

Then suppose the sky fell in on you.

You were still the same person, but now people got wrong ideas about you and the whole picture changed. Worship switched to hostility, adoration to denunciation. Would you be "fine and dandy?" Well, Shirley was brave enough to pretend she was. She sat me down on a sofa and sank on another herself. It's the same house I remember from her happier days, same furniture, same knick-knacks, same lovebirds twittering in a cage, same tropical fish finning back and forth in their bubbly bowl. Shirley hasn't made any changes. But it's really an entirely different place and it would always stay different for Shirley Temple. Her love died there. Okay, that's life for you, but why in Heaven's name should Shirley sit and snuff ashes—and take the blame, when that's not where it lies?

I have nothing against John Agar. In fact, for a long time I was sure Hollywood's princess had found her ideal mate. I remember at Shirley's wedding, when the huge crowd before the Wilshire Methodist Church surged like a frightening sea to engulf the newlyweds as they came out the door, John took one look and swung his bride back inside, barring the door. They didn't come out until a half-hour later and then by a back entrance. I thought then: "That's fast thinking. She's got herself a man." If John hadn't made that instant decision Shirley's wedding dress would have been ripped off her and Heaven only knows what else might have happened. A wild mob is a terrifying thing.

Nobody, certainly not Shirley herself, had any doubts about John then. She was deeply in love, she was seventeen. Nothing in the world could have stopped her from marrying him. Scribbled in her diary today are still her girlish qualifications for her dream prince, and Shirley told me she had read them over not long ago with a wry smile. "The man I marry," she wrote, "must be a blond. He must be strong and athletic. He must be handsome, a good dancer, he must have a sense of humor. He must be sincere." How typically teenage! I'll bet every girl who reads this has written up such a dream image, with variations, at one time or another, or certainly thought it.

John Agar was all of those—except possibly the last (and the only one that really mattered)—but how in the world was Shirley Temple to know that then? She met John when she was fifteen. She told me he proposed when she was fifteen-and-a-half and steadily from then on until she said "Yes," many months later. He was an "older man," all of twenty-two, and it was hard to resist when he urged, "Let's get married. We'll go to Mexico, or Nevada—tonight—run away with me!" Shirley held off for two years, all the time insistently coaxed by the man she thought was everything a suitor should be. Even her wedding at seventeen shocked some. But she knew what she wanted and her parents, who have always backed Shirley up, gave their consent. Why not? Shirley was mature, it was wartime and John was in the service, early marriages were the vogue, and the fact that Shirley Temple was the "first to get married" from her class at Westlake was another thrill.

I asked Shirley, maybe a little heartlessly, "Do you still believe now in early marriage?"

"I certainly do," she came right back. "You start your life sooner. It's the only thing if you're really in love and suited to each other."

Shirley Temple was really in love. But I'm beginning to wonder, and I think Shirley does too, if John Agar was ever really in love with her. Certainly they weren't suited to each other.

Shirley told me their trouble started six months after they were married—that long ago, although few people suspected. The great myth of Hollywood happiness fooled everyone but Shirley and John. Shirley has some thoughts on that, as she has on everything, and pretty good ones, too.

"When two people are put up on a pedestal of perfection, painted perpetually in rosy tints with everything so beautiful—the disillusionment, when it comes, is a hundred times as great. You see Hollywood couples always in lovey-dovey poses, cozy in breakfast nooks, happy in laps before fireplaces and all those dreamy pictures. Why, two months after I was married I was in a magazine giving advice to young married people! What advice did I have to give them? You can't escape that 'perfect' build-up, but it makes the breakdown, if it comes, a great shock."

Shirley told me about one night when she was with John at Mocambo and I was there too, sitting across the room. "We were dancing and John was smiling so sweetly at me, but the things he was saying! Well, I thought: 'I wish Hedda could hear.'"

I wish I could have too, because like everyone else I tumbled for that illusion too long. When Shirley called me at home to tell me her sorry decision I blurted right out, "Oh, Shirley—you can't do that! Why, all the kids who've grown up with you will have their confidence in everything you stand for destroyed. You just can't let them down!"

"I know," she answered, "but I've made up my mind."

"Think it over," I begged.

"I already have, Hedda," she said, "for a long, long time." There wasn't anything more I could say.

But I still believed John Agar was a gentleman and my sympathy was with him as well as with Shirley. I'm afraid I was disenchanted and that sympathy flew out the window the morning I saw his picture in the paper, when police had arrested him for drunkenness.

But there's another and even stronger indication to me that John Agar had other objectives in mind than making Shirley happy when he married her. Evidence piles up now that he kept secret from her what may well have been his big ambition all along—to be a movie star himself.

There's nothing wrong with that ambition, of course—only the fact that Shirley firmly believed that when John got out of the service they'd return to Chicago, his home, and he'd enter the family's meat-packing business. She was prepared then to give up her career and be just Mrs. John Agar; in fact, that was her ambition. No one was more surprised, after their marriage, when visiting her new husband in Salt Lake City, he told her of David Selznick's offer of a screen contract. Shirley was under contract to Selznick herself but it was baffling news to her, especially when John told her he was going to accept.

When I took my little nephew to the circus in North Hollywood, he did what I'd expected. He got lost. After looking and calling to no avail, I began to get panicky. Suddenly I spotted my lost nephew contentedly eating cotton candy with one hand and holding the hand of the "nice man" who'd bought him all the goodies with the other. The nice man was Dennis Morgan.

"But," she puzzled, "how do you know you'll like that? You haven't had any training or experience or even thought about acting, have you?" John said no, he hadn't, but he'd like to give it a whirl, and Shirley said she'd do all she could to help. I suspect she had already helped, although she didn't know it. I wonder if John would ever have had that offer if he hadn't married Shirley Temple?

I've since learned from friends that back in '41, before he knew Shirley, John Agar was angling for a chance around two separate Hollywood studios. He has a good voice, and also before he met Shirley he sang in Chicago's swank night spot, the Buttery. In the service, too, he sang and worked in shows. Yet he never told Shirley this and for a long time she was completely in the dark about his real ambitions, which were aimed straight at Hollywood. I'm not saying two careers broke up their marriage, although certainly that was a factor Shirley had never counted in her marriage plans.

It may be more than a coincidence, too, that the moment John Agar got his Hollywood start he became indifferent to Shirley. That day I dropped in to see newborn Linda Susan, Shirley was there alone. I asked about John and he was out playing golf. He was always out playing golf. "But he should be back by now," Shirley kept repeating. He never showed up and I left late that afternoon. I suppose the 19th hole at Riviera Golf Club and his links pals were more fascinating then than his wife and new baby girl. At any rate, that's what led to the events which have placed Shirley in an unfavorable light. For John's regular foursome included Johnnie Johnston and Joe Kirkwood, names that soon were linked with Shirley Temple's in very messy gossip.

Well, by now all that is water over the dam for Shirley and she is anxious to forget it. Whatever I quizzed her about to confirm my suspicions, she answered frankly and truthfully without making any excuses or alibis. "I'll tell you the truth, Hedda, scout's honor," she said, "but then I don't ever want to talk about it again." I don't blame her. Shirley washed her dirty linen publicly in her divorce testimony, frankly and in detail, and I'm not going to rehash that here. But for that, too, she drew harsh criticism. She could have won her decree easily enough without baring so many unpleasant details, I knew. I asked Shirley about that.

"I felt I had to," she said. "It wasn't easy, but the judge said there should be no trivia. He instructed me to go back as far as I could and bring out strong incidents. Otherwise it would be just another Hollywood husband-shedding divorce story. Don't you see, if I'd done it the easy way it would give other young people the idea they could too. I think marriage," said Shirley, "should be difficult to achieve —and divorce difficult too, just as difficult as it can be."

She's well aware, believe me, of the seriousness of this sad chapter in her life. The hurt was deep and the ordeal exhausting. That's why she went to Hawaii with her parents and Susan, as Shirley said, "to lose myself for a while."

You can't beat Blue Hawaii for that. After her heartening welcome, Shirley took a little house on Kalianiole Road with five cats to keep Susan company and the Pacific right at her lanai. She swam in the soft surf every day, sunned lazily on the beach. She revisited all the places she'd known as a child, the Ichii Gardens, Waikiki, Honolulu's famous shops, the sugar cane and pineapple plantations, Pearl Harbor. She made friends with Margo, a lady hermit up the road, and took bones along for her dogs. She visited the leper colony on Molokai and Father Damien's grave. She learned the Tahitian hula and bought a ukulele and a book of instructions. Wherever she went, guitars serenaded her, and when one island emcee coaxed her into a floor show, Shirley remembered "Little Brown Gal" and hulaed until her knees shook.

Her scores of Hawaiian friends treated her as if nothing had happened, as if she were the same Shirley Temple they'd always known and loved. She was entertained at beautiful estates all over the Island, escorted by handsome naval officers and young Honolulu men about town, one of whom, Charles Black, I think you'll be hearing much more about in Shirley Temple's life. She danced, romanced and had fun for six wonderful weeks.

But all vacations come to an end and Shirley's did, as she wanted it to, once she'd gotten a grip on herself again. Shirley is no escapist. She knows she has responsibilities to assume and problems to meet. One is her career. I asked Shirley about that.

Her contract with Selznick winds up this June, then she'll be free, "at liberty." Before that she has a picture to make at Warners. She told me she'd been reading a script the night before, one that made her cry. It's a sequel to A Star Is Born, Janet Gaynor's greatest, and she'd like to do it. "I'd like to make a good picture for a change," she said. "I always want to work and do something worthwhile. But maybe it won't be pictures."

"Look, now—" I began.

"I mean it," said Shirley seriously. "I'm not so sure I want to keep on in this business. It's a beautiful one and it's certainly been wonderful to me. But I always said if it ever stopped being fun, I'd quit. Now I'm not too sure it's fun any more." She waved aside my interruption.

"My last five pictures have been awful," stated Shirley bluntly, "and now all this." Maybe her lower lip trembled just a bit. I asked her what she'd do.

"I'd like to write a book about myself and Hollywood," Shirley confessed, "only, I don't know, it might hurt a few people. I always wanted to study languages too and learn to paint. I could study surgery—"

"Be a doctor?"

"No," she answered, "but I could be a nurse. I want to help people."

A girl like that isn't going to flinch—as Shirley certainly hasn't—at even the crucifying ordeal which her bad luck in the choice of a first mate has brought her. Moreover, she has a saving sense of humor which flashes through whenever she starts to sag. In the midst of our talk about her current setup and the headaches it posed for her private life, she told me she had a habit of always buying something alive whenever she was in the dumps, the way some gals buy a new hat. "I saw Sands of Iwo Jima, the other night," she said wryly, "and got pretty depressed. I went out and bought a Great Dane—that's how depressed I was!" (John Agar is in Sands of Iwo Jima.)

But Shirley admits no bitterness toward John. She told me, "I hope he becomes a big star now, a very big success. I think he'll be happy then and I hope he finds someone and gets married." But about chances of any reconciliation, Shirley looked downright shocked when I mentioned it. "Oh, absolutely not!" she cried. "That's all over." It is, I'm sure, and yet a bad situation lingers on. John has visiting privileges once a week at Shirley's to see Linda Susan, so, once a week Shirley has to go through that.

That cutie romped into the room fresh from her nap while we talked. She still had a trace of her tropical tan and some pidgin English picked up from Chinese servants. Susan is almost three now and the sugary apple of Shirley's eye. She spends most of her time with her these days and Shirley put a record on the Capehart to show me how Miss Susan could dance, up on her toes, snapping her fingers, rolling her arms and all. Shirley taught her the shim-sham-shimmy just the other day as the great Bill Robinson once taught it to little Miss Temple herself. But Shirley shook her head firmly when I mentioned any kiddie career.

I couldn't help thinking as I watched Susan perform gaily, how her mama has the same right to some fun out of life—yes, right now, and right here in Hollywood. But she's sticking too close to home, seeing only her old friends. Her biggest thrills of the week are the hockey games where, as practically the Los Angeles Monarchs' mascot, she sits between the players and the penalty box.

But Shirley's determined not to stick her neck out in a night club or any Hollywood showcase. I told her I'd take her out with me if she wouldn't go any other way, and she said, "Okay, that's a date—but no escort—it isn't worth it!" I'm sorry she feels that way, and I think what Shirley really needs is a vote of confidence. I think it's high time, myself, that she had a few tokens of the old love she used to bask in, because she's the same wonderful kid underneath, believe me. She needs more letters like the one she got from her long-time booster, J. Edgar Hoover, saying, "I'm sure you did the right thing, Shirley, and I'm for you."

Shirley can do a great many things if she pleases. She has brains, talent, beauty, youth, and more wisdom now. She has all the money she needs, because her family protected her fortune for her. Lately she has been taking over more control of it. She invested in a mine recently and the other day bought her first stock on her own hook. Her broker called next morning. "It went up," he told her, "you made seventy-five cents."

But Shirley will not do any of the easy things. She looked aghast when I suggested that perhaps she might move away for a while, away from that honeymoon house and its memories, away from weekly visits by John Agar, away from curious, prying Hollywood. "This is my home," she said. And so it is and she's right and I think it's pretty swell of her to show so much moxie and spunk, the more because I know her feelings are deeply scarred and every day around Hollywood something tears the wound open again.

Shirley's final divorce decree rolls around next December 6, when she'll be free as a bird to marry again. I asked her if she would.

"I certainly hope so," said Shirley. "That's what I'd rather be than anything in the world—a real wife, a real mother." She's a real mother right now, if you ask me, but she never had a chance to be a real wife, the kind she wants to be. I'm not worried too much about her second chance at love. In fact, it wouldn't surprise me for a minute if she already has the lucky guy picked out. Shirley wouldn't say a word, not a "yes" or a "no" or even a maybe—about the attractive man she dated most steadily in Hawaii, Charles Black. (Charlie Black, by the way, is the son of the president of the Pacific Gas and Electric Co., a very wealthy and extremely popular young man.) But she still can't control the twinkle in her eyes or keep her dimples from deepening under fire. And I'll bet a pretty that Shirley did more than "lose herself" in Honolulu. I think she lost her heart.

I certainly hope so, because more than any other thing Shirley needs a love interest in her life right now.

Frankly, I don't blame her for keeping mum as a clam about Charles Black. She's been singed once and she's cautious. Besides, if she is seriously interested, she won't risk spoiling anything real by a Hollywood fanfare, which the handsome Honolulan wants no part of.

Charles is thirty-two, the mature man Shirley should have if and when she marries the second time. He's good-looking, socially tops, an important man in Hawaii. What's more, from what my Island friends tell me, he's nobody's easy-to-get guy. He's not impressed with the fact that the girl he beaued around was the famous Shirley Temple of Hollywood. He's not impressed with Hollywood, period. That's a refreshing new face to romance for Shirley, who's had about everything she wanted, might find something she can't have right away more valuable and lasting.

I do know she's mighty interested and the reports I got were that Shirley seemed very content to let Charles dominate her wherever they went and not at all shy in showing that she liked both him and the idea. There are certainly some mighty lovely rides up over the Pali and along beaches scented by tropic blossoms in Hawaii. They took those rides together, Shirley admitted that, and if she can resist their spell with a handsome bachelor like Charles Black, she's not the girl I think she is.

"If you do marry," I asked her, "what kind of a man will he be?"

"Someone with a mind," stated Shirley forcefully. "And preferably a business man." Well, from what I've been hearing Mister Charles Black has a mind, and he's in business.

If Shirley isn't in love she's close to it, and that's close enough for me to stick out my neck and say she's found it. That doesn't mean she's hiding a ring somewhere, but it does mean she's on the track back to happiness. And real happiness will come to Shirley Temple only when she's married again. Of that, I'm dead certain. THE END that's hollywood!

During the war, while Groucho Marx was entertaining overseas, he expressed a desire to see the front. He was escorted to a General's command post. The battle was close by. In the midst of the excitement, the field phone rang. Groucho instinctively picked it up and barked: "World War II."

(Continued from page 61) afternoon. From two to three—if they'd been little lambs all week—the class was allowed to put on a show. Jane could sing better than most ten-year-olds. On an impulse that day she sneaked in a ukulele.

"Who wants to recite?" asked the teacher.

Jane's hand went up timidly. "I can't recite but I know a song. . . ."

It was a funny song. Strumming the uke, Jane gave it her all. The kids were delighted. They beat time to the rhythm, they laughed and applauded. Later, in the school yard, they gathered round her, and begged her to bring the uke back again next week. She floated home on a high pink cloud, she was in. . . .

Her aim was to stay in, and that's where she started getting lost. For the sake of popularity, she covered up the sensitive Jane and her sensitive feelings. Growing into high-school age, her quick mind and tongue developed a breezy way with language that made people laugh, and she found they liked her for it. Often she didn't feel funny at all. Often a great sense of loneliness engulfed her and she wanted to talk her heart out to someone who would understand. But people were bored by such things, especially from Jane. She wasn't the type. "Are you kidding? With that nose of yours, who could take you seriously?"

Far too proud to force confidences on anyone, she forced herself instead into an artificial mold. "Jane's a clown, Jane's always good for a laugh." She liked to laugh when the mood was on her. But to keep her hard-won place among her peers, the mood had to be sustained. Jane wasn't the prettiest girl around, nor the plainest either. Plainer girls, more secure within, could afford to be themselves. She couldn't. Mirth, she decided, was all she had to offer—so come on, let's be merry, what can I do next, how silly can I act? The effects were gratifying. And if something cried inside, she could always drown it out by laughing louder. . . .

Along with this ran a great yen for independence. At home she was tied to her youth—too young to grow up, too young to go out with boys. She didn't especially care to go out with boys, they sort of annoyed her, they were the young ones. Herself, she didn't feel young at all. She felt mature and capable. Impatient to try her wings, she quit school as soon as she could for Hollywood. Not because she thought she had any special talent or had visions of her name on the marquees. But here she'd be free to depend on herself, and she'd reached the sage conclusion that self was the only thing you could depend on. Somehow, in Hollywood, she'd go about building a life that was bound to be good because it would be her own. Besides, she had something to prove to the world—what, she didn't know. Besides, she could sing and dance a little, which would help her get started.

By the time she arrived, the protective shell was pretty well formed. It was destined to thicken. Jane thought she was grown up. Actually, no one could have been more naïve. After snagging a chorus job at one of the studios, she went out to buy some clothes, the first she'd ever bought for herself. The dress featured a red georgette top and a black satin skirt. The big picture hat out-Dietriched Marlene. The clip was a rhinestone horror, with rubies yet. Then she caught sight of a foxtail cape in the window. To call it a cape was overstatement. There weren't enough tails to go round, and a couple of legs tied the thing together in front. Jane found that her next week's check would cover it. Out of the shop she pranced in full regalia and took a slow walk up Hollywood Boulevard, swishing the so-called cape from front to rear in a gracious effort to accommodate all admirers.

This rig didn't express Jane. It expressed her notion of what you wore in Hollywood to produce an effect. For the same reason she dyed her hair coal-black, frizzled her bangs, coated her face with makeup and used artificial eyelashes—the kind that had to be stuck on one by one. At the end of two weeks a girl named Pokey, who danced in the line with her, took her aside. "Jane, why do you wear those jokers?"

"So I can flap in the breeze like the rest of the actors. . . ."

"That's fine when you're under the lights, but not in rehearsal. Look at the rest of us. See any eyelashes? And not to be mean, Jane, but while we're on the subject, d'you ever wash your face real good?"

"Why, of course!"

"Then do me a favor. Next time you wash it, just put a little lipstick on and that's all. If you don't like it, well, your makeup kit won't run away."

Jane liked it. So did Pokey next day, who took it big. "Well, how about that!" So did the other kids. Whether tipped off by Pokey or not, they all came up, even the boys. "You look super today, Jane." Lesson No. 1 was learned for good and all. Daubing your face with paint, tricking yourself out in flashy clothes—these brought attention, but the wrong way. . . .

Other lessons followed, some of them less kindly taught. They spread over many years and many experiences. For better or worse, Jane was in the movie game now, playing for keeps. She found it a challenging game, but tough. A man's game really, where you had to meet masculine minds on equal terms and fight for the chance to prove whatever it was you were trying to prove. In every encounter, Jane stood her ground. She didn't always win, but if she went down, she went down with colors flying. As an opponent, she came to be respected for honesty, courage and not knowing when she was licked. Never go soft, Wyman told herself. Going soft meant being crushed. Going soft meant reverting to childhood when everything hurt you. She was through with being hurt. If you forged your armor strong enough, no barb could pierce it. If a chink showed up, cover it quick before anyone saw it. Betty Kaplan, her dearest friend, sometimes saw these chinks. To Betty alone, Jane would reveal glimpses of the little girl who'd played chairs because they were nice to her. Otherwise, she kept this aspect hidden. Now as then, she refused to foist on people what they didn't want. Little by little, and without awareness, she thrust the serious side so far away that she all but stopped believing in it herself.

She came to be identified with the parts she played—the wise customers, dipped to the ears in glitter, spraying their snappy remarks all over the place, the chicks who knew their onions and wouldn't be caught dead with a line of sentiment. You couldn't blame people for thinking this was Jane. She didn't need writers to put words in her mouth, her own stuff was as good and frequently better. In any gay group, she was the gay center. It was school all over again, it was Jane winning recognition from the crowd, it was lots of fun. If the old restlessness stirred, the vague sense of heartache that couldn't be nailed, she'd push it way under. "What's eating you, Wyman? You're sitting on top of the world."

Her first inkling of what was eating her came during the war. For years she'd been living in a land of make-believe. Now in camps and hospitals she faced up to reality. Boys leaving everything dear to them, not knowing when or whether they'd be back. Boys coming back with broken bodies, trying to keep their minds and spirits whole. She wasn't afraid of being soft with these kids. The question never arose. In compassion for them, she forgot all about herself—and wondered, with all the sadness, why her war work brought her a new kind of peace. Much later a friend explained it this way:

"Let's say life's a road, and you're in a motorcar. If you turn the headlights in on yourself, you're driving blind and of course the road is dark. If you turn them away from yourself toward life and people, you'll be amazed at how the shadows vanish."

She also began meeting real people in her pictures. After a weary succession of varnished puppets, she met Helen in The Lost Weekend. To take pieces of dialogue, draw a girl out of the pieces, mould her into a flesh-and-blood human—such a chance had never come Jane's way before. Helen excited her, and troubled her, too. What was it about Helen that made her real? The answer came. "She's always herself. She never bothers to put on an act. She's not afraid to show what she feels."

I'd hate to have anyone play me, Jane thought slowly. "They wouldn't know who I am. I don't know myself. . . ."

She found out more about herself in The Yearling. Ma Baxter was like a mirror, reflecting Jane. She too had been hurt by life, she too was fearful of letting the warmth come through. In the end it broke through anyway.

They were preparing that scene. "Okay," the director said. "There was a heart, it's buried, let's find it."

Jane looked at him oddly.

"Anything wrong?" he asked.

"Nothing. Nothing at all. Just the way you said it. Made the whole thing clear in a flash."

When you've spent years building up a fake personality, you don't break it down in a week or a month. It took Jane a long time to get through to herself and she suffered plenty of pain in the process. But she made plenty of discoveries along the way. That a sense of injustice carried over from childhood is like carrying an elephant on your back. That heartaches aren't unique to you, everyone has them. That applause from the crowd may inflate your vanity, but leaves the real you empty. That most people have something better to do than sit around figuring ways to hurt you. That suspicion breeds suspicion and trust breeds trust and what you put into life, you get out of it. That the most important thing in the world is integrity, and unless you're willing to be yourself, you're nobody.

Little by little the defenses dropped and the heart came through. With Maureen and Michael, there'd never been any defenses, but once the blinders fell, Jane saw the fruits of her own false values even in the children. Especially Maureen, who was older and more impressionable. Children take their tone from their parents. If you're crisp, they're crisp. If you're nervous, the mood communicates itself to them. If you're a smart aleck, they're likely to ape your style. "Well, I'll be seein' you one of these times," Maureen called out to a departing friend. Jane pricked up her ears. It sounded familiar, but not at all like Maureen. It sounded like Jane, as Maureen had heard her a dozen times on the phone.

She watched the children and their reactions more closely. "Maureen, please don't talk so loud," she said one day and saw the child's face cringe. Jane's heart cringed, too. How often had she spoken as abruptly without noticing the effect on her daughter? Next time Maureen's voice shrilled in excitement, Jane smiled at her. "Think you're talking too loud, honey?"

Maureen beamed back. "Guess I am, Mother. Better bring it down."

No cringing, no resistance, nothing but good feeling and better results. A few days later Jane heard an exchange between the children. "Michael, if you don't give me that—" said Maureen. Then a pause. "Michael, I'd love to play with the lizard. Will you let me?"

"Sure," said Mike.

Anyone suggesting five years ago that Jane could do a part like Johnny Belinda or Laura in The Glass Menagerie would have been told to go soak his head. Who, Wyman? Strictly for comedy, folks. They may have been right. Maybe the Jane who'd wrapped herself up like a mummy couldn't have done it. Maybe her difficult struggle toward self-understanding brought understanding to the heart and spirit of Belinda. This much is certain. What was in the lovely sensitive deaf-mute, looking at you through Wyman's soft brown eyes, must have been in Jane, too, or it couldn't have come out.

The portrait of Belinda brought her world-wide acclaim and Hollywood's crowning tribute—the Oscar. Jane was as thrilled with these as anyone else. "But you can go on forever getting great parts, and that's still not living. I don't set myself up as any philosopher. All I know is what I learned for myself, the hard way. To me, living means people. I'm steering my course by people and what little I can contribute to happiness, even if it's only bringing a light to the eye that really comes from inside and not just from the optic nerve."

The most important people in her life are a girl of nine and a boy of four. Her biggest job is getting them started right. She'll count some of her own troubles as clear profit if they help in avoiding trouble for Michael and Maureen. No childish problem is too trivial for Jane to take seriously. "Mother," says Maureen, "it's time for a heart-to-heart." Jane follows her to the dressing room. Heart-to-hearts have to be in the dressing room, with the door closed, else they're not the genuine article to Maureen. "Mother, I lost my jacks. I've looked simply all over and I can't seem to find them."

This misfortune and all its possible solutions are gravely explored. But as Maureen grows, so grow the problems. A dilly popped up when she went off to boarding-school. The decision to send her was a headache in itself. Jane hated separating her from home and brother. On the other hand, she badly needed companionship of her own age. Jane discussed it with Ronnie, and together they decided that a good boarding-school, not too far from home, was the answer.

Maureen came back for her first weekend, looking stormy. "Mother, you've got to take me away from there. The girls don't like me."

Jane already knew the story from Maureen's house-mother, but kept her counsel. "What happened, dear?"

"Nothing."

"Look, honey, you don't get disliked for doing nothing."

A long silence. Then: "Mother, we'd better have a heart-to-heart." She could hardly wait for the door to close behind them. "The girls called me a bragger."

"Why?"

"I—said I had six fur coats."

"Oh, Maureen. You've got one mangy little beaver that somebody outgrew."

"Well, you've got six fur coats."

"In the first place, I don't have. Every coat with a piece of fur doesn't make a fur coat."

"Golly, Mother, I had to say something. There wasn't anything else to talk about."

"Maureen, look at me. Was that the real reason?"

What she saw in her mother's eyes brought an end to the conflict within Maureen. "No," she said. "I was trying to show off."

There was a time when Jane might have acted less wisely, might have been oversevere or over-protective. But she knew the pitfalls now and how to guard against them. "Maureen, I could fix this for you. I could tell them you didn't mean it, it was just a little girl's imagination. But I'd rather let you fix it yourself. Will you try?"

It wasn't an easy task to hand a child, nor for a child to perform. Maureen stuck with it, though. By the end of the season she'd won back the trust of the girls, which she wouldn't exchange for all the fur coats in the land. . . .

Michael's another character. Stubborn. When his two feet are planted, that's how he likes to keep them. Jane had told him never to ride his bike out front alone. She'd explained why. Michael disobeyed, and the nurse told Jane about it in his presence. He cocked an eye at her. "You want to see me in the libary?"

Her impulse was to break up higher than a kite. She controlled it, and led her son to the "libary." She sat him down. She went through it all again. How the cars were big, how Mike was little, how they might back out and not see him, how he might get hurt. "I don't want to use the paddle, Michael, but you're still at an age where it's pretty effective. And it won't hurt nearly as much as a car."

He listened amiably. "Are you froo now—?"

"Yes, I'm through now." Michael zipped out. Jane sighed. How was she going to lick this thing? She must have done something wrong or he'd have been impressed. He wasn't impressed.

Just then a head stuck itself round the doorway, and a honeyed voice spoke. "Mommy, I forgot sump'n."

"What? Your balloon?"

"I forgot to kiss you."

This meant surrender. It meant that Michael had unplanted his feet. A weight rolled off Jane. She gave him a bear hug and sent him on his way. . . .

Long ago there was a child who prayed for wisdom. She's found wisdom enough to handle her own children with intelligent love. She's found wisdom enough to know and be herself. As a fallible human, she'll go on making mistakes but they won't be the same mistakes she made before. Jane's achieved maturity. She's got the headlights turned toward the road where shadows vanish. . . . THE END

The first thing she did was consult Mary Wills, chief designer at the Goldwyn Studios, for a gown.

"It's up to you," she told Mary. "And please, make it gorgeous. . . ."

You wouldn't believe it to look at her, but Joan has a problem with her figure. She still fights "baby fat" with diet and exercise. She's even too short, by modern standards—a little under five-feet-four.

"We'll give you a long line," said Mary, "so it won't cut you in two at the waist."

But it was more than knowing the trick of proper line that went into the making of that "low-cut, red dress." Mary Wills is a creative artist. She thought of Joan as a flower, a young girl about to bloom, and she said that Joan reminded her of a rose. So she selected a light red taffeta and cut the skirt like enormous petals. The bodice grew into petals over—but standing away from—the shoulders.

When it was finished Mary Wills asked Mrs. Samuel Goldwyn to come see Joan in it. Mrs. Goldwyn is a woman of impeccable taste. Look at the way she dresses and you'll agree. Mrs. Goldwyn was enchanted. Joan's parents were, too.

As every honest teen-ager will admit, when you go to the senior prom—or the Academy Awards presentation—the dress comes first. The fellow who takes you is, really, secondary. He'll do so long as he is fun and nice.

Well, Carleton Carpenter had asked Joan to go with him to the Awards. Carleton is that wonderful kid from Lost Boundaries, and The Tender Years.

It was the first time either one of them had attended a presentation. And neither one had been nominated for anything. Carp said, boyishly, "This year we'll be able to enjoy the Academy Awards, but next year, why we'll be too nervous. That's how you are when you're up for an award."

For a long time Joan and Carp had kidded each other about which one had his picture in the paper more often. It happened that on the afternoon of the Academy presentation Joan's hair had been put back to its original color. When she'd made Roseanna McCoy and Our Very Own her hair was lightened to a reddish gold. Now she'd let it turn black again.

As a result, when she and Carp stepped out of the car no one recognized her and over the loud-speaker came the words, "Carleton Carpenter now arriving." Carp gloated and Joan pretended to be furious.

When, weeks later, the radio commentator declared that Joan had her face covered with makeup I wondered if he and I saw the same girl. At the Academy Awards presentation Joan wore lipstick and eyebrow pencil—that's all in the makeup line.

And about the way she acted. I saw how she greeted people—the photographers who were recording the event, her friends in the audience. She was a charming girl, excited because she was part of her town's biggest night.

The evening was not without mishap—as what senior prom or Academy Awards presentation ever is? Carp is a long, lanky kid; his toes turn in, and he has the biggest feet this side of the Mississippi. In getting out of the car he stepped on Joan's dress and the loosely-tacked petals came away from the taffeta underskirt. Joan managed to hold the dress together.

She had borrowed her mother's pearls and the last words her mother had said to her when she left the house were, "If you lose my pearls, young lady, I'll never let you borrow anything of mine again."

As she held up her skirt, the pearls suddenly came unfastened and there was a mad scramble to find them.

When they were seated in the theater at last, Joan raised her arm to wave at her friend, Ann Blyth, and the two stitches that held the shoulder petals gave way, so Joan had to complete the evening wearing her coat.

When Joan and Carp got home they were bursting with excitement. "I cried," Joan said. "Every time anybody got an Award I was so happy. If I ever get an Oscar I'll be crying so hard I'll never be able to get up to the platform."

But the memorable evening had the edge of happiness taken off it by the snide criticism of the commentator who thought Joan's parents should be warned that her dress, her makeup and her behavior were unbecoming.

So what is a teen-ager to do? For, believe me, if Joan had appeared at the Academy in a girly-girly organdie and her hair in pigtails she would have been criticized, too.

Now the reason I'm going into all this in such detail is because when I sat with Joan as she listened to that broadcast I had the beginning of what I believe is a swell idea for a monthly teen-age feature in MODERN SCREEN.

It would deal, for instance, with important problems like dating. How should a girl conduct herself on dates, how often should she go out, when should she be in?

To get a clearer picture of this I asked Joan all about her social life and I unearthed a rather startling fact that might amaze the commentator who criticized Joan's behavior. There are five kids, including Joan, all somehow connected with the industry—who have gone out a lot together. One Saturday they drove to Apple Valley for lunch. On the way they talked—as always—about movies, particularly about the re-release of Wizard of Oz. Joan said, "I love every one of the thirteen Oz books. When I was a little kid I read them over and over again."

She got a big response. The other four had been brought up on the Oz books, too, but had not read them for years. It was then that the "Oz Society" was founded—a very exclusive society of five. So now once a week, the five get together in one of their homes and take turns reading aloud from those delightful children's books.

Saturday night is glamour night. Then Joan goes, occasionally, to a night club. Sometimes it's a foursome with her parents and sometimes it's four or six kids. But Joan doesn't go to joints.

And then there are the movies—movies, movies. All the kids Joan knows are ardent movie fans. They see films both for business and pleasure—but they go to early shows because they have to get to bed early on week nights.

So much for the movement of Joan's social life. I dug deeper. I asked her for the emotional side of the picture. "I've had crushes—two or three," Joan said, "what girl hasn't? And I go out with a lot of different boys and I've heard a lot of different lines."

"How can you tell a 'line' from the real thing?" I asked.

"Oh, you can tell," Joan said. "For example, a boy hurt me a lot not very long ago. He said I had a protective wall built up around me, that I didn't really care about anybody, that I was cold and only interested in other people for what I could get out of them. That I had no real affection.

"Now, there's one thing I know: I am interested in other people. Even if my interest were not based in affection—and it usually is—I have so much curiosity that I'd take an interest. It always hurts you to be accused of being someone you know you aren't because then you begin to doubt yourself: you ask, 'Am I really like that?' I was hurt until I started to examine what he had said and suddenly it dawned on me. I thought, 'Why, that's a line. He's using the good old shock technique. He thinks if he says terrible things about me to my face he'll make such an impression on me that I won't forget him.' And once I knew it was a line I didn't feel bad."

"Anyway," Joan says, "I don't want to get too serious about anybody. I firmly believe that you have to know a lot of boys—and hear a lot of lines—before you can make up your mind about who is the one boy in the whole wide world for you."

In many ways Joan is wise beyond her years but she's still a teen-ager with many problems.

I was turning this over in my mind one day when I happened to be at the Goldwyn Studio and stopped by to see Joan. She wasn't working in a movie and yet it had been a rugged day. She had appeared at the studio at nine and for three hours was in the throes of a physiology test (she got an A, by the way, I later learned). At twelve she had eaten hastily in the studio coffee shop and gone to her singing lesson with Nina Koshetz. At two-thirty, back at the studio, she worked for two and a half hours with her dramatic coach, Bob Paris. She had taken a physical beating, too, for the scene she and another of Bob's pupils, Marshall Romer, were doing was from Duel in the Sun and when the script read "he slaps her," Marshall really slapped her. Hard.

It was five o'clock and she was waiting for her father to take her home for dinner and then, immediately afterwards, to a dancing lesson with Nico Charisse. Yes, it had been a rugged day and added to all this, while running from the lunchroom to the taxi that would take her to her singing lesson, she'd bumped into one of the Goldwyn executives. She had called out a hasty "Hi" and run on. But he had stopped her to admonish her that this was not polite, that when she saw an older person on the lot she should stop and say, "How do you do, Mr. So-and-So."

Now, at five, she had just picked up her fan mail and was thumbing through the letters when I dropped into her dressing room. "Listen to this," she said. "'Dear Joan: I'm a girl your age and so I wanted to ask you what to do. I'm a brunette and I think I should wear red lipstick. My mother says this is unbecoming for a girl of my age and I should wear a pale pink. My father thinks I shouldn't wear any—but I'd feel positively naked without it. However, he's pretty sensible and lets me. But when I go out with my friends I feel I look all washed out with the pale lipstick and the boys say the light shade is positively repulsive. Everyone says something different. What would you do if you were me?'

"See!" Joan said when she finished the letter and carefully put it back in the envelope, "teen-agers can't seem to do anything right."

And that's when the idea I've been talking about really took shape. I said, "Joan, how would you like to work for MODERN SCREEN?"

"Oh, please," she said. "I have enough troubles of my own."

I outlined a plan to her. "Why don't you answer—say—three questions a month in MODERN SCREEN. Let it be the questions you consider represent important problems to teen-agers. What do you say, Joan? I'm sure there are a lot of kids who feel the teen-ager is always wrong. I think you could help them."

"I'd love it," Joan said, "but it would be a big responsibility."

"Well, you're a big girl," I said, "and you have a lot of big responsibilities."

Then she was thoughtful for a long time. "Do you think I could do it? I've read many columns like that but they're usually written by people a thousand times wiser than I am."

"Could be," I said, "but let me tell you my thinking on the subject. You're a teen-aged girl faced with problems that seem unusual but when scaled down to size are exactly those of girls all over the world. And, it seems to me, you've handled your problems well."

Joan's face lit up in that big smile of hers. "If you think I can do it—well, then, I will."

So we made a verbal agreement, shook hands on it and I went home to write this story.

If you remember, I asked you earlier to put yourself in Joan Evans' place. Now Joan is going to put herself in your place.

So, if you have any problems, write about them to Joan Evans, at Box 93, Beverly Hills, California. Please, though, don't expect answers by return mail. With everything else Joan has to do this would be impossible. But she will pick—and answer—three questions every month. So remember, Joan is waiting—letter opener in hand.

THE END

We think it's a swell idea, too. Beginning next month Modern Screen will present a new service feature to its teen-age readers.

Looking for a reason why these two people couldn't get along, a reporter must come to one inevitable conclusion. Bette Davis is a very tired woman. During eighteen years in the movies, she has made something like sixty pictures. Never in the history of acting has so much taxing work been done by an actress. The roles in those sixty pictures have been everything from floosies to queens. Each one required hard, sapping months of work, not only before the cameras, but at home, far into the night, week after week, year after year. Such effort must leave a mark on a personality.

And during this work, she was treated like an empress. For eighteen years, Bette Davis, the famous movie star, had every whim granted by her studio and the people she surrounded herself with. No mere man could come along and change all that. No man could tell her to have the supper on the table by six o'clock or she'd get a shellacking. No matter who had the most pockets, Bette Davis, by instinct, wore the pants.

In her early life Bette was pampered. Oh, there were a few poor days, but she was educated in private schools, granted irregular concessions in the way of education and the choice of a career. At one time, when she decided to be a dramatic dancer instead of an actress, she left school for a year and went to New York to study under the tutelage of an East Indian authority. The death of the tutor halted that phase, but it wasn't until then that Bette went home.

Her preparation for marriage was flimsy. Her mother, suspecting that some day her child might have to settle down in a flat like other people, forced her to spend a year at home studying shopping, cooking, sewing and other chores. That was her preparation.

At a fairly mature age, Bette married Harmon O. Nelson, her childhood sweetheart. The marriage lasted six years, during which time all sorts of wild tales about tantrums and temper filtered out of their home. They divorced rather reluctantly, it seemed, as though they both regretted the decision. But later Harmon was said to have muttered to pals about being married to a movie star instead of a woman. It can not be denied, though, by anyone who knew Bette Davis then, that she carried a fair torch for some time.

Two years later, however, she married a businessman named Arthur Farnsworth. It was short-lived and, as reported in the gossip columns of 1940, Mr. Farnsworth passed away suddenly, halting divorce arrangements that were in the making.

There is excuse and explanation in the background of Bette Davis for her current adventure. But this doesn't make it easier for Mr. Sherry. A man does not look at the teeth and the psyche of a prospective bride. Mr. Sherry no doubt anticipated a full life of love and companionship with a vibrant, healthy woman when he married Bette. He was unwise to our ways, unaware of the drain picture-making has on an actress when she is working.

However, shortly after he was married, he must have been cognizant of the fact that he was married to a girl who might throw a skillet at him. In the opening paragraph of a national magazine story telling the Sherrys' plans for bringing up their daughter, he was quoted as saying that the child, pictured holding a rock in her hand, was just like her mother—and might throw it at him. That quote may have been an accident, but it doesn't look like one now.

Any amateur student of human nature, analyzing the obvious things, must see in Bette Davis' off-screen face the evidences of her long reign as Empress of Burbank. Her mouth, drawn full on the screen, is tight and narrow. The upper lip is short and determined. Her eyes, without false lashes and heavy mascara, are wide and cold and queenly. They wear an expression of brittle insistence, as though to say, "We'll have no more of that nonsense!"

Her manner is nervous. And she is as likely as not to raise her hands in a sweep and expect to find a cigarette in her fingers, her wish anticipated. This is okay around a movie set, but hardly the thing in a man's own home. If Mr. Sherry had been the brute he has insisted he was, Miss Davis would certainly have had a number of broken fingers by this time.

Another suspected contributing factor to the Sherry debacle is that business of the two homes. Lots of people have two homes. Maybe one's big and the other's a shack at the beach or in the mountains. But the Sherry homes were close together, both very elegant and both served the same purpose. From the actions of the two of them when they parted, it can quite honestly be deduced that Sherry was not quite sure where he lived. As a matter of fact, he thought Bette was in bed in the Toluca house when somebody called him up at the Laguna house and told him he was the closest thing to a bachelor he'd been for five years. "I was shocked!" he said.

Three pertinent questions now present themselves. What truly happened the day Sherry tried to sack RKO single-handed? Is he going to fight the divorce? Is he going to ask for a property settlement?

The first question may never be answered. The last two are still hidden in Mr. Sherry's heart. They seem pertinent because Miss Davis hired an attorney named Jerry Geisler as her counsel. Jerry Geisler is California's most expensive lawyer. People don't pay the kind of fees Jerry Geisler gets unless they are in real trouble. It must be deduced, then, that Sherry plans to fight the action. Even that is not enough for Geisler. It must be, then, that Mr. Sherry is going to want to count all the money and divvy it up. This is pure speculation, but the facts seem to indicate that it is true.

Well, you've got the story. Take your pick. Is William Grant Sherry bloodthirsty or benign? Is Bette Davis Sherry a good, abused wife or a neurotic, overworked woman who can't find happiness because she is too tired? One guess is as good as another.

One thing, though, if Bette Davis were superstitious she might have thought twice before going to work at RKO in that last picture. You see, it's called The Story of a Divorce.

Betty's divided life is balanced as precisely as a doctor's prescription. She's been around Hollywood long enough to know that a career and home life are dynamite if you mix them.

At 5:00 P.M. sharp, no matter if genius is stirring, or inspiration is on fire at the studio, Mrs. Harry James wipes off her makeup, jumps into her jalopy and heads for home.

There's no projection machine in her house, and no shop talk. Her own husband, Harry, has seen her on the screen exactly twice since they were married. One of the pictures, to Betty's dismay, was The Beautiful Blonde From Bashful Bend. That movie sent her diving from second to seventh place (although she's still top gal) at the box office, and even today when you mention it she winces.

Beautiful Blonde, oddly enough, was Vicki's favorite. She calls it "Mama's cowboy picture," because Betty was covered from head to toe in Western trappings most of the time. But with the public, that "covered-up" look fell flatter than a pancake.

It'll be seven years come July fifth that Betty's been Mrs. James. The job of pleasing him and the public, too, hasn't been easy. Every year, the Women's Press Club of Hollywood nominates her for the "most uncooperative actress." (This year, though, Hedy Lamarr beat her out.) And long ago, her studio found out that unless they tackle her before she leaves the studio for whatever publicity tie-ups they want, she's a strictly gone gal.

Just the other day, when she finished My Blue Heaven, the pent-up demand for Grable publicity overtook her. At the same time, a doctor had just decided that Vicki's infected tonsils had to come out. Right then nothing but Vicki mattered to Betty. She rented a room next to Vicki's at the hospital, never left her side day or night, and when it was all over stayed home to nurse her. Maybe that cost something in magazine covers but Betty didn't give a hoot.

About that same time, Betty was booked for Chicago and the opening of Wabash Avenue. Nobody knew better than she that it was smart to help sell her picture. But a couple of other things happened just then: Betty found the house she and Harry had been hunting for, and it needed to be remodeled, decorated and furnished; Harry's annual band tour had come up (he'd be gone from home 13 weeks once he'd left), and the few precious days to spend with him and the kids would be out if she made the trip. It was a tough decision for a trouper like Betty to make but home and Harry won.

Yet only a few days before, that same home took second place in Betty's attention, when second place was what it deserved. Betty had worked all weekend with her decorator. Monday she had one of her toughest acts to catch with a camera for My Blue Heaven, and along about 4:30, when they'd been at it unsuccessfully for hours, she got a call on the set. Workmen at her house, she was told, were at a standstill, a crisis loomed at the new place. "We've got an impossible problem, Betty," said her decorator, "you've got to come over here right away."

The answer was a loud "No!" Betty made that plain and clicked the receiver quick. She was plenty sore that they'd called her. "Can you imagine me quitting work to go over there?" she said. "What do they think I have here but problems?"

A few days after, when Betty was ducking around her new house among carpenters, drapers, plumbers and bricklayers, you couldn't have interested her in anything about My Blue Heaven either.

A switch-hitter like that is hard to figure in Hollywood. "Uncooperative" is a mild criticism compared to some Betty draws. She's been accused of laziness, indifference, hostility, ungratefulness, a long list of indictments. Well, let's see how they stand up—

Betty is about as lazy as a beaver behind in his rent when she makes a picture. She shoots only two a year but each one runs four months, at least, and My Blue Heaven lasted five. Practically all are in technicolor, which is tricky shooting. All are loaded with songs and elaborate dance numbers, long on tedious rehearsals and timing. A Fox efficiency expert recently figured out that twenty-seven separate things can go wrong with every Betty Grable dance scene—and wreck the take. Until My Blue Heaven too, every Grable film in the last six years has been a period picture with an intricate hair-do to whip up from scratch every morning, and Marie, her hairdresser, sighs, "For Betty you have to take each tiny little hair, one by one, and put it in exactly the right place." That's why she's up at six o'clock every morning for around 270 days out of every year!

She's never had a makeup man, and always she's had a double job—face and body makeup, to put on and to take off. She goes through tiring wardrobe sittings six times as many as any other star. She usually burns through four pairs of shoes per picture and drops at least eight pounds. She's never late, because she'd wreck the day of a hundred-odd people if she were. She relaxes only at lunch, and keeps an athlete's hours at night, with a nine o'clock curfew.

While Betty made My Blue Heaven, for instance, her boss, Darryl Zanuck, had two big testimonial dinners tossed for him in Hollywood. They went on into the small hours. Every Fox star, great and small, showed up at both events—except Betty Grable. This was pointed out to her by a gossip guy hunting a feud, who asked, "What's the matter, don't you like Zanuck any more?" Betty's comeback was, "I think maybe he'd rather have me in shape for the camera the next morning than clapping for him the night before."

Director Henry Koster knows that Betty knows exactly what she wants out of every scene. He okayed takes time after time throughout My Blue Heaven only to have her object, "No, it didn't feel right—can we do it over?" She's her own toughest audience. She also knows what is good and what is bad Grable. (She cooked up her lone turkey, Beautiful Blonde under protest and against her better judgment.)

And Betty's determination to give her audiences only what they want cost her the only sniff she may ever get at an Oscar. She turned down the role of Sophie in The Razor's Edge, and that role won Anne Baxter an Academy Award. Betty has no regrets, though, because she's firmly convinced that she's a song-and-dance girl, and not a dramatic actress.

Betty Grable could make herself tons more money than she pays the income tax man right now (not far from $300,000 a year). She turned down $18,000 a week once for a radio program, and she knows perfectly well that she could clean up on personal appearances with Harry James practically any day she says the word. But she's leery of mixing up her family and her fame.

Since playing together in Springtime in the Rockies, which was a couple of years before their courtship, Betty and Harry have stayed strictly apart on the screen, although the pressure to bring them together before a camera has been terrific.

The only time Betty weakened enough to make a record with Harry's band she called herself Ruth Haag (Ruth's her middle name, and Haag's Harry's) and warbled "I Can't Begin To Tell You." It was a big hit, the truth leaked out and she's been refusing to cut another ever since.

She isn't trying to make enemies, and laziness was never one of her faults. But she knows there are only so many hours in a day. She knows that she can't spread herself around so thin without making her babies and her husband pay the price in happiness.

As it is, one of Betty's biggest fears is that her kids won't have enough of her love poured into them.

After every movie job, Betty bundles up her babies and sets out on a whirlwind shopping tour which sometimes lasts for days. Reason: they always outgrow their clothes during her long studio stretch—and Mrs. James insists that she pick out every stitch both Vicki and Jessie wear. She buys two of everything, size 8 and size 3, because she dresses her girls alike. Since becoming a mother, Betty has always written out complete instructions for their days. A year or so ago she started reading up on vitamins and family feeding, and decided she'd better do the grocery shopping too. That lasted longer than anyone had a right to expect, and only recently has she given it up as a steady chore. Even now, though, when she's not working she drops in and loads up. She knows her shopping bag onions too, which is a definite improvement. Betty's favorite honeymoon story is about the time she tried to cook Harry a dinner. She bought a roast of beef, opened her cook book and read, "first, wash the meat." Betty scrubbed it with soap and water, then popped it into the oven. She knew Harry liked his beef rare so that's how she cooked it. The "beef" turned out to be veal. She didn't know the difference then. How the veal roast tasted—rare and sudsy—is something she doesn't like to recall.

But if her training had been on the domestic side she's sure she would have been good, because she likes domestic life.

Betty's love and attention to her family is personalized in spite of her busy life. Last Christmas she had started My Blue Heaven, and was dancing every day. But she insisted on doing all the family Christmas shopping herself at night. "Nobody else is going to pick out my kids' bikes," she explained.

Betty likes her daughters to run in and wake her in the morning. And when she's not working she chauffeurs Vicki to and from Miss Buckley's school. On the annual trek south to Del Mar for the racing season (Betty's picture arrangement guarantees her holiday months then) Vicki and Jessie go along, too, to live in the seashore cottage and play on the beach, while Betty and Harry railbird every race at Bing Crosby's nearby track. Sometimes the kids even make it to the race track, but usually their share of the family hobby is out at the Calabasas ranch where Vicki has her own pony now, and both girls claim every new colt.

Betty and Harry's horse hobby has grown from two pinto saddle mounts, Bill and Mae, to a ranch, a racing string and the almost exclusive extra interest in their lives. They bought the ranch to keep the horses, they bought more horses to populate the ranch—that's the way it's grown.

Today Harry and Betty own thirty-four hayburners—twenty-eight at the ranch and six at whatever California racetrack is open. They've given each other brood mares for anniversary gifts these past seven years. This spring all seven had blessed events and Betty and Harry were on hand for each even though some of the colts arrived in the dark. After crawling out of the covers at six steadily for five months, the day after Betty finished My Blue Heaven, she got up at five o'clock to drive with Harry down to Hollywood Park and watch their racers work out in the dawn. They were shipping off that day to the Golden Gate track in San Francisco and she just had to tell them goodbye.

But the James family's horse-craze and all that goes with it exists neither to swell their bankroll nor to land them in Hollywood's swank horsey set. It exists because at the ranch they're a full family with everybody present every weekend.

There, Betty is exactly what she wants to be away from the set. She's the nurse for Vicki and Jessie the cook—even though it's just grilling steaks or hamburgers—and the lady ranch boss in the corral. There aren't any guests, besides an occasional horse trainer or jockey, so nothing of Hollywood has a chance to intrude. By the time Betty and her gang roll back to Beverly Sunday night, tired but refreshed, she's ready to tackle her picture Monday morning with everything she has.

The prescription works so well that Harry and Betty once dreamt of living their happy ranch life seven days a week. With that in mind they bought an even larger ranch across the road with two houses on it which they planned to remodel and enlarge into their hacienda. But they realized when they thought it over more seriously, that 20 miles each way is too far for those two careers which tug insistently at both, and besides Vicki and Jessie have the school problem coming up. So the first ranch is up for sale and the Jameses settled for a permanent Beverly Hills home just twenty minutes from Fox Hills. Right now Betty's having the thrill of her life fixing it up. It's the first time since her marriage that she's had that kind of fun.

In all her seven years of married life Betty has never had her own furniture until now. The Jameses have lived in two rented houses and one they owned, but Harry bought that one completely furnished. They sold it when, as Betty says, "we ran out of rooms."

This time she's starting from scratch, without even a scatter rug to build from. Every day of her "vacation" she's been on the job, and alone, because Harry's on tour. By now the house is painted—white on the outside, with dark green trim, and a dozen different Grable-mixed colors on the inside. Betty's personally wrestled with every decoration problem, from the bright chintz draperies to the six boarded up fireplaces she opened. She's found a place for Harry's collection of baseballs and the eleven crates of classic jazz records they've had in storage too long. She's furnished every room with the English country furniture she had made, and annihilated three bees' nests up under the eaves. She's knocked herself out on an extensive labor of love hoping to have it all in apple pie order for that seventh wedding anniversary July 5, which she also hopes arry and she can spend together. If they . it will be only the second time since ey became man and wife. (Harry has ually been on tour in early July.)

But all of this home building is not to npress her friends, or to set up a show- se for a Hollywood social life. The meses don't entertain and they don't go the Hollywood glitter spots—unless a usician pal of Harry's is opening there ith his band. They have one favorite staurant, the Tally-ho, where they go w and then on cook's night out, and ey take in the baseball games some nights hen the horses aren't running. But their ollywood blue book rating sticks close zero. The only Hollywood party they ow up at is the annual New Year's Eve fair at Jack Benny's.

Betty bought three beautiful evening wns three years ago and two are still nging in cellophane, untouched. The ird she wore last New Year's to the ennys', at which time Harry pried him- lf into the same tuxedo he owned when ey were married. He weighed 145 then d tips 190 today.

"I just don't see how people can find ne to play around and stay up nights," etty puzzles, "when they've got a family raise. It's all I can do to handle that ght and my pictures, too."

That's the simply stated key to Betty rable's aim in life. She doesn't want to avel—both she and Harry have had their l of that. She doesn't want the personal otlight or swarms of admirers fussing er her. They've had plenty of that, too. Last time Betty was in New York she epped out of the Astor on Times Square d although she wore dark glasses, low els and even bobby sox, a crowd gath- ed in a wink. She managed to fight her ay into the street and hail a cab. "What's ing on here?" asked the driver. "Some- body jump out a window?"

"No," answered Betty truthfully. "I guess they're just looking at me."

"Is that bad?" inquired the cabbie.

Betty knows it's not bad; in fact, it's the most positive evidence she could have that what she's worked for all her life is still hers. Betty always said that if she ever dropped out of the top box-office ten she'd quit pictures. When The Beautiful Blonde from Bashful Bend temporarily toppled her from the top of that select list, Betty brooded for days thinking maybe that time might be around the corner. But at breakfast one morning her face suddenly brightened up. "You know," she told Harry, "I've been thinking. What the heck would I do with myself if I ever did quit?"

Betty Grable knows that the delicate balance she keeps between too much Betty Grable on one side and too much Mrs. Harry James on the other is what makes her life purr smoothly along.

On the Grable side there are still things she'd like to do. She'd like to make a picture with Fred Astaire, an ambition she's nursed since she danced a specialty in one of Fred's early hits, The Gay Divorcée. She'd like to bounce back to that Number 1 spot in the Top Ten, too.

On the home side, she'd love another addition to the James family. And some people who know her well believe that if Harry said the word she'd risk her life trying for the son Harry wanted so badly when Jess was born. But the doctor warned her then not to make another date with the stork so they're thinking of adopting a boy. If they do, Betty knows that the hours in her day will shrink, but her heart will expand in proportion.

ontinued from page 47) Lachie, the ot. When Sherman glimpsed Richard ross the crowded room, he decided that s casting problem was solved. Shortly er they were introduced, he discovered at his troubles were only beginning. Not at Todd wasn't trying to be of help. He ew the play well, and he also knew st the actor for the role—some other ow.

"That's a very interesting opinion," erman remarked as he recovered from e shock. "But I had you in mind for e part."

The reluctant candidate had another inion. "I don't think I'd be good ough," he said. "And it wouldn't be r to the Scots."

When the party ended, Richard took thoughts and went home. Sherman k an aspirin and vowed to win the xt conversational round. He did a good . Richard listened to the director who t only said, "You should test for the rt," but added, "Please." So the test s made. And this was the notable ex- ption that changed the course of the e that Richard Todd almost never lived.

Todd's iron will began to develop when was 14. Soon after he had entered rewsbury School, he became ill and s sent home to Dorset, a rheumatic er case. The family doctor couldn't er much encouragement. "Your son ll be a semi-invalid for the rest of his e," he told Richard's parents. "If he es."

There were many doctors after that. ne of them would have given much re than a plugged nickel for his chances. And for a year, Richard had to take it lying down. For nearly another year, he took it sitting up. And then, when he was able to be out of bed, he moved under watchful eyes and warnings. "You mustn't exercise . . . no exertion whatever. . . ." "I was even supposed to walk gently," he remembers.

But Richard listened. He heard every word they said. And he spent many a mental moment disagreeing. As his health improved, he resumed his studies and his tutor made arrangements for him to attend a nearby school for examinations. Then he met the other students. The liking was mutual, but somehow he couldn't feel as though he "belonged." In 16-year-old Todd's eyes, a fellow who couldn't go in for sports was a sissy. Even a fellow whose heart might stop beating from the strain.

At first, he was fairly content to watch the Dorset teams. After a while, to take away the sting of invalidism, he began to help coach the athletes. He'd teach them how to run faster, hurdle higher. Gradually, he was thinking, "I'm getting better." Then he started taking some exercise, himself—long walks, bicycle rides. This was on the quiet. However, eventually he was allowed to attend sports meets in other cities as a spectator. And finally he gave up his seat on the sidelines. He joined the rugger team, dropped his last name, and as Richard Andrews he became one of the team's best players.

It wasn't long before the athletic Mr. Andrews was representing his county in the London matches. His skill at the game was winning him any number of medals. But he couldn't take them home to a proud family. Because to his family, he was still a ground floor patient. And as far as sports were concerned, a member of the cheering section. It was a great piece of deception, with the intrigue becoming thicker than a London fog. He thought his career was over once when he won an individual championship cup for his outstanding ability. It was a happy moment until he mounted the platform to receive the award. Face to face with the man who was to make the presentation, Richard recognized one of his father's best friends.

The old gentleman did a dignified double-take when he got a look at Richard Andrews, but the ceremony went on as scheduled. Afterwards, he called Richard aside. "I know you're not supposed to be doing this," he said. Then a perplexed expression crossed his face. "How in the world do you keep it quiet? And what do you do with your trophies?"

Richard explained that he passed out the medals to his friends. The cup was another problem. "I don't think I'd better take it home, sir. Would you mind keeping it for me?"

The thoroughly thickened plot blew up after a sports meet a short time later. The event was well covered by the press, and so was Andrews. He was photographed in action on the field and, unfortunately, the picture found its way into print. Suddenly Andrews was too famous for comfort. He returned home to find his father waiting, newspaper in hand. The senior Todd was frightened, but his lecture carried overtones of anger, too. His son promptly underwent a series of examinations. And the doctors checking his sound body and steady heartbeat proclaimed Richard Andrews Palethorpe-Todd a medical miracle. He'd played a thousand-to-one chance, and he'd won.

Once the physicians had assured him he was going to live, there came the problem of deciding about a very active future. Richard settled on the idea of becoming a writer. "Excellent," said his father, thinking fondly of Oxford or Cambridge. But when he was ready to enter a university, the thought of studying literature faded in favor of learning about the theater in a London school of drama. He had every intention of trying his hand at playwriting. And at this stage, it was a matter of drifting into the role of an actor.

When he left the school, he did a season of Shakespeare with a repertory theater. Again, he ran into opposition. It was friendly, as parental opposition goes, but nevertheless opposition. And no financial aid was forthcoming. Money was something he could have used when he and another actor founded the Dundee Repertory Theater in Scotland. They had barely enough cash to rent a theater. The building was ancient, the equipment likewise. Pieces of scenery were hardly visible beneath the dust. But the group of thespians was an energetic one. And fortunately, at first, members of the company didn't require much food because while their initial production was an artistic triumph, it was a box-office flop. However, their luck changed with a second offering. The theater caught on and out went freshly painted "Standing Room Only" signs.

In all, Richard had two-and-a-half years of stage experience before he left to play the theaters of war. He was in one of the first groups to volunteer. And facing the army physician, he thought, "Here I go again."

This was because the first question asked was a curt, "Any serious illnesses?"

"Rheumatic fever," came the reply.

A short discussion followed. "Todd," the doctor concluded, "you shouldn't be a soldier. You should be a corpse."

Richard, standing up for his rights went through a rigid physical examination, and as he now puts it, "The doctors nearly fell flat on their faces when I passed."

Soon after astounding the medicos, Todd was sent to Sandhurst Academy, where he trained as a battle school instructor. His excellent health was somewhat impaired when the academy was bombed and he spent two months in a hospital.

Next on his schedule was Iceland and he had to survive three days of physical examinations before they shipped him out. "An A-1 rating meant 100% fit," Richard recalls. "For Iceland, an A-1 plus rating was required." He grins, "I passed."

In the years that followed, Todd traveled extensively for the British government. After his Iceland stint, he returned to England to become a signals instructor and then he was transferred to a parachute battalion, just in time for D-Day. When questioned, he skims lightly over his war experiences. He remembers his 25th birthday spent in a deserted French farmhouse, a Christmas day in the front lines at the Battle of the Bulge, six weeks in the mud and water of Holland, the Rhine crossing, the Battle of Bismarck. "If it's your lot to be a member of a nation which has quite a lot to contend with, you should do what you can to help," he says.

In 1946, Richard thought about leaving the Army. He received a wire from his friend Robert Leonard, of Associated British Pictures, who had tracked him to the Middle East and was wondering if he'd like a screen test. Richard's first impulse was to say no. He'd lost any desire to be an actor. But Leonard persisted. "When you come home, drop by and see me. We'll talk about it," he wrote.

Instead, Richard decided to return to Dundee to find out if this acting bug was still with him. He found a thriving theater, about to produce the American hit, Claudia.

At a party one afternoon he met the leading lady, Katherine Bogel. She was small and blonde and lovely. And she was very nervous about playing Claudia. She had been ill and temporarily retired from the stage. This was to be her comeback role. Katherine confided that a lot would depend upon the man who played opposite her. She wanted to feel that it was someone she liked. Richard did his best to reassure her. He did even better. That same evening he ran into the Dundee director, who invited him to take the part of David. "I'd be delighted," Richard said, thinking of Kitty Bogel. She had seemed to like him well enough. As it turned out, he was right. However, when the play closed, he didn't see a great deal of Kitty for several years. They met again in London in 1948. They became engaged some months later. She liked him fine.

But Richard Todd, who had survived illness and war, ran into another obstacle—tradition, and a time element. The Todds and the Bogels wouldn't hear of their offspring being married without the required pomp and ceremony. Richard had finished his first film, For Them That Trespass, and was scheduled for The Hasty Heart. There was simply no time for a large wedding in a Glasgow cathedral, as planned by Kitty's family. He made The Hasty Heart, and almost immediately was cast in Stage Fright. It was beginning to seem as if Richard and Kitty would have to be wheeled down the aisle for the ceremony, then live happily ever after on old-age pensions.

Richard credits Jane Wyman with getting them to a minister. She was in London o do Stage Fright, and one evening she istened to their plight, and said, "We'll ave to see that you are married during he picture. I won't leave London until ou are."

It was a small wedding in London, and here was one day for a honeymoon, but vhen Jane Wyman left for America, she aid goodbye to Mr. and Mrs. Todd.

So Richard became a star and a husband nd the Todds even had their honeymoon, n American one, enroute to California or his role in Lightning Strikes Twice. He also had his first taste of the U. S. kind f fame when they reached New York. Richard and Kitty had been in their hotel oom for only a few minutes when the elephone rang.

"Hello. Is this Richard Todd?" came a mall voice over the wire.

"Yes," assured Richard. "May I ask vho's calling?"

"My name is Patty. . . ."

Richard riffled through his memory. I'm afraid. . ." he began.

"Oh, you don't know me," said Patty. "I want to come up and get your autograph."

Recovering the composure he'd lost for a second, Richard explained that he and his wife were very tired and weren't up to receiving guests that day. He explained this five times before he asked the operator to notify him before another call was put through.

The phone jangled for a seventh time. "A Mr. Smith of Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer would like to talk with Mr. Todd," said the operator.

Perhaps he should talk with Mr. Smith. "Dick?" Mr. Smith said. "I was wondering when you'll be coming down. I'd surely like to get your autograph."

Mr. Jones of Paramount had the same request. So did a Mr. Buckwalter of 20th Century-Fox. Then came a Mr. Kramer of Warners and Richard started to let him have it. He began his lecture . . . "Young man," he let him have it, "you shouldn't—"

He caught himself, and he smiled. Who was Richard Todd to be saying shouldn't? "I'll be right down," he said, and started for the elevator. THE END

've got a case on conte

(Continued from page 43) spent the next our trying to untangle myself from the ne. Finally I made one halfway decent ast. Something grabbed the end of my ine. Frantically, I hung on and tried to and it. Every fisherman on the dock asped in amazement when I pulled in ny catch. It was a shark! At that point wouldn't have been at all surprised to ear Nicky's voice coming out of it, saying, "Don't you recognize me?"

When we at last settled down in Hollywood, we managed a usual enough existence. Some of our old friends had migrated from New York; we made new friends. All the time we planned for the day when his success would be assured.

When that day came, we rented a house nd set out to furnish it. Our first real nd was an antique phonograph. It had big blue horn attached to it, decorated vith pink roses. It was very sensational -even though it didn't work very well.

Then we bought a shaving mug. Nicky ad to have that mug. It seemed to recall he memories of his childhood when he'd een around his father's barber shop in few Jersey.

By the time Nicky'd persuaded his faher to come visit us, we had a shelf full. Patsy beamed when he saw them. But hen we told him how much we paid for ach one, he couldn't believe it.

"I'll get you all you want for nothing," e said.

"But, Patsy," I said, "these are valuable. eople don't give these away nowadays."

Patsy looked skeptical. After he'd gone ome to Jersey, a whole army of shaving ugs began to cross the country to our ollywood home. They were real beauties.

Later we learned where Patsy got them. ld friends of Nicky's family in New Jerey wanted to wish him well, and their ifts of mugs was their way of wishing.

Nicky and I began to go to art exhibits, nd one afternoon, Nicky said, "I've got to aint." Pretty soon he started. I thought e'd be amateurish, but he certainly wasn't.

Now I'm Nicky's most frequent model. ut he never makes me look like a movie tar. First portrait he ever did of me, I as working at the ironing board.

After we'd been in Hollywood a while, nd Nicky started getting parts opposite lamorous stars, I began to wonder how e liked another woman's claiming his isses. Sometimes I got very curious.

My little worries were over, though, the day he came home and said, "I've been kissing Barbara Stanwyck all day. And boy, am I tired!"

Nicky was getting pretty well known then; his contract at Twentieth looked like a steady living. And after he was lent to U. I. for Sleeping City, which was filmed in New York, he got a taste of what it's like to be a celebrity.

The Mayor of Jersey City sent a special police escort clear into New York to bring Nicky home for a big, city-wide day in his honor.

First we were taken on a tour of all the places which had once meant something important to Nicky. We saw the house where he was born; at least, we saw the ground under it because only the foundations remained. The railroad yards next to it, though, were still there.

We went to Patsy's barber shop, where the windows were plastered with reels from Nicky's pictures. Then we went to Mr. Belasco's fish market. Mr. Belasco pours Shakespeare across the counter as he sells fish. Now he was so proud he could hardly talk.

All up and down the street it was like that—people wanting to shake hands, to offer us food. I couldn't help remembering the comment Nicky made to me once at a Hollywood party. "You know," he'd said, "it's strange how the poor always somehow manage to have something to eat for their friends, while the rich let you sit nursing a drink and starving."

These wonderful friends didn't ask about Hollywood. They asked only about Nicky, and how it was with him.

We ended our grand tour at the City Hall where Nicky was given the key to Jersey City.

Then came a testimonial dinner, and there were speeches and toasts and Nicky spoke about acting. He said it was a responsibility to be an actor. He said, "The people make you and your talent belongs to them. You must never lie to people."

I thought way back to the time he'd written a biography of a man who walked across a park, feeling lonely, and I felt choked up. I don't know, maybe it was the wine. But I don't think so. THE END are the big stars too old?

Eventually, when the film was released, the verdict of the critics was, "It stinks!"

Let it be known that the star in question was not Joan Crawford. Admittedly 42 years old, Joan was for some years so violently sensitive about her age that any writer who mentioned it was subject to cold reception. Today Joan doesn't bother to deny that she has passed into the older star bracket. True, she plays women younger than her actual age. True, too, that her closeups are a problem. In closeups she may have as many as eight or ten baby spots playing on her from all different directions to erase those lines.

Actually, Joan was much older five years ago than she is today. At that time she had the fear of aging so firmly imbedded in her subconscious that she was seldom her natural self. It is a truism among women the world over that it is not age but the fear of age that makes a woman old. It wasn't until Joan realized this fact that her career, which had fallen into the doldrums, was suddenly revived.

Bosses at major studios are worried over the number of stars, both male and female, who are signed to airtight long-term contracts. In the privacy of conference rooms, these people are referred to as "over-age destroyers." They draw down huge sums of money and must be used in pictures in order to return some money on the investment made in them.

Still, some courageous studio executives refuse to be "shoved around" by older stars who fail to realize that even a strong contract cannot protect them against waning public popularity. Typical of the new type of thinking is this statement made by Stanley Kramer, young producer of Champion, "It is the idea power behind a picture, not the name power, that will bring the public the type of films it really wants. In time, a steady succession of pictures like Champion, which sent Ruth Roman and Kirk Douglas into the select circle of stardom, will revitalize the star system. Nothing is so good for a star as a good idea for a picture."

This is simple common sense that a great many stars cannot accept, because they actually believe that they know more about stories than do trained writers and producers. What many of the stars are really doing is insisting on characterizations they think will show them in a youthful light.

Such was probably the object of Ginger Rogers a few years back, when she attempted scenes in a picture during which she wore pigtails and acted like a little girl. The results were painful.

Similarly, Katharine Hepburn and Spencer Tracy, aged 41 and 50 respectively, appeared in a picture called Adam's Rib. Hepburn played a female attorney which was not unreasonable. Tracy, however, allowed himself to be cast as an assistant district attorney. This was not so reasonable. Assistant district attorneys who are worth their salt are usually young men in their twenties, fresh out of law school. Not only that, but the kittenish manner in which Hepburn and Tracy played the little love story against the background of a fancy apartment and a country house was hardly in keeping with the new realism demanded of Hollywood.

In one theater a ticket-buying critic rose from his seat, exclaimed, "At their age they should be ashamed!" and left.

A touch of hilarity was added to the seriousness of the whole subject of aging romantic stars by Barbara Stanwyck. When asked why she went around with no attempt to hide the fact that her hair was completely silver-gray, she said, "Only the young dye good!"

Many of our older stars who insist on appearing in stories of young love are so difficult to photograph that important cameramen make every excuse to avoid taking on the job.

One cinematographer, who must remain nameless, recently stood in the middle of an outdoor set looking at a strip of film. The scene was a daylight closeup of a male and female star who will never see forty again. "I'm either going to quit the business after this one," he moaned to his assistant, "or ask for a Lassie picture as my next assignment."

His objection was not to the stars or to their age, but to the fact that they were pretending to be people in their early twenties, and none of his artistry could cover up this obvious phoniness. Nor would this cameraman have voiced such an objection to Barbara Stanwyck, who throughout her career has insisted on uncompromising honesty.

Barbara has appeared in pictures which she herself will classify as "stinkers," but her personal integrity has never suffered. Always acting within five years or so of her actual age, which is 43, Barbara retains a tremendous personal sex appeal whether in person or on the screen.

To illustrate, a group of writers recently were passing remarks about various actresses who happened to pass by their table at the Metro commissary. These actresses were examined with bold masculine scrutiny, and classified according to various degrees of sex appeal.

"A very sad crop of dollies this season," one writer commented.

At that moment Barbara Stanwyck, fresh from her first scenes with Clark Gable in To Please a Lady, swept in. The writer's head seemed to spin like a top. "Ah," he said, "look at that sex appeal! Anyone present who wouldn't want to show Stanwyck his etchings is a liar."

In other words, there are exceptions to every situation. Another exception is Loretta Young, who will be 37 next January sixth. Almost anyone in his right mind will admit that by some unaccountable miracle Loretta seems to grow more beautiful and youthful as time goes by. Perhaps it's because Loretta has always been completely indifferent to age. While other stars have been known to start covering up their real ages after they pass 24, Loretta always looked forward eagerly being an adult and the idea of comple maturity has never caused her anxie

As a friend of hers put it, "I know half dozen girls in Hollywood who are yet 21, but they worry so much abo growing old that compared to them Lo etta Young could pass for Elizabeth Ta lor's twin sister."

And right here is indirect proof th most of our stars are far too old for r mance. Even before she was 17, Eliz beth Taylor was cast in torrid romant roles. Of course, she appeared a litt older than her tender years, but the pul lic accepted her immediately. Elizabe Taylor is the unofficial queen of the Met lot today because people everywhere wl were around Elizabeth's age welcomed h affectionately both off screen and on.

Meantime, there are at least a doz girls in Elizabeth's category who ca break down the doors to studios.

Things are not quite so tough for t young male seeking a break in Holl wood, probably because women all ov the country make their male preferenc strongly felt. Montgomery Clift, who is not exactly a young sprout, knocke them for a loop in only one picture. Jo Derek scored similarly, along with Jo Agar, Scott Brady, Richard Todd, Dav Wayne and Marlon Brando.

These young men are all grabbing c important roles, and every time they d some established actor must step into t background. You never hear what hap pens to the older actors who lose ou Some of them have gone into televisio others have dropped completely out the business. For the most part men d not fight so bitterly to hang onto your romance in pictures as do the feminin stars. Nor are they so sensitive abo their ages.

For instance, Bing Crosby, who is 4 and remains one of our top favorite star has only one policy—that is to act his ag and treat any romantic situations int which he is put in the most casual man ner. The net result is that he cuts acro all age lines in favoritism and remain way at the top. Clark Gable is in a simi lar position. Next February first Gabl will be 50, but let him make an appear ance on the street and he will imme diately be surrounded by young admirer

The gray-haired Mr. Gable, who coul have married any little glamor girl thirt years his junior but chose a mate almo his own age, has never tried to kid any one about his birthday. Because of thi he's still King Gable of Metro-Goldwyn Mayer. There are many stars of his gen eration, however, who have fallen by th wayside, simply because they cheate themselves and then the public by refus ing to act their age. They spent hour having their hair dyed. They bough toupées, which is normal enough for se rious work, but an affectation otherwis

It is an almost unbelievable contradic tion that Hollywood studios, while sellin both youth and glamor to the world, clin to stars past thirty-five for the main por tion of their romantic stories.

Where does the fault lie? Not entirel with the stars. You can't blame them fo not wanting to jump into retirement. No entirely with the producers. Producer get their financial assistance from bank ers. Bankers aren't movie fans; they're in terested in making profits, and they'r reluctant to gamble on newcomers.

Until the stars and the producers an the bankers get together and take a ti from the public who knows what i wants, the ridiculous contradiction wil continue to exist, will continue to threat en the very foundations of the movi industry.

I SAW IT HAPPEN

Outside the Coliseum Theater in London a large crowd had besieged Gregory Peck, giving a charity show there before returning to Hollywood. I stood far back in the crowd beside a lady who seemed unperturbed by the autograph-hounds who jostled her continually. "You don't see many British stars standing in the street like this to sign autographs," I said to her. "I raise my hat to Greg Peck. He could easily have walked out the back entrance and avoided this." She replied with a smile, "You don't know my husband."

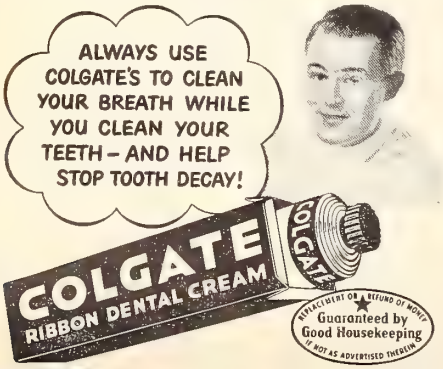
NOW! Dental Science Shows That Brushing Teeth Right After Eating with

COLGATE DENTAL CREAM STOPS TOOTH DECAY BEST



Better Than Any Other Way of Preventing Tooth Decay According to Reports in Authoritative Dental Literature!

2 years' research at 5 great universities—case histories of hundreds of people who used Colgate Dental Cream right after eating—shows the Colgate way stops tooth decay best! Better than any other home method of oral hygiene known today! Yes, both clinical and X-ray examinations showed the Colgate way stopped more decay for more people than ever before reported in all dentifrice history!

No Other Toothpaste or Powder Ammoniated or Not Offers Proof of Such Results!

Even more important, there were no new cavities whatever for more than 1 out of 3 who used Colgate Dental Cream correctly! Think of it! Not even one new cavity in two full years! No other dentifrice has proof of such results! No dentifrice can stop all tooth decay, or help cavities already started. But the Colgate way is the most effective way yet known to help your dentist prevent decay.

THE INSIDE STORY

Here's the truth about the stars—as you asked for it. Want to spike more rumors? Want more facts? Write to THE INSIDE STORY, Modern Screen, 1046 N. Carol Drive, Hollywood, Cal.

Q. Is it really true that their Catholic religion is the only thing preventing Bing and Dixie Crosby from getting a divorce? —ELLEN B., CHICAGO

A. No, it isn't. As a matter of fact, Mrs. Crosby is not a Catholic. She's a Protestant and could sue for divorce if she had a mind to. (For the full details see the story on page 25.)

Q. I understand that Groucho Marx married a girl who was thirty years his junior and that the marriage has ended in divorce. I understand he also has to pay alimony of $135,000 for the next ten years. Why did he marry such a young girl to begin with?
ROSALIND P., CHARLOTTE, N. C.

A. Best guess: He married Kay Dittig, 29, because he loved her.

Q. What are Elizabeth Taylor's measurements? —ANN R., BOSTON, MASS

A. Height (with heels): 5'4½"; Weight: 112 lbs.; Bust: 36"; Waist: 23"; Hips: 36"; Thighs: 19"; Ankles: 8½". In Hollywood this is known as a nifty package.

Q. How old exactly is Paulette Goddard? —SAM B., PAWTUCKET, R. I.

A. Only Miss Goddard and her mother know, and they both refuse to tell. In the past, Miss Goddard has given four different birth dates. A safe minimum would be 35.

Q. Is Doris Day's husband younger than she is?
—VIOLET S., BROOKLYN, N. Y.

A. Miss Day has no husband at the moment, although she plans to marry Marty Melcher (see story on page 44). Her divorce from George Weidler became final on June 1, 1950. Mr. Weidler was 21 when he married Miss Day. Doris was 23.

Q. During the war, when I was in the Air Forces, I came across an officer named Freddie Brisson. I understand he was married to Rosalind Russell. Exactly what does he do in Hollywood?
—PAUL D., SAN FRANCISCO, CAL.

A. Mr. Brisson is head of Independent Artists, an independent production company which thus far has produced The Velvet Touch starring Brisson's wife, Rosalind Russell

Q. Is it true that Red Skelton's first wife still manages all his business affairs and receives 50% of his income? What does his present wife say about such a setup?
—MELVIN P., BISMARCK, N. D.

A. Edna Skelton looks after Red's career and receives 50% of his radio income, roughly $4,250 a week for her. The present Mrs. Skelton says nothing about the arrangement.

Q. How many children does John Wayne have?
—BETITIA M., BUFFALO, N. Y.

A. Four by his first wife, none by his second.

Q. What is the real lowdown on Ava Gardner and the Spanish bullfighter, Mario Cabre? Are they really in love with each other?
—C. R., MEMPHIS, TENN.

A. The whole thing is a publicity stunt, at least as far as Ava is concerned. Her heart belongs to Sinatra. (For the inside story in full, see "Tragic Triangle" on page 80.)

Q. I read somewhere that Connie Hilton, Liz Taylor's father-in-law, paid for her wedding reception. I thought the bride's family was supposed to pay?
—CORNELIA W., CEDAR RAPIDS, IOWA

A. The bride's family did pay. "It was our pleasure and privilege," Mrs. Taylor says. (See "Elizabeth's Honeymoon Story" on page 75.)

Q. Is Judy Garland still under contract to MGM or has she been let out?
VAN P., POUGHKEEPSIE, N. Y.

A. If Judy makes any pictures during the next two years, she will make them for MGM.

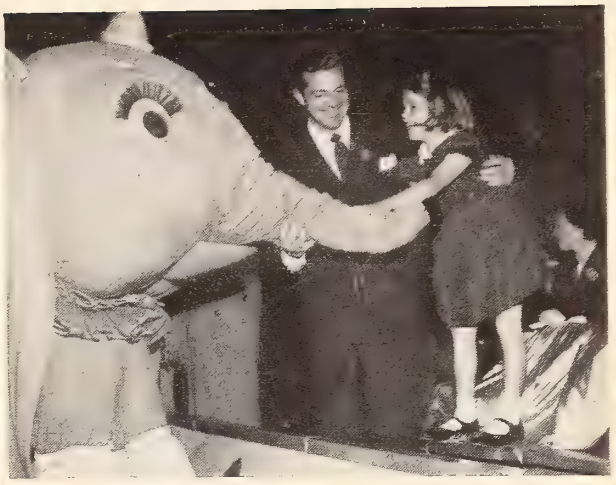
JUNE ALLYSON'S EXPECTING! . . . MEET THE NEW MAN IN JUNE HAVER'S LIFE . . .

JUNE ALLYSON didn't feel too well—but it was within two weeks of starting A Royal Wedding and she had four dance routines with Fred Astaire to rehearse.



So she drove out to MGM, anyway, thinking perhaps the woozie feeling would go away. She got into her rehearsal clothes—a white blouse and tailored black shorts—and went out on the stage.

Fred hadn't arrived, but Bob Alton, the dance director was there and he and Junie started limbering up exercises. After a few minutes she said, "Bob, honey, I think I'm going to have to check out today. I just feel funny."

The next morning, after a trip to her doctor (they had been disappointed so often she had not even told Dick she had gone to see the doctor)—all Hollywood knew the wonderful news—June Allyson and Dick Powell are

Kathy Andrews, aided by her dad Dana, says hello to Dumbo, the elephant. Other Walt Disney characters—Donald Duck, for instance—were plentiful and fanciful as they cut up on ice.

going to have a baby around Christmas time!

I've never known two happier or more surprised people—and I mean SURPRISED! I had called Dick just two days previous to ask if the rumor I had heard was true and he said, "No, Louella—we wish it were."

Ever since June and Dick married six years ago, they have hoped and prayed for a baby.

But, after four-and-a-half years, when it looked like their hopes would never materialize, they adopted an adorable little girl, Pam.

So happy was Junie with her little girl that Dick told her they should adopt another child. It wasn't right for one baby to grow up with so much love and devotion as June lavished on Pam. Might spoil her.

So, once again they got in touch with the Southern orphanage where they had found Pam. They were told to wait until just the right child came along—and they would be informed.

Early in May, the long awaited call from the orphanage came. There was a baby expected that fulfilled every requirement. One of the heads of the orphanage, a southern lady, was on her way out to the Coast to talk to them.

And, she had no more than arrived in Hollywood and had talked with the pleased Powells when the marvelous word came that they could expect a baby of their own!

Happy? Both June and Dick are just walking on clouds. They believe a miracle has happened and all Hollywood is delighted with them. (For a warm-hearted story about the Powells turn to the special feature on page 47—Ed.)

This is not the first case, however, of "adoption" parents who unexpectedly have children of their own. I have known it to happen several times.

Remember, Hedy Lamarr adopted her son, Jamie, and then had two children of her own. And Marian Nixon, former actress and wife of director William Seiter, adopted three children before welcoming a child of her own.

Maybe the Great Arranger of these wonderful things makes miracles happen for women who so deeply want to be mothers.

WHILE that ridiculous impostor who called himself Richard Bullock was telling, in Colorado, that he was waiting for Shirley Temple to arrive for their marriage, she was having dinner quietly in Beverly Hills with Charles Black.

Charles commutes from San Francisco every weekend to see Shirley and you can take it from me (again!) that when her divorce from John Agar is final in December she will

Pepsodent removes FILM–helps stop tooth decay!

Tooth decay is formed by acid that film holds against your teeth—acid formed by the action of mouth bacteria on many foods you eat. When you use Pepsodent Tooth Paste right after eating, it helps keep acid from forming. What's more, Pepsodent removes dulling stains and "bad breath" germs that collect in film.

Shirley is watching her career very carefully these days. She is making no decisions about pictures until she is sure she has found just the right thing. She wants very much to get away from her ingenue roles—but it is still hard to sell producers on the idea that she can play something dramatic—or even a "meanie" such as Ann Blyth takes on now and then. That's what Shirley wants.

EVERY year when the Laddie Sanfords come here for the polo season they throw a big party. Mrs. Sanford is the former Mary Duncan, a very well-known actress in the silent days, and so there are as many Hollywood stars as socialites present when they entertain.

They took over Marion Davies' beautiful, spacious Beverly Hills home for their stay here—but as big as the house is, it was crowded to overflowing.

The first inkling I had that Richard Greene and his wife, Patricia Medina, were not hitting it off again was when I saw Richard at this gay affair all by his lonesome.

Hedy Lamarr, who looks so very thin these days and seems to be wearing less and less make up, came with Larry Sheerin, the youngest and richest of the American polo players who, that week, were meeting the Mexican team. But Hedy's heart is with Herbie Klotz—and Herbie was in New York. Just a week later, Hedy planed out to join him.

Clifton Webb was very gay and amusing rehashing his role of the father of twelve children in Cheaper By the Dozen. He sat with Sylvia and Clark Gable and had them in stitches.

Red Skelton, that bundle of energy, put on an impromptu song and dance act that lasted far into the morning.

Arlene Dahl, who steals the spotlight wherever she goes, was on the arm of Richard Gully, attractive English agent. I hear that Lex "Tarzan" Barker is very much in love with Arlene—but I doubt if this belle has any intention of getting serious about any beau for a long time.

VERY amusing the way the news came out that Esther Williams is expecting her second baby:

If Esther, who was in Honolulu making Pagan Love Song had not talked to Ben Gage in Hollywood via an amateur radio station, the Gages might have kept their secret for months.

But, when Esther couldn't wait to tell Ben the exciting news, of course, other amateur radio operators listened in and no less than a dozen people called me with the "tip" about the stork.

The Gages have one son about one year old. Well, Esther said when she married she wanted no less than six children. She comes from a big, happy family herself and is all for an old-fashioned family. (For Esther's own story, "The Men I Love," turn to page 26—Ed.)

Macdonald Carey really has a sense of humor.

The other day he called his press agent, full of excitement, and said, "I've just read something sensational about myself in an exhibitors' magazine."

"What is it?" asked the interested p.a.

"It says here," quoted Mac, "that I have moved from position 117 in box office appeal to position 71."

I WENT with Sylvia Gable to the MGM lot the very first time she lunched with Clark at the studio—and I've never enjoyed a round of the sets more.

Sylvia picked me up at my house and was all a-flutter and afraid we would be late.

"I've been to the studio only once, at night," she told me, "but I've never had lunch with Clark when he is making a picture. I don't want to be the kind of wife who hangs around when her husband is working."

Clark was waiting for us in the commissary and every eye in the place was on those happy newlyweds. Sylvia looked like a fashion plate in her tailored suit and you could just see how proud Clark is of her.

She constantly amuses him. He laughs affectionately at her British accent and mimics her, but he kept whispering to me, "Isn't she wonderful? She is so gay and happy all the time."

They weren't quite ready for Clark immediately after lunch, so Sylvia and I went visiting on other MGM sets.

"You are really in love with that big lug, aren't you?" I asked the blonde beauty as we walked toward the Loretta Young set where she is making Cause for Alarm for her producer husband, Tom Lewis.

"Yes I am," Sylvia said with real feeling. "I never hoped to know anything like this again. After Doug (Fairbanks) died, I married Lord Stanley principally because I was so lonely. But this is real love—Clark is so sweet, so kind and so thoughtful."

If we had been visiting royalty we couldn't have had a nicer reception than Loretta, Tom and Barry Sullivan, the leading man, gave us.

We felt guilty when they insisted on stopping for tea because this is Tom's first fling as

Which Twin has the Toni?

Priscilla and Patricia Emery of San Francisco. The Toni Twin says: "Before I had a Toni, I couldn't imagine a permanent without frizz. But my Toni wave has been soft as silk and natural-looking from the very first day!" Can you guess which is the Toni Twin? See answer below.

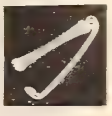
Toni looks as lovely as a $20 permanent —feels as soft as naturally curly hair*

When you choose Toni—for only one dollar you are getting the very finest permanent there is. A wave that's caressably soft like naturally curly hair . . . and guaranteed to look just as lovely—last just as long as a permanent costing $20. (*Including shampoo and set.)

What is Toni's secret? It's the lotion. Toni waving lotion is an exclusive creme formula —especially created to give you a wave that's free of harsh frizziness—a wave that feels and behaves like naturally curly hair. But remember, only Toni Home Permanent has this superb waving lotion.



Wonderful results—again and again! What better proof of Toni quality! Only Toni has given over 93 million lovely, long-lasting permanents. Some women have used Toni 10 times or more and say their waves are always soft, natural-looking, easy to manage. Letters of praise come from women with every type of hair—even gray, bleached and baby-fine hair. So whether it's your first Toni or your tenth, you can be sure of getting a wave with that natural look. Priscilla, the twin on the left, has the Toni.

"When I'm swimming . . . playing tennis . . . or square dancing, I love my Toni more than ever," says teen-ager Renée Honadel of Milwaukee. "That wonderful wave stays and stays—and always looks so natural. After I swim, my Toni wave re-sets in a jiffy!"

a producer, and every moment counted on his schedule.

We also visited Red Skelton on his Watch The Birdie set. Red had been with us at the Sanford's party the night before and Sylvia couldn't get over his pep.

"I got in at 4:00 this morning," he confided, "and I was at the studio at 6:00!"

When we returned to Clark's picture, and Sylvia told him that Red had stayed out until 4:00, King Gable laughed:

"Well, darling, he is younger than I am. I have to get my sleep!"

"Oh, I didn't mean that," gasped Sylvia—who, I am sure, thinks Clark Gable is the youngest looking and best looking man in the world.

Yes, my friends, the Gables are very happy—and I'm betting they stay that way.

JIMMY STEWART didn't mind when his pals, director Henry Koster and producer John Beck, tossed him a birthday party on the set of Harvey with a definite rabbit motif.

The long table was lighted with white candles shaped like rabbits and there was a big meringue rabbit on the birthday cake. But when he was served fried rabbit—Jimmy blew a fuse.

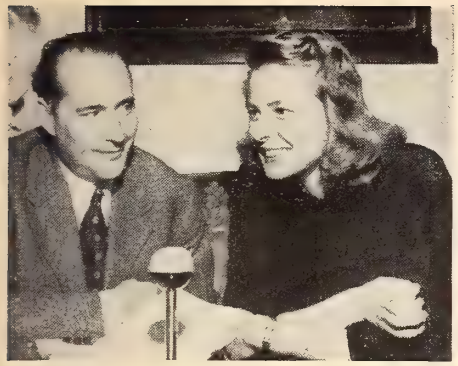
"How could you do this to me?" he yelped, "It's like eating an old friend!"

JUNE HAVER is in love again and all her friends, including myself, are glad. It was not right for a girl as young as June to grieve and not go out for as long as she did following the death of her fiance, Dr. John Duzik.

I can tell you that the man who has come into her life is a nice guy—Cy Bartlett, co-author of Twelve O'Clock High. I've known Cy for years. In fact, he and his former wife, Ellen Drew, lived just down the street from me.

Cy is good looking enough to be a movie hero—but he likes his writer-producer job at 20th Century-Fox much better.

He and June had been seeing each other for about six weeks with no one suspecting they were a new romance. They seldom went to the conspicuous spots, preferring the quiet places.



But, it was Junie, herself, who let the cat out of the bag about how she feels about Cy.

She had been working very hard on some dance routines for her new picture. She was so fatigued that she collapsed on the set one afternoon—and the first person she called for was—you guessed it—the new love in her life!

I wouldn't be a bit surprised if Cy and June marry. She is certainly due for a little happiness in her life after her miserably unhappy marriage to Jimmy Zito and the tragedy of Dr. Duzik's death.

THERE was big excitement when Errol Flynn flew in from Jamaica with his lovely, slim Princess Irene Ghika. Flynn, who affectionately calls his fiancee "the Geek," rushed her straight from the airport to his Mulholland hilltop home where they are well chaperoned by his own mother and Mrs. Eddington (Nora Flynn Haymes' mother).

While everyone was waiting to glimpse the Princess in one of the night spots or smart restaurants—she had three wonderful days of shopping in Hollywood and Beverly Hills completely unrecognized.

Ingrid Bergman and Roberto Rossellini (here at a Rome press conference) are married. Ceremony took place by proxy in Mexico on May 24.

I had met Errol's slim lady love in Paris and so I called her to find out how she liked our town. Once again I was surprised at the way she speaks English.

"Everything is so interesting," she said with just the barest trace of an accent, "but most of all I like Errol's house up on this high hill with the valley at our feet and the hills behind us."

I think best of all she likes Errol and everything that concerns him—but I didn't mention that.

"What was your most vivid first impression of our town?" I asked her.

"The shop windows in Beverly Hills," she replied quickly, "so beautiful! Everything so generously displayed so you can see the many lovely things at once—hats, coats, jewels, perfume, gloves, bags—all in one window. And then you move on to another—so much looking without even going inside."

Then I remembered that the smart shops of Paris, London and Rome do not have our famous taken-for-granted showcases. Fact is, the more exclusive the shop the more likely it is to show nothing on the outside except perhaps a number. Many of the smart couturiers do not even have their names on the outside of their shops—just the address.

I can imagine how wide-eyed a visitor to our country for the first time would be "window-shopping" for the first time.

"Have you any preferences among Errol's friends whom you would like to meet first?" I asked "Miss" Ghika. Flynn says in America she is just plain "Miss."

"His children," she said. "I have not yet met his two little girls—but tomorrow his son, Sean, is coming up to see me. We are having ice cream and all the things little boys like."

I'll bet one thing. Errol's handsome son by Lili Damita will most certainly like Irene. She has the same charm that makes Errol so devastating.

AFTER hearing about it for weeks, I finally succumbed and took myself down to Charleston night at the Mocambo where, every Monday night, the Firehouse Five Plus Two tear the place to pieces. It was a fatal error! Now I'm a Charleston addict—and don't care who knows it.

I learned to do this dance in the '20's—and if I do say so, as shouldn't I, I learned to do it the REAL way and not like some of the kids are stepping it today!

The first night I was again exposed to this dance craze which is sweeping the country—I told myself I would just be an onlooker from a ringside table. That's what I thought!

When the dance contest started I was asked to be a judge and before you could say "Yes, Sir, That's My Baby" (the Firehouse Five always plays this number for the contest) there I was up on the dais with the other judges, Van Johnson, Rosalind Russell, Mercedes McCambridge, Frank Jay, etc.

But that ain't all. I hope I have the grace to register a becoming blush when I report that the next thing I knew I was out on the floor doing a hot and heavy Charleston with Kirk Douglas—and can that boy Charleston!

Believe me, it is impossible to remember your troubles when doing this dance. I recommend it to one and all.

The letter box this month reveals:

Big, big interest in Richard Todd, the "Hasty Heart" Britisher who has made a fine impression.

More and more sympathetic letters regarding Ingrid Bergman.

And John Wayne seems to be getting a new spurt of interest with the younger fans. The women have always gone for John.

Howard Duff is another cropping up into attention again—with many compliments on his fine speaking voice.

Among the girls—well, that Junie Allyson still seems to be the favorite.

That's all for this month. See you next month.

You a teen-ager? Then read this—a new monthly feature especially for you.

THIS month my mail-box was loaded with letters. I thought my fan mail had taken a big up-swing. But the letters contained questions, questions and questions. Then I remembered I'd promised to write a column for teen-agers in MODERN SCREEN.

I'm glad I did, because I discovered that all the problems I thought were mine alone, are yours, too. When I counted up the questions I found that most of them asked: How can I be popular with boys? I realized that I really had myself a job!

Well, I tried talking over the problem with an adult friend of mine. "Popularity?" this friend said. "Shouldn't the kids be more concerned with doing their homework? After all, their main object in life isn't to be popular with a million men, but to find a good husband."

THAT was an adult's opinion, not mine, not the teen-agers'. In the first place, a teen-ager has to learn to be poised; she doesn't get it from books. It's true that the best thing a girl can do eventually is find a good husband. But how will she find him unless she's learned to be attractive? And how can she be sure he's the right man unless she has some basis for comparison?

So for now I'm going to overlook my adult friend's advice and talk about that all important topic: popularity.

You can call me superficial if you like but I think attraction begins with looks. After all, what's the first thing you notice about a girl? Her brain? Her soul? No, you notice the way she looks.

Don't get me wrong. You don't have to be a raving beauty. You don't even have to be pretty. But you must look charming to be attractive—that comes from a sparkle in the eyes, a clean complexion, well-brushed hair, and neat, becoming clothes. When you have all this—that's all you need, really. Because then you'll look lovely, and no one'll ever notice the length of your nose.

I think it's smart to be fashion-wise—if the styles look good on you. Now, short hair's in vogue. I prefer it that way because it's easier to handle. But when all the kids were wearing sloppy Joe sweaters and old shirts with the shirttails hanging out I stuck to suits or skirts and blouses. Simple and well-fitting clothes will get my vote every time.

I HATE crazy shoes. The prettiest shoe, the one that shows off a girl's foot best is the plain pump. I have a friend who has very bad legs, but she insists on wearing shoes with complicated straps. She thinks that this will beautify a bad feature but all it does is call attention to her legs. Simplicity—oh, how I love it. And boys do, too!

What's the next thing that attracts a person? At the risk of sounding corny I'm going to say it right out. It's your soul—that hard-to-define quality which makes you an individual different from everyone else. Don't hide it in an attempt to be just like the gang. Of course, I don't mean you should stand on your head when everybody else is dancing. But have opinions even if they differ with others, and don't be afraid to express them.

PEOPLE are always saying, "Let the boy do the talking. Find out what his interests are and question him about them." That's okay as far as it goes, but if you make up a line just to be attractive, it comes out phony. You have to be really interested. You must stop thinking about yourself and about the impression you're making, and honestly want to hear what the other person has to say. Of course there are some boys who don't like to talk about themselves. In that case, you'll have to keep the conversation gay and light, and keep your problems to yourself—unless he's interested.

It's obvious that since the question of popularity comes up, a feeling of inferiority isn't far behind. Believe me, I know what feeling inferior is like. When I was making Roseanna McCoy I, an inexperienced girl, had to work with wonderful actors like Farley Granger, Charles Bickford, Richard Basehart, Aline MacMahon, Raymond Massey and the rest. Even little Gigi Perreau. She was just seven years old but already a veteran. When I fluffed my lines or wasn't on my marks she'd say, sweetly and sincerely, "It happens to all of us."

Oh, brother, I can talk about an inferiority complex. But you know what I found out? I found out what an inferiority complex really is. It's wondering, "How am I doing? What are people thinking of me? Can I walk into this room without falling on my face? What will people think if I say this or that?" Also it's thinking, "I'm the only shy person here. I'm the only one with a problem."

WHEN I made Our Very Own I was nervous, wondering how I was doing. One day, worried about a scene, I talked to the director, David Miller, who is a wonderful man. His face looked worried as he puzzled over the script and suddenly I knew that he was worried, too. That he had to make good. That he was a young director and felt insecure. And I can't tell you how much this knowledge helped me. There was a sympathy between us and when I went in front of the camera to play my scene I tried hard to do my best not only for myself but to help him.

So maybe that's the way to get rid of inferiority. Remember that the boy you want to impress wants to impress you just as much. Remember that he may be as shy as you are. Don't think only of your own problem, think of his. Try to put him at ease, and ease and poise will come to you.

One girl, this month, asked me why it was that the noisy, brassy girls who have a bad reputation seem to be the ones who attract boys while the simple, nice girls don't. What she said was "seem to attract the boys" and that's the answer. Actually they don't—they just seem to. They get interest because they're loud. They get talked about because they say and do things to make people talk about them. But they don't last. I'd like to give you an example of what I mean. There are several noisy girls in this town but I'd like to tell you about just one. She set out to be "a character." She comes into a room screaming something that she thinks will shock the people and attract attention. It does. She goes around in sloppy clothes and because of this behavior she gets her name in the columns and "seems to be" enormously popular. But the other day a very wise person who has been in this business a long time said, "She'll never be a star. She'll never make it big. She's going to talk herself right out of pictures."

So that's the answer. That girl in your town, in your high school who's loud and boisterous and always has a group of boys around her—well, she won't last. She'll talk herself right out of popularity. She's a novelty, a character. She's interesting for awhile. But the really sweet, nice girl—the solid, dependable girl—she'll last. She'll have dates long after the noisy, brittle one is forgotten—or changed her ways. The old shock technique for getting attention gets it only for a little while.

And now I come to a problem which always worries the teen-ager. It's hard to answer. All I can do is to tell you how I feel about it. The question is, "Do I let the boys kiss me good-night after a date, do I let them park the car for heavy necking?"

Well, you can call me a prude if you like, but of this I don't approve. The boys try and, as they say, "You can't blame me for trying." But I think it often isn't that they want to kiss you. I think they think it's the thing to do. Other boys boast. It's cute to be known as a wolf. Real affection is one thing but when the boy assumes that necking goes with the date I think you make a lasting impression by not stringing along. You may lose a few dates that way but they are dates you wouldn't want anyway.

So maybe my adult friend was right when he said, "The idea is not to be popular with a million men but to find a husband." You can be popular for a little while with "a million men" if you carry on that way. But who wants that kind of popularity? And the idea is—eventually—to find a husband. You'll have a much better chance of doing so if you behave well—if you are unaffected and interested and don't try too hard. Relax. Take it easy and remember that boys are just as interested in you as you are in them. That's all I can tell you about popularity.

Here are some other questions that came in this month.

"Dear Joan: I want desperately to be an actress. How can I become one?"—H.R., Cleveland, Ohio.

Golly, that's a difficult question, but it is so often asked I may even write a whole article about it for MODERN SCREEN. My getting in pictures was the merest accident. Being an actress, though, isn't accidental. You try out for all school plays. You take all the drama courses you can. You go to a good dramatic school, if you can afford it, or work with a fine dramatic coach. Being an actress isn't easy, I know. But if you have the talent, if you never give up trying, you'll get there—and good luck!

"Dear Joan: I'm fifteen years old and my mother won't let me wear lipstick. I look so drab and terrible when all the other girls in my crowd can wear it."—W.D., Portland, Maine.

I wish my mother could talk to your mother because my mother believes that teen-agers should go along with the crowd —provided the crowd isn't doing something really wrong. My mother believes that a girl should dress the way the other girls dress so that she won't feel set apart and considered a freak.

"Dear Joan: I read someplace that you don't like teen-agers. Is this true?"—S.W., La Jolla, Calif.

I don't like silly teen-agers—the bobby soxers who swoon over the latest crooner and who smoke cigarettes because they think it's smart, the ones who go to beer joints and boast about getting tight. I think this gives other teen-agers a bad name. I think we should act our age and that we're really older, mentally, than most people give us credit for being. The reason I don't like silly teen-agers is because their kind of behavior is bad for all of us. Remember, we're a minority. We're just learning to live in the world. A lot of people brush us off. They wouldn't if we behaved in a sensible, adult way.

"Dear Joan: I'm a boy of seventeen. I like to dance and have fun and go to the movies but whenever I take a girl out she starts getting serious and wants to go steady. I don't want to go steady. What do you think about going steady?"—J.R.M., Dallas, Texas.

I don't approve of going steady at all—at least not for kids in our age group. How can you know what boy or girl you want to go steady with unless you know a lot of people and have a lot of dates. I think very tactfully you can explain this to the girl and say it isn't because you don't like her that you don't want to go steady—it's because you do like her and that it isn't fair to either one of you to make such a promise.

I hope I've made sense in my first effort at this kind of thing. I know I had fun and, anyhow, thanks for listening.

If you have a problem or a pertinent subject that you want Joan Evans to discuss, write to her. Box 93, Beverly Hills, California.

SUNSET BOULEVARD

■ Sunset Boulevard is a spell-binder, a masterpiece, a gem. It tells of a broke young screen writer (Bill Holden) and his affair with a 50-year-old silent screen star (Gloria Swanson), who lives in a sprawling old mansion, surrounded by souvenirs of her past glory. Pictures of herself, old movies of herself, paintings of herself. She's planning a comeback, hires the young writer to help her fashion a script, moves him into her house, buys him clothes, jewelry, becomes insanely jealous of him. The young writer's weak, but essentially decent; sickened by his new life, he tries to break away, only to have the actress slash her wrists, which brings him back. In the end, she kills him, but in the end, she's insane. That is a rough outline. The details make the picture. The fresh, true ring to the dialogue, the shots of the Paramount lot at night, the young struggling studio workers who act like real people, the atmosphere of decay that hangs over the actress' great house, the anguish of a woman who once was young and beautiful, and who can't face the knowledge that life has passed her by. Nancy Olson's fine as the young girl Holden really loves; Holden's got the part of a lifetime, and makes the most of it. Same for Miss Swanson. Every bit of Sunset Boulevard has artistic integrity.

Gloria Swanson, silent film great living in a fantastic dream world, takes possession of writer Bill Holden. She hired him to help stage her comeback.

Holden falls in love with Nancy Olson, but he can't break away from his new, decadent life.

When he tries to walk out on Swanson, she cracks up, shoots him as he leaves her house.

Completely insane, she mistakes newsreel cameramen for studio crew, poses regally for them.

Cast: Ginger Rogers, Ronald Reagan, Doris Day, Steve Cochran. Warners.

What starts out promisingly, winds up hysterical, and I'm not sure if Storm Warning is quite good or pretty bad. Ginger Rogers, stopping off in a small southern town to visit sister Doris Day, witnesses the murder of a Northern newspaperman by Ku Klux Klan members. She's willing to help honest county prosecutor nail the offenders till she discovers sister's sub-human hubby (Steve Cochran) was among the guilty. Sis is going to have a baby, so Ginger lets Ronnie down, claims from the witness stand that she saw nothing. Case dismissed. Klan wins again. It's believable and exciting up to this point. But when Cochran makes a drunken pass at Ginger, and Doris declares she's all washed up with him, Ginger feels called upon to make a speech. Now, she declares, I'm going to tell Reagan all about you, you oaf. Even for the movies this is pretty dopey. If she'd just waited for him to trot off, and then gone and told Reagan, everything would have worked out peaceably. As it is, Cochran kidnaps her, takes her to a Klan meeting, has her flogged. Even then, that foolish Ginger doesn't stop talking. If I ever get out of here, she hollers, I'm going to expose you all. If she'd buttoned her lip, she'd have been out of there hours ago. Still, it makes for plenty of melodrama.

IN A LONELY PLACE

Cast: Humphrey Bogart, Gloria Grahame, Frank Lovejoy, Carl Benton Reid. Columbia.

An adult sort of love story, and an engrossing murder mystery are combined here. There's quality about In A Lonely Place; every detail seems right. Humphrey Bogart plays a broke screen writer who gets mixed up with a murder and—at about the same time—with a girl named Laurel (Gloria Grahame). Under Laurel's influence, he starts to write again, creates a masterpiece. But he's a moody man, a sick man, really. Has rages, beats people up. Laurel begins to be afraid. She loves him, but she doesn't want to marry him. She's even beginning to wonder if he isn't guilty of the murder the police are trying to pin on him, and her terror and his violence build. Perfect casting and acting down to the last bit player (Gloria Grahame is especially superb), suspense, and a romance which is frank and exciting, add up to a heck of a good picture.

BROKEN ARROW

An exceptionally exciting picture about the war between whites and Apaches which raged through Arizona in the late 1800's—and about the peace which came out of the war. Jimmy Stewart and Jeff Chandler play the two men chiefly responsible for that peace; Stewart's cast as a frontiersman, sick of bloodletting; Chandler, as an Indian chief, hard, but honorable. You watch Stewart grow in stature and understanding from the moment he first discovers that Indian mothers cry over their children like any other mothers. When he begins to care for a young Indian girl, you're moved by their love story's tenderness, and tragedy. If you're not afraid of morals, Fox has an old one and a good one for you: People of different races, habits, beliefs, can co-exist in the same world so long as they respect one another's rights. If you are afraid of morals, the movie's still 100% entertainment. Just close your eyes and pretend you didn't learn anything.

DEPORTED

Cast: Marta Toren, Jeff Chandler, Claude Dauphin, Marina Berti. Universal-International.

Jeff Chandler, a racketeer who's spent five years in jail for stealing $100,000, is deported to his native Italy. His family there think he's an American hero on a government mission, and welcome him royally. They say things like, "Your brother used to have such a beautiful voice," and Chandler says things like, "Yeah, but he sang once too often," and still they're convinced he's pure in heart. The love of a beautiful woman (Marta Toren) reforms Jeff, and he spends the stolen $100,000 to buy food and medical supplies for the starving, ailing peasants. Combination Lucky Luciano and Robin Hood. Chandler's adequate, while actor Claude Dauphin is rather peculiarly cast. He's charming as all get-out, but his accent is as French as crêpes suzettes, and they've got him playing an Italian detective.

THREE SECRETS

Cast: Eleanor Parker, Patricia Neal, Ruth Roman, Frank Lovejoy, Leif Erickson, Ted De Corsia. Warners.

Aerial photographs of a plane crash in the Sierras show that five-year-old Johnnie Something-or-other is still alive, though his foster parents have been killed. While rescue parties start out to fetch the boy, reporters try to discover the identity of his real parents. Adoption homes won't give out that information, but the search narrows down to three ladies. Is Johnnie's mother Eleanor Parker, sweet girl who's happily-married-but-can't-forget-she-once-had-an-illegitimate child? Or Patricia Neal, brisk newspaperwoman whose husband divorced her because she was always hotfooting it around the world instead of staying home and cooking? Or Ruth Roman, who shot her racketeer-boyfriend? All of these ladies had babies five years back, and gave them over for adoption, and now all of them would like a crack at little Johnnie. Picture has a noble ending, tricky but tearful.

NIGHT AND THE CITY

Richard Widmark doesn't want much out of life. Just to be the biggest thief in town. His girl, Gene Tierney, begs him to find an honest job, be the same sweet boy she remembers, but Richard simply neighs his half-cracked neigh, and goes on trying to make a man of distinction of himself. He muscles into London's wrestling racket (picture was shot in England) by the clever device of taking on the chief wrestling promoter's father (Stanislau Zbyszko) as his partner. Now wrestling promoter can't hurt Richard without damaging his own old man. Old man is honorable, wants to clean up wrestling; Richard makes him false promises, etc. Lots of people get killed. Francis Sullivan and Googie Withers are involved in the action as a husband and wife who run a night club, Gene Tierney's part isn't much more than a walk on, and the only really exciting action takes place in the wrestling scenes, due to the compelling presence of Zbyszko, an old-time wrestler who's an honest actor, and a moving one. He seemed to me the one truthful character in the whole rather phony melodrama.

Cast: Jane Wyman, Kirk Douglas, Gertrude Lawrence, Arthur Kennedy. Warners.

The Glass Menagerie, a prize-winning Broadway play, has been lovingly transferred to the screen, and though it's lost a little of its pity and fragility en route, it's still worth watching. It concerns the Wingfields, a family of dreamers. Amanda, the mother (Gertrude Lawrence), deserted by her husband, shabby, poor, lives in the memories of her girlhood as a pretty southern belle and has impossible hopes for her children's futures. Tom, the son (Arthur Kennedy) works in a warehouse, and dreams of going to sea, of searching and discovering, of escape. He goes to the movies so he won't have to listen to his mother's endless nagging and reminiscing. Laura, the daughter (Jane Wyman) is crippled. Unable to face the real world, she's created a world of her own, a world of little glass animals and ancient phonograph records. When a realist, referred to as "the gentleman caller" (Kirk Douglas) comes into the Wingfields' lives, a chain reaction starts. But go see it, or feel it. Glass Menagerie is more mood than plot.

Cast: Barbara Stanwyck, Wendell Corey, Walter Huston, Judith Anderson, Gilbert Roland. Paramount.

This is a nice, big, sprawling stinker. Even the good actors look bad. They posture, they declaim, they're expansively, expensively theatrical. Walter Huston (unhappily, this was his last picture) is a "frontier empire builder, despotic, arrogant, extravagant." He's bored by his mealy-mouthed son, crazy for his high-spirited daughter, B. Stanwyck. This girl is so high-spirited she flings a scissors at a ladyfriend (Judith Anderson) her papa brings home, and quite destroys that lady's face. Papa retaliates by hanging Gilbert Roland, an old pal of Barb's, and the blood feud is on. "Till our eyes next meet," Barb tells Roland, as he's about to be strung up. (That's part of an embarrassing little ritual the two of them go through every time they see one another. They bite hunks out of a piece of bread, murmur self-consciously "till our eyes next meet," then separate.) However the real man in Barb's life is Wendell Corey, a cool, dashing gambler. The Furies is full of sound and fury, signifying nothing. Absolutely.

THE SLEEPING CITY

Cast: Richard Conte, Coleen Gray, Richard Taber, John Alexander. Universal-International.

Here's a nice kind of horrible picture which was actually photographed in New York's Bellevue Hospital. Movie calls it "City Hospital." Lot of trouble there. Patients get well, but internes are killed off regularly. Detective Richard Conte is installed as an interne (he had medical training in college) to find out wha hoppen. He meets a lovely nurse (Coleen Gray) and Pop Ware (Richard Taber), an old creep of an elevator operator. These two are running a dope ring. Old creep lends impoverished young internes money to bet on horses, then when they're in debt for more than they can raise, he starts crawling around making helpful suggestions. "Get me duh white stuff," he whines. "Yeah, white stuff, dat's woit money." (Everybody talks tough in this picture. "White stuff" is narcotics, "pushed him across" means killed him, etc.) Let an interne lose his nerve, decide to get out of narcotics, go in for a respectable business like bank-robbing or marrying a millionaire's daughter, and Pop fills him full of lead. It's grisly, but it's grand.

FATHER OF THE BRIDE

Cast: Spencer Tracy, Joan Bennett, Elizabeth Taylor, Billie Burke. MGM.

Based on a best-seller which dealt with the less romantic aspects of a wedding—namely, the costs—Father of the Bride is moderately funny as it follows father Spencer Tracy's tribulations. We're taken from the first shock, when father hears his child is planning to wed (he still thinks she's four years old) right through the plans for a simple wedding which swell until caterers are constructing canopies on the lawn, the furniture is moved clean out of the house to make room for the hundreds of reception guests, and father has come grimly face to face with visions of the poorhouse. It's Tracy's picture, and he makes the most of it. Elizabeth Taylor's a beautiful bride of course, but you don't need me to tell you that.

MYSTERY STREET

Cast: Ricardo Montalban, Sally Forrest, Bruce Bennett, Elsa Lanchester, Marshall Thompson. MGM.

You shouldn't be misguided by circumstantial evidence is the moral today. Or many a suicide looks like a murder, and vice versa. Here young Marshall Thompson nearly fries for the slaying of Jan Sterling, and who done it, friends? Well, you just go find out. Detective Ricardo Montalban is the boy who's struggling with the case. He gets assists from the medical department of Harvard (including Bruce Bennett whom MGM planted there for the occasion) and the picture has some nice acting bits by Elsa Lanchester and Mrs. Gene (Betsy Blair) Kelly.

Sirs: A community has character, reputation and feeling as an individual. The people of South Philadelphia deeply resented the contents of your interview with Mario Lanza ("Wonderful Madman," MODERN SCREEN, June 1950). After your magazine went on sale here, angry groups met on his old block, stood threateningly outside his uncle's grocery. Our section of Philadelphia has been greatly maligned as a breeding ground for criminals, a home of illiterates. Most of our citizens are high school graduates, many are college graduates. A meeting of the city council was held to discuss the effects of this interview, and I have been commissioned by local civic leaders to write to you, hoping you will remedy the harm done.

Walter Palumbo
President, South Philadelphia Chamber of Commerce

Sirs: Until now I was totally unaware that I lived in the "slums" and that Mario Lanza had such a low opinion of his neighborhood. A miracle has not occurred since the 13th century and I do not consider Mr. Lanza's rise from the so-called gutter anything inspiring.

Mary P. McCarthy
Philadelphia, Pa.

. . . Lanza says: "I have an Irish wife and an Irish daughter. Every Italian should have an Irish wife and there would be less trouble in the world." Does Lanza believe that Italian women, including his own mother, are a race of shrews capable only of causing unhappiness?

MODERN SCREEN received similar letters from thousands of fans in Philadelphia and throughout the country. Mr. Lanza says there has been a great misunderstanding. modern screen readers spotlight

Every movie-goer is a talent scout and our readers have an uncanny knack for picking tomorrow's stars.

Can you tell me something about the girl who played in Not Wanted? She's very cute, a good actress and I think she looks so much like Ida Lupino. I'm sure she's on her way to stardom. Jean Hoffer, Madison, Wisc.

Sally Forrest used to be a professional dancer and you probably saw her in many MGM musicals. She was fired, however, in an economy move and Miss Lupino hired her for her low-cost production of Not Wanted, which turned out to be a big hit. Sally was born in San Diego on May 28, 1929 and has brown hair and green eyes. Her next is Mystery Street with Ricardo Montalban.

Whatever became of Kathleen Ryan? She was so good in Odd Man Out, but then I didn't see her again until Give Us This Day. She's not very flashy looking, but I think she's a fine dramatic actress. Mary Brennan, Schenectady, N. Y.

Kathleen Ryan has the lead role in United Artists forthcoming The Sound of Fury. She was born on October 6, 1922 in Dublin, Ireland, attended the University of Dublin and then the famous Abbey Theater. British Director Carol Reed discovered her there and that was the beginning of her career. She's red-haired, hazel-eyed, married to Dr. Derry Devane and has a young daughter Barbara.

Could you give me some vital statistics on Keefe Brasselle? My family and I agree that his fresh good looks and acting ability will definitely land him on top. I hope Hollywood producers will be able to use him to advantage. Gerry Vorner, Brigham, Utah.

Keefe Brasselle is another of Ida Lupino's discoveries. He's been in Hollywood for some time, hoping to get a break in movies, and living on tea and cereal when she offered him a starring role in Not Wanted. The rest is history. Keefe was born in Elyria, Ohio, is five feet eleven inches tall and weighs 145 pounds. You'll see him soon in A Place In the Sun with Monty Clift.

Stuck!

The No. 1 catch of the town, hers for a whole evening on their first big date. She dreams this is to be the beginning of a real romance. But how wrong can a girl be? Once he gets her back on her own doorstep, he'll never darken it again . . . and she won't know why.*

How's your breath today?

Never take it for granted. Never risk offending others, needlessly. Halitosis (unpleasant breath)* is the fault unpardonable. It may be absent one day and present the next . . . without your realizing it.

So play smart. Rinse your mouth with Listerine Antiseptic night and morning, and especially before any date when you want to be at your best.

To be extra-attractive be extra-careful. Listerine Antiseptic is the extra-careful precaution. It freshens your breath . . . not for seconds, not for minutes . . . but usually for hours.

*Though sometimes systemic, most cases of halitosis are due to the bacterial fermentation of tiny food particles in the mouth. Listerine Antiseptic quickly halts such oral fermentation, then overcomes the odors it causes.

the truth about the bing crosbys

They lived in obscurity, immune to the sea of gossip around them, until the shadow of divorce broke through the wall.

BY LINCOLN EDWARDS

■ The phones rang all day. Finally, at seven o'clock, the telephone operator at the Hotel Ritz in Paris broke down. "Bien," she said, "I will try and find him."

In a matter of minutes, Bing was speaking. "What's that you say?"

"They're saying back in the States," the reporter repeated, "that you and Dixie are getting divorced. How about it?"

Crosby snickered. "Look, chum," he said, casually, "they're always saying something—either I'm dead or divorced or throwing shoes. I've heard this story at least 35 times in the past ten years."

"But your lawyer said you and Dixie were separated."

Benjie's the one I talk about, and Ben's the one who listens. But someday Benjie will be old enough to hear about his dad . . .

It hardly seems possible that 12 months have passed since Benjie arrived to brighten our lives. And yet Ben and I can scarcely remember what it was like without him. That little character has become the most important thing in the world to both of us.

"Character" is right. What a guy! When the three of us arrived in Honolulu aboard the Lurline, I was being interviewed on the radio with Benjie in my arms. Suddenly he reached over, grabbed the microphone and let loose a stream of baby talk. I can't understand where he gets that ham, unless maybe from his father and mother.

He really had a time in Hawaii. After we got settled in our house at the base of Diamond Head, we had a press conference. Benjie was there and he stole the show. He posed for pictures for over an hour, and next day he was smiling on the front pages of the newspapers.

Our biggest thrill was when we flew to the island of Kauai to start The Pagan Love Song. When we arrived, we were greeted by a native musical group, a bevy of hula dancers and the mayor of the principal city. Ben and I received the traditional flower leis and kisses. But the highlight came when Benjie was presented with leis and kisses by little hula girls who were from six to 12 years old. He was very appreciative and loved every minute of it.

It was in Honolulu at the age of seven months that Benjie took his first ocean dip. The water is as warm as the air, so I was able to take him right into the surf. I was afraid he would be bothered by the waves, but I'm proud to say he wasn't frightened in the least. He loved the whole idea and complained bitterly when I had to take him out.

By now you may have the impression that I'm pretty proud of (Continued on page 60)

Benjie sailed with the Gages to Hawaii where Esther made a movie.

There was time for romantic tête-à-têtes—after Benjie turned in.

THE HIGH COST OF LOVING

by hedda hopper

In Hollywood it doesn't pay to have a hasty heart, because parting is such expensive sorrow.
And everytime
you say goodbye, you say it from the bottom of your wallet.

FORTUNES ARE FADING FAST FOR THESE HASTY LOVERS— CAUGHT IN THE TANGLED WEB OF ALIMONY.

Dick and Nora Haymes

SWEET as they sound, those three little words, "I love you," can be mighty expensive in Hollywood. Believe me, the tender passion can make things plenty tough when it isn't the McCoy. And, as for the philanderers I see around me tangled in the sad straits of alimony, I think a good tune to hum might be that old ditty, "Don't sweetheart me—if you don't mean it!"

Hollywood love is the best bargain in this weary world when it's genuine. But when it's a tawdry imitation—the deal's a gyp. That's what some of the hasty star buyers at the heart counter are finding out, day by day, and they're taking the rap where it's most painful—in their puffed up, but not so bottomless pocketbooks.

Some of it's a racket, and some of it's right. Some get exactly what their foolish hearts deserve and others are wrapped up and taken like Richmond was by General Grant. But any way you look at it the cost of reckless loving if you're a movie star, male or female, is coming very high. What should be the most beautiful experience in a man or woman's life is only too often, these days, turning into a bankrupting booby-trap.

Just take a look around. In the direction, for instance, of one of the gayest blades of Hollywood, Errol Flynn himself. Errol played the role of Don Juan once on the screen, and he never quite got over it. So, just recently, impulsive Errol was crying "Help!" in court through his lawyers, and begging the judge to cut down the overdue bill for his oh careless love! The cares turned up, all right, and they're pretty expensive ones, too.

Errol confessed he collected $200,000 every year, which would help the average family man meet his rent and milk bill and have enough left over for a movie on Saturday night. But Errol's not the average man, and he has two separate families in his past with more than milk bills to prove it. To one ex-wife, Lili Damita, he pays $18,000 a year alimony until she dies or remarries, also $5,200 a year to support their boy, Sean, also $11,000 more on those sums for income taxes. Add $550 a month to Nora Eddington Flynn Haymes, the second Mrs. F., for support of Deirdre and Rory, which totes up roughly $3,500 a month to pay for his past before he can plan his future. Yet at the same time Errol asked to have all this cut down to size, he was vacationing with the girl he wants to marry next, Romanian Princess Irene Ghica. And if right now his lusty baritone is crooning her a mournful chorus of "I can't get started with you," it's because, frankly, he can't afford to. And isn't that a pretty pass for a Don Juan?

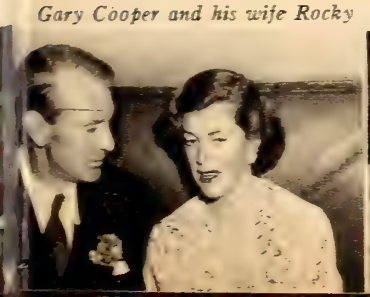
How did the O'Flynn ever get himself in such a fix anyway? Well, even as Errol cries "Uncle" and begs for relief, complaining that his first wife, Lili Damita, "has travelled extensively throughout the United States and abroad and has lived in an extravagant manner . . ." you might say, "Look who's talking." Because elegant Errol has just returned from an extensive cruise of his own around the Mediterranean on his private yacht, gadding about the capitals of Europe and hobnobbing with royalty, which doesn't come cheap.

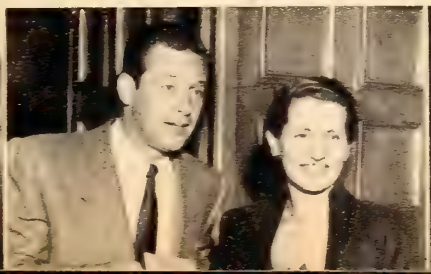
So part of the Flynn's dollar gap troubles you can chalk right up to what us old fogies used to call "Going Hollywood," which is spending more than you make, as Errol has always done, with his grand tours, his boats, fancy cars, wardrobes designed for a Duke of Windsor, a magnificent Hollywood home which he seldom uses—and so on.

Errol's first, Lili Damita, was once the toast of Paris, and she soon took to toasting Errol by conking him on the head with champagne bottles, in their frequent domestic free-for-alls. But the throbbing lumps on his noggin he got from that didn't compare to the severe headaches he began feeling when he took off down that lonesome alimony road. Even that didn't cure Errol. Right away he plunged again into a second hasty marriage with the pretty ex-hat check girl, Nora Eddington.



By now, of course, Nora is Mrs. Dick Haymes, and the second time Errol got off much easier, with no alimony, only support for his kids, through a slight misconception on Nora's part that the new spouse she was getting was a solidly set and prosperous star with unlimited checks rolling in from radio, movies and records. I'm afraid Nora found out that Dick's radio checks shrivelled and his movie and record ones, too, as the Haymes vogue waned and contracts were cancelled—and so what do we see?

Well, last December the first Mrs. Haymes tripped into a Los Angeles court with claims adding up to $31,963 and slapped attachments on what was left of those record and radio rewards owed to her home-hopping hubby. Turned out that to switch his wayward heart from Joanne to Nora, Dick had signed on the dotted line to pay Joanne from $9,600 to $14,000 a year, depending on his earnings. Besides which he was to foot the family medical and dental bills, establish insurance policies guaranteeing the education of their three offspring, Richard, Helen and Barbara—besides divvying up the community property. On top of all that there was a sad story of two or three years back tax bills which the Treasury Department was getting a little nasty about. If you ask me, the whole weird family scramble adds up to quite some price tag on easy-come, easy-go marriage, and one which in Dick Haymes' case, certainly, he hasn't a prayer of paying. And whatever made him think he had?



The most fantastic thing, to my Yankee mind, about the money messes the stars stick their feet in is how they can figure they've got the price. Look quickly, at Frank Sinatra, although it's not as easy now as it used to be to find Frankie's familiar face in every direction, and when you do, it wears a strained and worried look. With good reason.

Just a few weeks ago, Frankie showed up in Spain, following his lady love, Ava Gardner, snapping and belligerent to newsmen, but carrying a $10,000 emerald pretty for Ava. The question in my mind wasn't would he get the girl but how Frank Sinatra could afford a bauble like that, or even the trip to Spain! Because Frankie, sad to state, has mighty few dollars he can call his own; in fact, he's up to his bow tie in debts which may take him until he's old and gray to (Continued on page 92)

■ When John Wayne, otherwise known as Duke, came to Hollywood, there were few who would call him polished, and fewer still who would call him an actor. He sat a horse well, he looked good in leather pants, but he delivered lines like a Western Union messenger.

People thought of him as a slam-bang roughneck who liked to fight, use colorful language and sit up all night playing poker. He did—all three. But at heart, he was a gentleman, and this is what people never knew.

Duke took a lot of ragging in those early days. Once, when he'd begun to get leading man roles, he was assigned to play a suave, young society lawyer. This wasn't exactly up his alley, but it was headed straight for his wallet, so he made the best of it.

The first day, he forced himself into a tuxedo and patent leather pumps and tried looking nonchalant. Every time he stepped out of camera range he'd tug at his collar and make faces.

The director who went with the movie wasn't very democratic. He'd obviously been born with a black tie in his mouth and scorned those who weren't as fortunate. "Too (Continued on page 71)

House of memories

The Crosbys lived here with much laughter, and many dreams, and a gracious ease. These are the first pictures ever taken inside their house. They may also be the last.

by Marva Peterson

■ They've been living in their Holmby Hills house for ten years—that's a lot of memories. They moved in when Gary was only seven, the twins were four, and Lindsay was two. (The pictures at the left show how the boys and their folks look today.) The kids grew up there; they played baseball in the living room, left for school and vacations, but always came back. There were good times, funny times, sad times, and the house grew mellow with them.

Now some say that the Crosbys are separating (for the facts about this read the story on page 25). Only the Crosbys know what their immediate future holds. The house may remain as it was with the same people in it; the house may be changed, but already it has a history, a history of family life.

Bing Crosby always took kidding about a lot of things—his hair, or lack of it; his clothes; his singing—"Do some work this week, Pop, or Gary won't give you an allowance," his oldest son might tell him.

But there's one subject that Bing doesn't like to have ribbed—that's his home. Even his script writers know that the house is forbidden gag territory. So much of the Crosby life has been made public property that the house represents their last bit of privacy. The Crosbys don't give many parties and very few people have actually been inside the place.

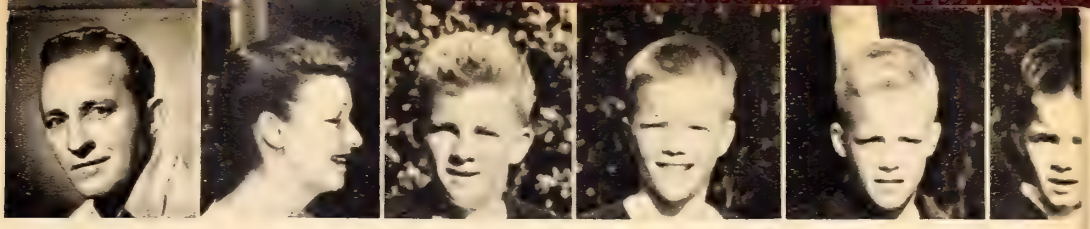
The pictures on these pages may surprise some readers. Unlike Bing's flamboyant wardrobe, his home is simple, unaffected and comfortable. From the very beginning it was equipped for a family of four fun-loving boys and their comfort-loving father.

With the professional help of George Hall, one of Hollywood's finest decorators, Dixie worked long to make the house livable and lovable. It's a never-ending job.



A year ago, for example, the boys decided that they must have a television set. Little Bing hates floor lamps so the cabinet behind the Queen Anne table conceals a lamp, as does the antique lavabo over the piano. The family uses the table for cards and homework.

Lindsay, the youngest, claimed, "We need it for professional purposes."

"Have you gotten your father's okay?" Dixie asked.

Lindsay smiled. "Not yet, but we're working on it."

A few weeks later Lindsay was asking again. "Pop says we need one, too." That was enough for Dixie. She went to work. She had a television set installed in a cabinet that she knew would match the other antique pieces in the living room. As a result, the Crosby TV set is cleverly concealed in a functional and extremely handsome Welsh dresser. The dresser contains all the media for an evening's entertainment. In addition to a TV set, it boasts a radio, phonograph, and motion picture screen.

(If you own a large cabinet or breakfront in your own home, you might very well adapt the idea. Rather than get a new piece of furniture for your TV set, perhaps you can build the set or have it built into something you've already got. Such a device will not only save you space but also money, since TV sets without cabinet and table are fairly reasonable.)

Dixie runs her home to please her men. When Bing says he'd like a lot of horse prints around the house—horse prints are what he gets. Dixie takes him at his word, and that's why practically every picture in the house features an equestrian study of sorts. The boys are getting older and if they ever decide to throw parties in the living room, Dixie's ready. The wall to wall carpeting there is actually three rugs that can be rolled back promptly for dancing.

CIRCUS DAZE!

The lions roared, the acrobats soared, the clowns had us in stitches. But then we had to run—for our lives!

BY BEVERLY OTT

THE IDEA belonged to Yvonne DeCarlo. "Let's go to the Clyde Beatty Circus," was the idea.

"Clyde Beatty?" said Corinne. "What is ziss?"

"Only the greatest lion-tamer in the world, that's all," said Yvonne.

Corinne was impressed. "Allons!" she said. (I didn't study French for nothing. That means "Let's go!") So we all went—Yvonne De Carlo, Corinne Calvet, John Bromfield, Rock Hudson and I.

It was the circus' last day, but Yvonne was no slouch, she dashed all over town and finally got the tickets at a couple of drugstores. All we others had to do was be at the main entrance by seven.

I was there, clutching my pink candy. The Bromfields were there; the whole city of Los Angeles seemed to be there, but not Yvonne, or Rock, or the tickets.

"What'll we do?" asked John.

"Search me," I said.

"Why?" said Corinne. "You have lost zee teekets?"

"Ha," said I, and casually detached my pink candy from someone's elbow.

"Let's not stand here," said John. "Let's look for them." So we stalked off into the crowd. I went one way, the Bromfields went another and we almost didn't meet again. Half an hour later, I was back at the entrance. Rock was out searching for me, and John was off looking for Rock.

After a while they both wandered back. Then we counted each other and proceeded to the sideshow. The sideshow took place in one big tent, and it was about as crowded in there as the subway is at rush hour.

"Why don't one of you big, strong, handsome men put me on his shoulder?" I said coyly.

The big, strong, handsome men looked at me stony-eyed.

"Anyway," I said, spitefully, "we have only ten minutes to see this before the big show begins."

A kind man stepped up out of the crowd. "Why don't you come back after the main event?" he suggested. He turned out to be the manager, and gave us a card to admit us later. "Be sure and come right back, though," he warned. "We're moving on tonight."

There was still a little time left before the big show, so we wandered into the animal tent. "Smells good," I said, wrapping a handkerchief round my face.

"Oh, look at those beautiful lions," said Yvonne.

"Be brave," said John, as he pushed me toward one.

"Stop it!" I screamed.

The lion yawned. "Gosh," said Yvonne. "I'll bet you could put your head in his mouth."

"I'll bet," I said. "Isn't it a shame he's behind bars?"

The Bromfields, Rock and Yvonne admire an elephant who's dressed for the parade. Elephant was insulted when Yvonne gave him one peanut.

The girls are apprehensive, John and Rock seem fascinated by sword-swallower Alex Linton. Alex comes from a long line of swallowers.

Snake-charmer Barbara White charms her audience, too. Rock asked Yvonne if she wanted to borrow a snake for a movie. Yvonne declined.

I was afraid to be happy

. . . until I found courage in prayer, and faith in myself.

by Joan Crawford

■ Meeting me after a long separation, people I've known in the past sometimes say, "What's happened to you? You look radiant."

"I'm happy," I say.

Perhaps they wonder what has made me so happy—a new love interest, a great new picture, my joy in my children . . . They're on the beam if they think that the children have given me great happiness. But beyond them, the happiness and serenity I have found are due to a philosophy I discovered in the last few years, which has revolutionized my way of thinking about many things.

Up until a few years ago I was one of the most fear-ridden people in the world. I had been brought up with every fear known to man—fear of people, fear of mistakes, fear of failure, fear of heights, fear of the things people might say or think about me. I was as self-conscious as any ten people can be. I was scared and introverted.

So many children grow up as I did. Constantly they hear their parents' admonitions, "Ah, ah, ah, don't touch. You'll burn yourself." "Don't go near the pool. You'll drown." "Don't climb up there. You'll fall."

We grow up fear-ridden. Whenever someone suddenly shouts at a child, "Don't do that!" panic hits the pit of the child's stomach. (Continued on page 100)

JANE POWELL DRESSES FOR GLAMOR

I REMEMBER the first time I met Jane Powell. She was 14, and new to Hollywood. Mr. Kress, head of MGM's wardrobe department, brought her to me and said, "Helen, she's yours." That was six years ago, and I've been designing Janie's clothes ever since.

Styles change, and so did Janie. At first she wanted to wear peasant skirts and blouses all the time, because she loved them. Later she learned better. She learned that clothes should create the effects you want—of youthfulness, of sophistication, of glamor; she learned that the smart dresser is the girl who is fashion-wise without sacrificing her individuality.

Janie might have loved those peasant outfits but she kept them for brunches at home, for picnics, for afternoons at the movies. As she grew older she began to dress with an eye toward glamor. That doesn't mean she decked herself out in rhinestones and ruffles. Not Janie. She always had good sense about clothes and knew that the cut and fabric could suggest so much more than flashy doodads.

I think one of the reasons Janie learned so fast about clothes was her limited budget. Of course, her MGM contract paid her a good salary, but her parents wisely saw to it that she didn't have more clothes than any girl of average means could afford. Janie had to find clothes that served more than one purpose and were of such good material that they'd last.

ing blouse with a boat neckline and tiny cap sleeves turned the outfit into a dress. The blouse was waistline length and had a wide velvet sash attached to it which easily covered the waistband of the skirt.

For a second outfit with the same skirt, she had a pink cotton lace blouse cut with a sweetheart neckline and tiny sleeves. This blouse fitted across the hips. To make the pink blouse really "belong" she wore two pink roses tucked into the folds of her skirt. Sounds simple, doesn't it? Well, it is. And it's an intelligent way to stretch a wardrobe.

With great glee, Janie told me of another find. "Now I have four outfits," she said, "for the price of one!" She did, too. These turned out to be a green velveteen suit with a cotton lace blouse, and an extra red jacket —all bought on sale. (Janie can't resist a sale.) The suit as it is makes one outfit. With the cotton lace blouse and skirt she can wear it out in the evening. A weskit from another suit with the skirt and a tailored blouse makes still another ensemble. And the red jacket with the green skirt makes a tailored fourth.

I always know what to expect from Janie when she comes in for a wardrobe fitting. The door bursts open and before I look up she says, "Hi, kiddo. Got the coffee on?"

She's been calling me "kiddo" for six years and I can't break her of the habit, but that's my only complaint. She usually carries a paper bag under her arm. This last time it was full of banana puffs. (She'd made them the (Continued on page 78)

Our son

He'd hardly been near a kitchen before, but John took over the cooking chores when Patti was confined to bed awaiting her baby.

While little Russell was on the way, the Dereks stocked up on toys. John played with 'em for hours!

The nurse at the desk looked up as John Derek passed. He smiled briefly, his eyes troubled, and hurried down the corridor of the Children's Hospital.

Each day he'd come, hopeful, afraid. He'd enter the room at the end of the corridor and slip quietly into a chair beside the bassinette. It was as if he believed that, in some way, he could give his son part of his own strength.

He'd watch the small fist curl, he'd wait eagerly for signs of a change, an improvement. For over a month, in incubator and in hospital room, the baby had been fighting for his life.

From the time he was born, Russell Andre was on the critical list. The doctor had doubted that young Mrs. Derek would ever have a child. The fact that she did seemed miraculous enough—even though Patti was confined to bed four months before his birth.

It wasn't all sadness, though. You couldn't find two prouder people in the world than John and Patti.

"I hope it's a boy," he said. "Then I'll buy myself a big set of electric trains."

"Do you think she'll be beautiful," Patti asked, "or will she look like you?"

"Do you think he'll be brainy," John laughed, "or will he act like you?"

He took her on a shopping tour. "Maternity dresses," he announced to the floor walker, "—for my wife."

"I think black," said Patti.

"I think green and plaid and polka dots," said John, "to go with your hair."

Her hair flashed red in the sun, and they'd take walks (Continued on page 73)

Agent Marty Melcher, whom she'll marry in February, says Doris is wholesome.

■ One look, and that'll tell you. Two looks, if you're a wolf. Anyway, it's easy to see why men love Doris Day. If you're a brother, you want her for a sister. If you're a husband, you want her for a wife. If you're crazy, you don't want her.

Bob Hope, on whose show she's been singing these past few years, thinks she's too normal to be true. "There are some girls," Hope says, "who attract only men. They're usually the slinky siren type. There are others who attract only women. Doris attracts both. The girls like her because she's natural, pretty and friendly. The men love her because she's beautifully built, she sings like an angel, and she gives the impression that she'll remain faithful to you forever."

Mike Curtiz, Warner director who gave Doris her first break in pictures, and who is notorious for his use of the English language, says, "Doris is saxy but in an un-saxy way. Her sax sneaks up on you."

It sneaked up on Marty Melcher and got a strangle-hold. He's going to marry her come February. The plot of their romance could make a movie. . . .

A few years ago, Doris Day married George Weidler, a saxophone player, brother of Virginia Weidler. George was 21, Doris was 23. It was her second marriage. Her first had been to Al Jordan, a musician in Jimmy Dorsey's band. When she was only 18, Doris had given birth to a boy, and now her mother was looking after him in Cincinnati.

Doris loved George, but their marriage didn't get off to a good start. They had no place to live. The housing shortage seemed to be centered in Hollywood, so the newlyweds bought a trailer and parked it in a celery field.

Doris didn't mind as long as George didn't. This was life, she thought, and there wasn't much dust in the trailer, and anyway things would get better.

George got a job at CBS, and Doris sang on the Sweeney and March program, and things could be worse. Only not much worse. They began to fight.

Well, one night, Doris was singing in the Little Club in New York (she'd been booked there for a month.) Picture this particular night. . . .

She's crooning a flock of love ballads in that soft, breathless style of hers, and the "spots" light up her golden hair. The audience sits enraptured while Doris sings "This Love of Mine." And her own thoughts are back in that celery field in California, back in that trailer, back with her husband George. . . .

The manager comes up and hands her a letter. Doris opens it eagerly. It's from George. She reads the first few lines. She puts the letter down, unbelievingly. But the words jump up at her—"I think it best that we get a divorce." She can't believe it—this boy she loves, he doesn't love her anymore.

Back she went to California. George and Doris talked it out.

"We're still good friends," George said to her.

"I don't want to be your friend," she said. "I want to be your wife."

"Our marriage can't last," he said. (Continued on page 81)

Get a load of DOUGLAS!

Jan Sterling became Mrs. Paul Douglas on May 12, in Los Angeles. (He proposed to her on Humphrey Bogart's yacht.) It's Jan's second marriage, the fifth one for Paul.

■ Paul Douglas is Hollywood's latest dreamboat. Nobody knows why. His profile is about as classic as a St. Bernard's. He's 43, he weighs 200 pounds, he talks loudly, and not always grammatically.

Nevertheless, women love him. Five women loved him extravagantly enough to marry him. There was Elizabeth Farnum, there was Susie Wells who is now the wife of a playwright, there was Gerri Higgins, there was Virginia Field who is the mother of his five-year-old daughter, Maggie. And now there's Jan Sterling, his bride.

There are countless other admirers who never get near enough to introduce themselves, let alone propose. But they write to him all the time, and usually they say something like—"You're not handsome, but you're such a big, satisfying man."

"Heaven forbid that I should consider myself a lady-killer," he growls. "But it must be that I'm close to what women think they can get." Women, he might be inclined to add, have good judgment. He isn't bragging. He just feels that if a man doesn't think he's appealing he might as well lie down and die.

It would be very foolish of Douglas to lie down right now. In less than three years, he's made seven movies; all of them were hits. And you can bet that talent scouts all over the country have added a new item to their shopping lists. It probably reads—heavyweight extrovert, can bulk in the wrong places, may be more earthborn than parlor-bred.

This doesn't mean that Douglas is uncomfortable in the presence of polite society. He's been a successful public figure for the past fifteen years, and most of that time his figure was in the midst of the champagne set. But no matter how many checks he picked up in the Stork Club, he never picked up a phony accent. (Continued on page 89)

by carl schroeder and jane wilkie

There are old friends, new friends, roses, cheers, and the Powells will never forget those good people, that wonderful town . . .

■ It all started with The Reformer and the Redhead, in which they co-star.

"We're going to première in Little Rock," said Dick.

"Little Rock?" said June.

"That's Arkansas, that's my hometown," said Dick. "That happens to be the best little town in the U. S. A. More questions?"

"One more," said June. "How'll we get there?"

"We'll fly," said Dick, and June's heart sank. Flying only petrifies her. "You know what'll happen," she said. "I'll die—like the last time."

Dick laughed. Last time they flew to Salt Lake City. When the order was given to fasten safety belts because they were coming in for a landing, June shuddered and complied. Forty minutes later, they were still up in the air, and June, her eyes tightly shut, called for the stewardess. "What's the trouble?" she asked in a small voice.

"Nothing to worry about," said the stewardess cheerily. "We're just looking for a hole to go down."

Cautiously, June opened one eye and peeked out the window. What she saw was the kind of thing that makes pilots grow old. Rain and sleet poured past the window pane, and beyond that, nothing.

"Why," said June, "isn't it beautiful. Look. Richard! You can't even see the wing-tip! Look at all that swirling snow! Isn't it wonderful?"

Dick clapped a hand to his forehead, and just then the pilot found a hole and dived through it toward the ground. June saw the earth for the first time in hours, and immediately started trembling with fright.

Well, they took a plane at 2:30 in the morning, and June didn't quite die. At 7:30 the same morning they arrived in Dallas, Texas.

"Why don't you come over to my apartment," invited Cissie Hallmark, the stewardess. "I'll make us breakfast."

"Love to," said Dick.

"I don't know," said June. "I'm not hungry."

"You know, she's never hungry," said Dick to Cissie. "At least, not when she should be. She'll eat five meals one day, and the next two days she won't eat anything."

"Now, Dick—" said June.

"When she's about to faint I'll tell her, 'Go ahead, eat something. Eat an egg.' 'No,' she says. 'So I go into the kitchen and fry her an egg, and she eats it, and then she says, 'Gee, I feel marvelous.' "

"Okay," said June, "Let's go get breakfast."

They went over to Cissie's place, and consumed a platter full of scrambled eggs.

"June, dear," Dick said suddenly. "You look green."

"Isn't that funny," said June. "I feel as though I look green. I feel awful."

"Well," said Cissie, getting up. "We mustn't let that plane leave without us."

"No," said June bravely. "That would be terrible, wouldn't it? Wouldn't it be terrible if the plane suddenly took off, and there we were stranded—without a plane."

They drove back to the plane, and got on it. All the way to Little Rock June looked green. "Planes don't agree with me," she said brightly to Dick. "I keep telling you."

Dick could only shake his head and pat hers until they got to Little Rock. At Little Rock she felt a little better. A band was there to greet them. Governor Sid McNath was there to shake their hands, and Rose Festival Queen Margaret Ann Stubbs and her court were there, too.

The Rose Queen gave June a big bouquet, and Dick graciously kissed the Rose Queen, several times.

"A fine thing," laughed June. "On our second honeymoon. Or is it our fifth?"

"Our fifth, dear," said Dick, kissing the Rose Queen's ladies-in-waiting.

To be exact, their fifth is on the nineteenth of August. Their first was a surprise to a lot of people who said it wouldn't last. He was so much older than she (he was 40); he liked to sail; she liked not to; he was serious; she was gay.

To them, though, the age difference was a big joke, and Dick did most of the kidding. During the first year of their marriage, June was on the verge of becoming a hypochondriac.

"Ye Gods!" Dick said, one evening. "To look at the pills in your dressing room you'd think you were headed for an immediate decease."

June sniffed. "You should talk. You take twice as many pills as I do."

"But I'm twice as old as you," said Dick, and it broke her up.

In five years, he became gayer, she got more serious; he still likes to sail; she still likes not to, but they get along fine.

But to get back to Little Rock, to the airport, to the Governor—the Governor invited (Continued on page 91)

BY HOYT AND ALICE BARNETT

Both Dan and Liz are expert riders. They made their first date at a riding show, he courted her on horseback, and now they're planning to buy a ranch. On rainy days they spend hours with their collection of model jumping fences.

Dan and Van Johnson rehearse their routine backstage at the recent Friars' Frolic where they exhibited their dancing talents.

He always did say Liz had a tin ear, but that doesn't stop Dan from playing his trombone with gusto. Liz is just pretending to be in pain, anyhow. She recently bought him a home recorder.

Dan makes like Krupa in his music room, which he insulated himself. When he's not riding, he's here.

■ Greet Dan Dailey with, "Hi, Dan, how's the world treating you?" And he'll come back with, "What do you mean, treatin'? I'm payin'."

You don't have to wait for a bell to ring when he cracks wise. And when he dances you don't have to call out the steps. He's hep. He's hep to a lot of things. He knows the difference between a debenture and class A voting stock; he can reel off yesterday's market quotations; he has his family's future wrapped up in a warm annuity.

Most of all, he's hep to himself. He's the first to admit he isn't perfect. If some of the mistakes he made had come earlier in life they might have frightened him out of a couple of years' growth. But now he's ahead of the game, and he'll tell you he owes it all to horses (not the kind that run at Santa Anita).

"Horses," he says, "are to ride. Never heard of a horse betting on a man, did you? Horse sense—that's what they've got."

Dailey, who isn't even part horse, has some of it, too. And horses have been involved in every important aspect of his adult life. When he lived in New York, he used to ride early in the morning, and so he couldn't stay up late in the all-night joints. Later, in Hollywood, he rode to get away from talking shop.

He made his first date with Liz at a horse show, (she rides like a champ). He courted her on horseback when they rode together through the San Fernando Valley. When he was in the Army, had received his commission as a battalion commander, and was stationed in Kansas, he and his wife would get up early on Sunday and ride some more.

"There was something wonderful," he says, "about being able to ride in the quiet evening with my wife—right in the middle of a war. We didn't feel like talking, or even thinking about what was ahead, for we knew I'd be transferred soon. It was just us—the horses—the evening."

Later, when Dan III was born, big Dan introduced him to horses as soon as he could holler, "Whoa!"

If you think Dailey is crazy about the animals, you're right. But he's even crazier about what they can do for him. "Thinking comes easier," he says, "when you get away from the strain and confusion of your work. And when you don't feel like thinking all you have to do is go out and put a horse over a fence or two. When a horse is moving toward an obstacle, you don't brood about how you should have played a scene yesterday, or worry about what some friend said the other evening when he was swacked. The fence ahead is an important piece of business, and it concerns you and your horse. Nobody else."

When Dan gets back from such a ride, he may be tired, but the cobwebs have been blown out of his head. He tries to keep them out.

"When I first came to Hollywood," he says, "I felt really lucky to be making three-four hundred a week. It was good money, and it still is a long way from bad.

"I knew there was bigger money around, but I didn't figure to get it. Ten years ago, big money (Continued on page 87)

Turns down Farley Granger, lets her temper flare—that's Shelley, the prima donna, or is it Shelley, the perplexed?

Shelley complains because she can't afford a pool—or a mink coat, even though she's making more money than she ever did in her life. (Her life started thirty years ago.)

Romantic rumors flared recently about Shelley and baseball's Gene Bearden above. But Shelley has another man on her mind. He's Bill O'Brien, young Paramount screenwriter.

THE night Farley Granger asked Shelley Winters to marry him she laughed softly, and with an unusual tenderness in her voice said, "No."

Shelley couldn't really explain to this handsome, romantic young man who is considered just about the only really perfect catch left among Hollywood bachelors that she was practically in love with someone else. Instead, she said, "Let's not spoil a beautiful friendship," and let it go at that.

It's true that speculation about them has gone on for a long time, and that Shelley and Farley have been together at least once a week for months, but none of her intimates would care to stand on their heads waiting for the two to marry.

And why don't these intimates think that Shelley will ever become Mrs. Farley Granger?

A certain amazing young Irishman, tall, black-haired, husky, intelligent, is the why. Liam O'Brien is his name. Bill to his friends. Liam, the boy who studied to be a priest. Bill, the man who turned to writing, discovered Hollywood while Shelley Winters discovered him. Bill, who wrote Chain Lightning, the Humphrey Bogart thriller and Beyond The Sunset, the new Glenn Ford picture, is a charming introvert who plays tennis, reads and works from 7:30 to midnight, gets up early and hits the creative ball at Paramount.

When Shelley thinks about Bill her eyes go dreamy. Of a Sunday morning she sometimes pounds on his front door, wakes him up and scrambles eggs for breakfast before their tennis match. Later in the afternoon they may be found sitting for hours in his living room reading everything from Lil Abner to Franz Kafka. Yes, this is the recipe for quiet romance, but friends are terribly afraid it will never come off.

Shelley will have to find herself first, an admission that she has made, although painfully, when she asked aloud the question, "Why am I so unhappy?"

The girl friend with whom she was sun bathing beside a swimming pool high above the Sunset strip sat bolt upright. "Unhappy! What have you got to be unhappy about?"

Shelley reached for a towel, wiped tears from her eyes and said, "I don't suppose you will understand. That's the trouble. No one seems to understand; or tries to. They just sit around and call me temperamental."

Shelley looked out over Hollywood, and said quietly, "I wish I could explain. I've worked almost all my life to be a big star. I've gone without meals to pay for dramatic lessons. Now here I am, making more money than I ever dreamed of, and what have I got? Do I own this swimming pool? No. Sure, it's nice to know people who have a swimming (Continued on page 95)

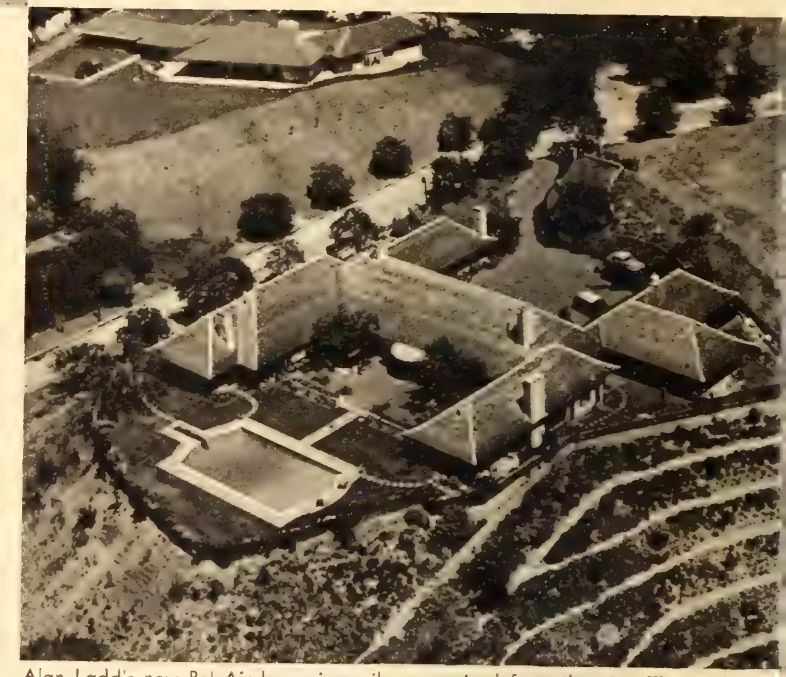
HERE'S AN AIRY VIEW OF SIX STARS' HOMES

■ The men in the helicopter up above are Bob Beerman and Bert Parry, Modern Screen's living photographers, and the pilot. "Is this trip necessary?" Beerman screamed as he was lifted into the machine.

"I quit," said Parry. "You think I have to do this for a living? I retire. Finis."

The smiles still on their happy faces, our boys soared into the wind over Hollywood. "Take pictures," we'd told them, "of the homes where the stars won't let you in."



So they took pictures. Two hundred feet above Clark Gable's home, one elbow resting on a cloud, Bob took a picture of Gable's house. Set far back from the road, and hidden by all sorts of shrubbery, passersby can't see it. But Bob did—and all the rest of the twenty acres, including citrus grove, pool and playhouse.

Then, zooming to 800 feet, the helicopter fluttered in the air above Holmby Hills. "Hold it!" Bert shouted, and here you have the Toppings' $100,000 estate with its pool and bathhouse (inside there's a double fireplace and sliding doors—this we got from our ground crew).

Only from the air can you see what a dream place Alan Ladd's house is. The land slopes wide and easy; the swimming pool's king-size. Ladd lives at the edge of Bel Air, and Robert Stack lives next to him. We got Stack's house for you, too.

At a fast 30 mile an hour clip, the helicopter headed for Franklin Canyon where Joan Evans lives with her parents. "Aw," said Beerman, "let's go home. None of those dolls are out sunbathing."

On the way back, Bob took the first exclusive shot of Harry James' new mansion which looks like a castle. There it sits on the opposite page. Take a good look. Our boys have just soaked their feet in cement.

Alan Ladd's new Bel Air home is easily recognized from the air. The modern H-shaped house, with its huge swimming pool, lies on sloping land. This is obviously wash day for the Ladds—note line of laundry at the right.

Surrounded by dense foliage and a five-acre grove of citrus trees, Clark Gable's San Fernando Valley home is set way back from the main road. Mrs. Gable is re-landscaping the grounds. The swimming pool left is a new addition.

Lana Turner's mansion is one of the showplaces of Holmby Hills and there's nothing small about it—even from way up high. There's a bath house under construction near the pool and Lana is rapidly informalizing the gardens.

Bob Stack paused in the middle of a tennis game when MODERN SCREEN's photographers appeared overhead. Walks shaded by lovely old trees lead to the swimming pool—the house upper right has a flagstone terrace.

Betty Grable and Harry James new home looks like an old manor house. Supposedly brought over brick-by-brick from Scotland, it came furnished with a ghost. The Jameses haven't met him yet.

"Of course it is," I laughed. "What do you mean?"

"The Alan Ladd I remember was a shy fellow who never said a word if he could skip it," he replied. "But this man is perfectly composed, talks easily and talks well. I went to him thinking I would have to force the conversation as before. It wasn't necessary at all. No, he's not the Alan Ladd I know."

That's why I'm glad MODERN SCREEN gave me this opportunity to talk about Benjie's first year. If it gets too boastful for you, too, please turn the page. I'll understand.

FIRST I want you to know that I realize I'm no child psychologist. Every mother has her own ideas about bringing up children and I'm no exception. I'll admit I have some strong notions. Because I waited so long to be a mother and was once disappointed, I had a lot of time to think about how I wanted my child to grow up. I wanted so much to help our baby build a strong body so that he could meet any physical challenge in his childhood and his later years.

I remember the first time I dipped him into the bathinette. I expected him to hate the water—and he did. All babies do at first. The best way I could think of to make him enjoy it was to make it seem like a swim instead of a bath.

I put my arm under his stomach and cupped my other hand under his chin to keep his face out of the water. That left him free to kick and splash. And did he! By the end of the bath, I looked as though I had just stepped out of the MGM pool.

I could brag and say that Benjie inherited his love of water from his amphibious mother. But I really think it was because he found out the bath was fun. It was so much fun that in a few days he was kicking the bejeepers out of his bathinette. In three weeks I had to switch him to the big tub.

Holding him up in the tub was back-breaking for his ma, so I tried something different. I filled the tub up just a few inches and let him float on his back unaided. Benjie was even more delighted with this method and churned up a healthy spray.

Soon he was skittering all over the tub like a little fish. At four weeks he was splashing around in his wading pool. It was the delight of my life, but I didn't dare brag about it. I could see myself trying to convince people that my son was swimming at a few weeks of age.

I could just see them nod unbelievingly and say, "Yes, Esther, we know."

The swim worked so well I thought I would try other body-building exercises. He did pull-ups to develop his arms and shoulders. He would tighten his little hands on my forefingers and pull himself up to a sitting position. Before he was more than a few months old, he was bouncing in his teeter chair, another exercise we found excellent for building up his legs. We looked for toys that are designed for physical development, rather than rattling toys that a baby shakes a few times and then drops. Above his bed we fastened a little punching bag which he soon began pounding with an agility that would make Kirk Douglas proud.

I DON'T want to convey the impression that Benjie's first year has all been rosy. Ben and I have had our trials as well as our triumphs. Our first big problem was finding a nurse.

It wasn't easy. We went through six nurses in as many weeks. As I've said, I had definite ideas about bringing up my child. I found some nurses didn't agree with my ideas. One day I found a nurse gazing over my shoulder as I was dressing the baby.

"I'll take care of him for awhile," I said. "Why don't you rest or read?"

She was insulted. "I am in charge of the nursery," she snapped.

She was soon packing her bags. I tried another and another and another. Finally, I was so desperate that I told the studio I couldn't go to work until I found a nurse I was satisfied with.

Luckily she came along. This one understood exactly what I wanted—a nurse who would be anonymous, who would be a good friend to my baby, but not another mother. She knew not to compete with me for Benjie's affections, as the others had done. And she knew that when I was home, she could get lost—I would take over.

Soon the system was working out well. I assumed charge the moment I got home from the studio in the evening. The first thing was the bath.

I liked the idea of an evening bath. It had been a pet theory of mine for a long time that the hour before bedtime was a trying period for both baby and parents. By that time the baby is played out and slept out. He's irritable. So why not have a warm, pleasant bath to sooth and exercise him? Then a big dinner and he'll be happy to see his bed.

This evening recreation works out well for everyone but Ben. It's 8:30 before I'm able to pay any attention to him. He practically has to make an appointment to see me before Benjie goes to bed.

But, of course, he understands that the evening period is the only time I get with Benjie when I'm working. Being a working mother has its disadvantages, but there's a good side. Before Benjie arrived, my mother and I worked out a plan so that I could have my baby's love and affection even though I had to work all day. If I could represent fun and recreation to him, besides being in complete charge of all his care whenever I am home, then nothing would be lost by being a working mother. Benjie starts making joyful sounds the moment I turn on his bath water. He has a happy swim and then comes dinner. And knowing what an active boy he is, you can realize how he loves to eat.

YES, now Benjie and I have become good friends. But it wasn't always so. In our first weeks together, it looked as though he would be boss. He ordered me around like a traffic cop at rush hour. He is a determined little guy and when he didn't get what he wanted, he yelled for it. I was frantic.

His biggest beef came after his bath. His man-sized appetite wouldn't wait until I dressed him before dinner. He yowled until he was dressed and eating.

That had to stop. So when he came out of the bath, I didn't wait to dress him. I wrapped him in a towel or a robe and stuck his dinner bottle in his mouth. That calmed him down in a hurry—and soothed my jangled nerves. It does make sense after all. It is rather wonderful to eat in something loose and comfortable. Maybe he had the best idea in the first place; I was happy to concede.

After that problem was solved, the balance of power shifted to his mother. I decided not to let him take advantage of me. Believe me, it's a struggle. Benjie knows what he wants when he wants it. I'm sure he gets that from his pop.

Ben's mother told me that Ben was a positive boy when he was young. He was the kind of child who would hold his breath until he got his way. Benjie is his father's son. But, like his father, he also has a sense of humor and that saves the day on many occasions.

Benjie can be kidded out of a snit. When he starts getting riled about something, it has been agreed that no one is to use a sympathetic tone with him. Nobody says "Poor lil fella" or anything like that. We all say, "Come on, turn it off, Benj; that's enough noise out of you."

And it works. Pretty soon a little kidding makes Benjie realize he's being silly and he starts laughing with us.

This past year has brought more joy and happiness than any Ben and I have ever known. It has shown us that two can be company, but three make a lot more fun. We have a thousand memories that will stay with us always.

FOR instance, there was Benjie's first plane ride. Ben had been invited to play in Bing Crosby's golf tournament at Del Monte. Ben is a bug for golf and was very anxious to go. I wanted to go along, too, but what about the baby? We decided to take him along. So we packed diapers, blankets, baby clothes, etc., and flew up to the tournament. Benjie, who was only four months, had a wonderful time. When the plane got a little rough, he was delighted. He was sure the pilot was making the plane bounce just for him and laughed gaily while his mommie got quite airsick.

And there was the boat trip to Hawaii. Benjie loved it, and he took to the islands like a native. The natives took to him, too. Whenever I was out without him, people would come up and ask, "Where is Benjie today?" or "Did Benjie have a dip this morning?"

I was happy to see that he likes change. He likes new pepole, too, but he's no pushover; he sizes a newcomer up before he turns on that incandescent smile.

He has stamina and endurance, but he's not jittery. He has a temper and what a temper! But he can be humored out of it. He's sturdy but he's affectionate, too. He has a laugh that ripples through the air and eyes that dance with delight.

I know this has been a terrible exhibition by a boasting mother and I hope you will forgive me for carrying on so. I'm sure that Benjie isn't any more unusual than any other baby anywhere. But come on and admit, you proud mothers of your first-born—wasn't this the way you talked when given the slightest opening? Ben and I hope with all our hearts we will have a few playmates for Benjie so that we can get a normal parental perspective. Please be patient with us until we do.

Duke would smile good-naturedly and ep his mind on the script. The script as so terrible, though, he felt he had to mplain. There was one scene in which s girl friend got mad at him in a night ub and stalked out on the arm of a ngster. Duke was supposed to run after r, get shoved out of the way by the ngster, and then inquire politely of his rl friend, "Where are you going with m?"

"This is silly," Duke said to the director.

"Indeed," said the director. "And just hat would you do?"

"Why, I'd belt the guy when he shoved e and tell the girl to come back and stop aking a fool of herself," said Duke.

"Well, you're not playing yourself in this ow," sneered the director. "You're play- g a gentleman."

Duke looked at the man coldly for a inute, then he grinned, "Okay, Jack," he id. "You're the doctor."

This happened a long time ago, as things e measured in Hollywood. Today, di- ctors pay attention when John Wayne akes suggestions. And none of them ould be foolish enough to imply that he n't a gentleman. Except John Ford. Ford alls Duke a shirt-tail bum 12 times a ay. But that's different. First place, Ford idn't learn how to speak in Sunday school. econd place, he doesn't mean it. In fact, ord's the fellow who gave Duke his first cting job. The year was 1927, Duke was prop man on the set of Men Without Women, and Ford was directing. One orning, a bit player failed to show up, ord looked Duke's way and shouted, Drop that tack hammer, you big lug, and et in there."

Duke got in there and he gave a tre- endously bad performance. But since at day, Ford's watched over his acting areer like a mother hen. They've made a t of hits together—Stagecoach, The Long oyage Home, Fort Apache, She Wore A ellow Ribbon—Duke would drop any ther part to work in a Ford production. s far as he's concerned Ford can call him ny name in the book.

t took a long time for the rest of Hollywood to learn about the kind of entleman Wayne is. The rough-neck eputation stuck with him no matter how any times he tipped his hat. He's a great ne for a moose hunt, people used to say, ut keep him out of the drawing room.

Certain aspects of Duke's behavior, at east as they were reported, didn't help correct this impression. Take, for ex- mple, the rough and tumble fist-fights e's had, on occasion, with Ward Bond.

"I've seen them mix it up until I nought they'd kill each other," a camera- an at Republic Studios says. "They'd tart arguing out on location and it would nd up with them both swinging from he ground. They didn't stop with just a loody nose or a black eye. They kept lugging until they both were worn out."

Invariably, these tussles made dandy tories for the columns. And a lot of eople got a chance to cluck their tongues nd confirm their belief that Duke was othing but a rowdy. Very few bothered o examine the fact that the fight was ust another chapter in a good-natured unning battle that has been going on ince Duke and Ward were in college ogether.

Ward and Duke have always been good ends, despite their sparring. Back in 43, when Duke was separated from his st wife, Josephine Saenz, he moved into e Hollywood Athletic Club, where Bond as staying, so they could continue their orkouts in the gym.

"For a while there," says a mutual end, "Duke and Ward quit slugging e another. It got too tame. In those days, eir favorite entertainment was testing hich one could drive his fist farthest rough a wooden door."

ALTHOUGH Duke has never got into any nightclub beefs in Hollywood," e of his marlin-fishing buddies reported, e's had a couple of pips in Mexico. One ght, he was sitting in a little saloon, nding his own business, when a drunk lled a knife and started shouting that could lick anyone in the house. It made ake so mad he took the guy's knife away d threw him clear over the bar. But hen he didn't get up, Duke walked ound and helped him. A few minutes er, he was buying the guy a drink and ologizing for being so rough with him."

Perhaps the biggest reason why Hollyood has been inclined to think of Duke a rough-neck results from his reluctnce to talk about himself. His own pubity representative, who has worked with m for 15 years, usually has to find out e news-worthy things that happen to ake from other people.

For example, when Duke was recently med by his fraternity as a Significant g, an honor shared by President Grover eveland, humorist George Ade, Postmas- Patrick Hurley, cartoonist Milton Can-, and less than 50 others, his press agent ard about it first from a fellow Sigma hi, not Duke. Last year, he financed a ries of educational shorts for his stand- Sid Davis, and didn't mention it until e first one was completed. And very few ople know that Duke each year puts up $1,000 scholarship for some deserving dent at USC.

"Duke cares almost nothing about pubity," his press agent says. "He's so easy please that sometimes I hate to take his oney."

Most of Duke's reticence about his acmplishments stems from his desire to main a natural and unaffected human ing. Even now when he's riding the crest the biggest wave in his career, Duke, a teran of 145 screen performances, knows all can end with a crash and roar at y time.

"I just happened to be lucky enough to ve five good action pictures in a row," says. "I hope I can find five more."

Duke learned a great deal about the ngers of self-advertising very early in e. When he was a boy in Glendale, the ds in grade school started a fad of rowing cheap perfume on everybody, d, to protect himself, Duke borrowed a ttle of asafoetida from his father's drug re. (And compared to asafoetida, a unk smells like Chanel #5.)

"It worked just fine as a defense mease, and I thought I was pretty smart to have thought of it," Duke recalls. "But one day, a kid asked to borrow it, and during recess he threw some on a girl. That caused an awful stink, in more ways than one. The teacher didn't have to bother asking who it belonged to. My dad's label was right there on the bottle. I don't think I'll forget how to spell asafoetida as long as I live."

Fraternity life at USC was an emphatic curb on budding egos, and it helped no end to instill the modesty which is almost an inherent part of Duke's personality. When Duke was proposed as a candidate for president of the freshman class, his frat wouldn't let him run. "Guys get too cocky when they get honors before they earn them," they told him. That influence carried over long after Duke had become an established actor in Hollywood.

VERY little has been printed, and hence very little is known, about Duke's home life. Since his marriage to Esperanza Bauer in 1945, Duke has given up most of his roistering and is living a peaceful and contented life on a rolling knoll in the San Fernando Valley. Their home is a pleasant ranch style building surrounded with hundreds of roses which Esperanza, whom Duke calls "Chata," has coaxed into beautiful bloom. Except when he's making a movie, or working at his office at Republic Studios, Duke doesn't stray far away these days. He's even rigged up a small gym in his garage so he can get his exercise at home. Because of his busy schedule, Duke hasn't had much time for the deep sea fishing he loves. Nor has he been hunting since he mistook Ward Bond for a rabbit and accidentally shot him with a charge of buckshot.

"I haven't been deer hunting for years," Duke says. "The last time was on opening day in 1947, when I went up to Huntington Lake station and found that 15,000 hunters had checked in. With that many out banging away, I decided to stay at the bottom of the hill and wait for a deer to be scared down. After sitting on a log for half an hour, I finally saw a couple of guys in red hats and shirts come busting through the brush and I asked them if they'd seen any deer. 'Sure,' one of them said, 'we saw one buck and three possibles.' 'What's a possible?' I asked him. 'Well, we saw something moving in the brush and shot at it.' That ended my deer hunting. I packed up and came home and I haven't gone back since."

Usually, it is next to impossible to reach Duke on weekends, for then he has a standing date with Toni, Patrick, Michael, and Melinda, the children of his first marriage. Sometimes it takes the judgment of Solomon to pacify the whole brood. A few weeks ago, when Ralph Edwards asked Duke to present a Seeing Eye dog on his show, he took his kids along to see the broadcast. They almost started a riot over who was going to hold his hands as they walked into the studio. Duke finally settled it by deciding that Toni and Michael got the inside track going in, and Pat and Melinda coming out.

The crowning characteristic of Duke's personality is his fierce loyalty to his friends. Now that he's an established star, he has little patience with the glad-handers and backslappers anxious to cash in on his success. But the men who have been his true friends over the years will always be able to consider themselves richer for knowing John Wayne.

Five years ago, when things were slow in Hollywood, Duke nagged his business manager, Bo Roos, to take over Ward Bond's affairs. Bo finally consented and has since set up a sound investment schedule for Ward that will leave him something to show for his (Continued on page 73)

And during the war, when Duke's press agent was called into service, Duke insisted on paying him his full salary while he was away.

THERE are a good many other instances of Duke's loyalty, far too many to list here. Suffice it to say that John Wayne hasn't forgotten any of the people who helped him to become a star. And ever since Red River and Fort Apache started an avalanche of coins at the box-office last year, Duke has become the most impressive new star in Hollywood.

Duke has been a long time arriving at this enviable state, but there isn't a person whom he's met along the way who doesn't feel he deserves it. Most of them would add that he deserves it because he is a real gentleman. A few others, however, would refuse to give up their opinion that he is simply a lucky rough-neck.

A few weeks ago, Duke was walking down Beverly Drive with Bo Roos. In the middle of the block, Duke saw a man standing on the curb, laughing hysterically at a woman who had locked bumpers with the car in the parking space behind her. The more she struggled, the harder the man laughed.

Duke came up alongside him, grabbed his arm, and hotly asked, "What's so funny, bud?"

The man stopped laughing immediately, and took off in a frightened hurry. Then Duke walked over and helped the lady get her car untangled. She thanked him politely and then drove away, convinced that there was at least one gentleman left on earth.

So there is—Duke Wayne. Or maybe you think he's a lug. It all depends on the way you're looking. THE END

A change came over the Derek world. For one thing, people stopped whispering about their marriage going to pieces. And John changed—in little ways that only a wife would notice.

"Funny," she said. "I don't trip over your clothes any more."

"I hang them up," he answered proudly.

He changed in other ways, that people noticed. "He acts like a family man," friends said. "He doesn't even lose his temper."

When the doctor ordered Patti to bed, she worried about John.

"Go see a movie," she'd tell him some nights.

"I have to wash the dishes," he'd say.

"You washed the dishes."

"I have to dry them."

He'd sit alongside her, and they'd make plans. "I think we'll buy a ranch," John would say. "Let him grow up in the open spaces."

They'd looked for houses all over Hollywood, preferring those within driving distance of Columbia Studios. But all the houses that were close were too expensive. For a while they dreamed of buying a huge red barn that had once belonged to Edgar Rice Burroughs. The agent told them the price. "For a barn!" said John. "For an old red barn that cows don't want anymore!"

"Maybe in five years," Patti said to the agent. "You can offer it to us again."

They decided how they'd bring up the baby. "We'll teach it to swim before it walks," said Patti—"like Esther Williams' baby. I remember when I was three they tied my ankle to a beach umbrella while every one else went swimming."

"We'll teach him how to ride," said John, "and sail."

"And then he'll grow up and some girl'll get him."

"A girl like you . . ."

"We'll have to teach him how to get along with people," Patti said. "If he gives away a toy, for instance, it stays given—the way my mother taught me."

WHEN Patti was four she'd impulsively donated a large rocking horse to a playmate. Two minutes later, she wanted it back. But her wise mother said no. She made Patti wipe away the tears as the other young lady dragged her trophy across the lawn. Patti's mother was firm. "You'll have to learn, darling, to be responsible for your actions."

"Responsibility and thoughtfulness for others," John nodded. "Say, do you suppose you can teach a baby to be thoughtful enough not to cry at night when I've got a five o'clock call in the morning?"

The months of waiting went fast, but sometimes, when John did the cooking they seemed as if they'd drag on forever. Most of the time he used a frying pan, because it looked easiest to handle. He'd raid the spice cupboard (because Patti likes spicy foods) and liberally empty its contents into the pan along with a steak. When the steak began to diminish in size, he'd take it out of the pan and serve it to Patti on a tray.

"Good?" he'd ask.

"Out of this world!" she'd say. "Let's see—cinnamon, paprika, poultry seasoning, celery salt, nutmeg, dry mustard. Darling!—tabasco, too! May I have some more salt?"

Gaining considerable confidence, John tried to expand his menu.

"What'll you have tonight, honey? More steak?"

Patti shook her head. "Tonight I want pickled pigs' feet."

"I'm good," said John. "But I'm not Oscar."

"In the refrigerator, darling, you'll find a dozen cans. All you have to do is open one."

He opened several, and gave them the Derek touch. And pretty soon, they got a housekeeper to do the cooking.

The waiting time ended the night John followed the ambulance to the hospital. Russell Andre Derek was delivered by Caesarian section. As soon as he could, John went in to see Patti.

"It's a boy," he whispered, "and he's beautiful—like you."

Patti smiled, "How is he?"

"Our son? Our son's fine," John said, and forced a grin on his lips.

A day and a half after his birth, Russell was placed on the critical list and taken into surgery.

He survived a delicate operation, and Patti was pronounced well enough to go home to their Encino bungalow. John, who'd been assigned a role in The Hero, came home several times a day to be with her. Then he'd drive to the hospital.

Three weeks after his birth Russell was brought home. However, the following afternoon, he began to choke. Only the presence of mind of his nurse saved his life. She pressed her lips against his and forced her breath into his lungs. Then the doctor took him back to the hospital.

Together, Patti and John resumed their vigil, waiting, praying. Somehow, through the sharing of their anxiety they've found new strength in each other. Somehow, out of their sorrow, there comes the promise of happiness. THE END

Six thousand miles away, another battery of reporters were querying Mrs. Crosby. After searching for Dixie all up and down the Pacific coast, they'd located her in Carmel. "You and Bing separated?" they asked.

"What does Bing say?" Dixie countered.

"That there's nothing to it."

"Then, that's it," Dixie agreed. "I don't know how this thing got started, anyway. People say it came from our lawyers. We've been working out a trust fund for our boys. Maybe that's how it started. Maybe someone misinterpreted that for a property settlement."

That's all Dixie would say. A day later, the reporters couldn't find her. A friend in Carmel said that she'd been very much upset by a phone call from her eldest son, Gary, away at prep school. "What's all this stuff in the papers, Mom?" he'd asked. And Dixie had said, "It's nothing, Gary. It's not true. Don't worry." Then, she'd gone up to Spokane where the Crosbys are thinking of putting up a new summer home.

How come if there was nothing to it, if the Crosbys were enjoying a normal amount of marital happiness the story broke in the first place?

That was the question the whole world asked.

ACTUALLY, a rumor got under way that Dixie was angry at Bing for not taking her with him to Europe. Since it wasn't a business trip, she figured she might just as well go along. Bing, in fact, has admitted: "Yes, Dixie is cross with me for not taking her."

From that statement, the rumor grew that Dixie had gone to her lawyer, told him that she and Bing were separating, and asked him to work out a settlement on their community property.

When reporters sought to verify the tale by phoning Dixie's attorney, he said, "We have nothing to say at this time," the inference being, of course, that perhaps they'd have something to say at some future date.

Bing's attorney, Jack O'Melveny, was then phoned. "We understand," one reporter began, as if the Crosby separation were an accomplished fact, "that the Crosbys have agreed on a property settlement. What is it?"

"There has been no property settlement of any kind," O'Melveny explained, and then he sought to calm the troubled waters. "There are some strained relations," he conceded, "but the whole matter is in abeyance until Mr. Crosby returns from Europe late in June. We hope then to effect a reconciliation."

No one effects a reconciliation unless there's been a break. Had Dixie and Bing broken? More to the point was this question: Was the Dixie-Bing relationship any more changed or strained than it had been in the recent past?

It has been no secret in Hollywood for some years now that the Bing Crosbys were not the most idyllically happy couple in the world.

As a matter of fact, it has been a source of constant amazement that this knowledge has never before become public property. Everyone just seemed to take for granted that Bing and Dixie and their four boys constituted the typical happy American family, and that Bing was the traditionally perfect American husband.

In the past five years, Bing's seldom been seen with his wife. Just a few months ago when he walked into Ciro's with Dixie, the patrons were so surprised that they were on the verge of declaring that particular night a holiday. The photographers all over town were quickly notified, and they rushed to the night club. Bing, who's sensitive about his balding head, was annoyed at the number of pictures taken. He dislikes being photographed without a hat, and few such photos of him are in existence.

Dixie's friends are certain that she's very much in love with Bing, always has been, and always will be. This is understandable. Crosby is charming, versatile, unselfish, natural, intelligent, and great fun.

UNFORTUNATELY, his interests are so diversified that he spends very little time at home.

This was all right with Dixie when the four boys were young, and she had her hands and time completely filled by them. Now, however, she's got more time for Bing. Their home in Holmby Hills (see page 32) is beautifully and comfortably furnished, but it's been many months since all six Crosbys were gathered there together. In essence, Dixie would like to see Bing more often.

She won't come right out and say this. In fact, she will say virtually nothing about her marriage to Bing except, "It's wonderful," but you can find plenty of people who know the set-up, and knowing it, will tell you that Dixie would like fewer nights to spend alone.

On Bing's side, it must be said that everything he has done, has been done for the members of his family. In an effort to provide them with a financial security which he as a boy never knew, he has worked or invested as few entertainers ever have.

More than 70% of the $1,200,000 a year he earns, goes to the government in taxes. He also has a tremendous overhead that he must work to meet. Working takes time, and that time is the crux of the "strain" that exists between Bing and Dixie. Under his present setup, Bing has too little time. He utilizes most of it to earn money. (He's just finished Mr. Music.)

FEW fans realize it but practically everything costs Crosby more. When the twins were born, for example, Bing received a bill for $4,000. "Tell you what," he said to the doctor, "I'll play you a round of golf for half or double." He won the round and paid $2,000.

Oddly enough, when Dixie first met Bing some 21 years ago, she never expected that too much work would turn out to be one of his troubles. No one else did, either.

Several fellows took a long, deep look into the Crosby background and came up with the information that he'd once been jailed in Portland for not paying his bill at a Chinese restaurant, that he had once been jailed in Los Angeles for driving a car while alcoholically stimulated, and that a truancy report in the Spokane Board of Education files carried the notation: "Boy's mother came for him and promised to keep him out of trouble."

Despite this information and countless other warnings, Dixie continued to see Bing. She was very much in love with him, and he was trying to substantiate her faith by getting a start in motion pictures.

Bing was jobless at the time Dixie gave up her career and married him. They had no money for a honeymoon. Sue Carol, who is now Mrs. Alan Ladd, was then a beautiful (Continued on page 77)

by sheilah graham

Of all the days of their years—they'll remember these—the secret golden days of their honeymoon.

■ Never in any girl's secret heart is there a time more precious than her honeymoon. It is then, for a short while, that the world is barred from her life, and she can revel in a delicious sort of selfishness with the man she loves.

That is how it is with Elizabeth Taylor. Gone are directors, cameras, publicity men. Gone too, briefly, her beloved mother and father. We all know how she feels and I am certain the public is content to leave intimate contact with Mr. and Mrs. Nicky Hilton to those properly anointed people, the waiters, bus boys, bell hops and hotel managers whose job it is to serve but never really see the long parade of honeymooners.

I say the time has come for awhile to leave Elizabeth Taylor alone, but happily she didn't leave me alone and I know she will forgive me if I reveal the exclusive, factual story of the honeymoon as I observed a portion of it and as she told me more, shyly drawing aside the curtain of her rightful privacy.

For more than five years, I've been a neighbor of the Taylor family. I live on Maple Drive in Beverly Hills. They live a block away on Elm. We've been good friends. In the summer we've been beach neighbors at Malibu. I watched Elizabeth grow up, chatted with her over the back fence and (Continued on page 83)

Bing and Dixie were very happy and very carefree. Bing is a shrewd investor nowadays. But back in 1931, money was made to be spent. Life was short, love was with him, and together he and Dixie would enjoy it to the full. He was in his twenties. His brother Everett was managing him, and if he had any worries about making a success of his marriage, he certainly never showed them. He was confident something would turn up, and as luck would have it, something did.

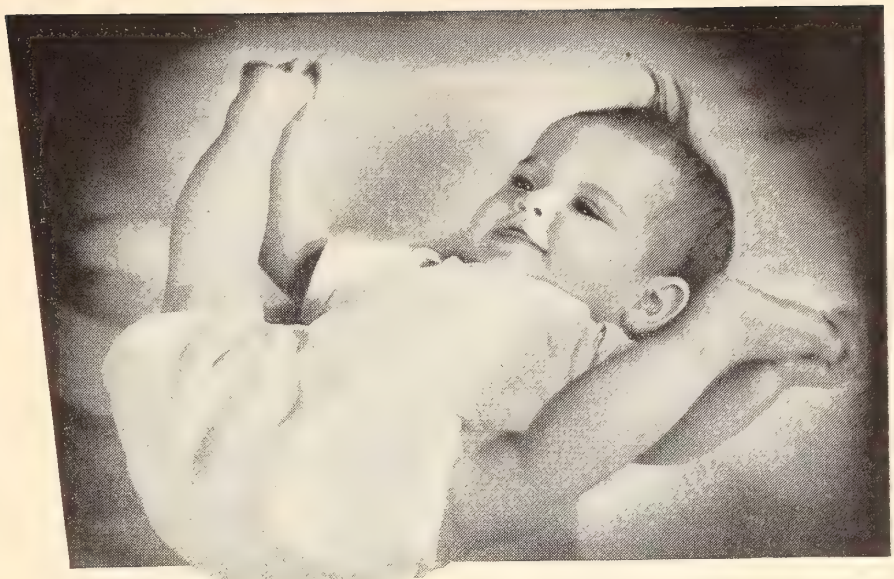
Brother Everett talked Jack Kapp of Decca Records into letting Bing record twelve sides at $125 a side. (Today these records are considered collector's items and each pressing is worth $25.) He then broke up Bing's honeymoon by dragging him off to New York and getting him two jobs: one at CBS for $600 a week and one at the Paramount Theater for $1,000.

Thus, a few months after his marriage, Der Bingle, the boy of whom so many had warned Dixie—"He's a loafer. You'll starve if you marry him."—this boy was earning $1,600 every seven days.

In 1931, Bing wasn't nearly the nonchalant sophisticate he is today. He used to turn to Everett in amazement and say, "Everett, please take care of this money. I'm sure this luck can't last."

BUT it did last, and as Bing's success grew, so did his family.

With the birth of their boys, Bing and Dixie were seen together less and less. This was to be expected. Raising four boys is a full-time job. When the sun set, Dixie was tired. Bing has never been a socially-minded creature, and he, too, when the day's work was done, would come home, flop down on the sofa, light his pipe, and relax. Almost never did the Crosbys make the nightclub rounds. But they spent the evenings together.



Bing, who's always been a fine golfer, would play 18 holes whenever he could, and on many occasions, Dixie found herself a golf widow, but she never minded, because the boys provided all the daytime company and excitement she could afford.

When they grew up and went off to St. John's Military Academy in Los Angeles, she found some respite, but not much. Gary began to play the trombone. The twins took up the trumpet, and Linny discovered great enjoyment in pounding the drums. The tennis court in back of the house was used for football, baseball, and basketball. The boys invited home such schoolmates as Donnie and Ronnie Ameche, Les Gargan, Mike Geisler, Phil Harris, Jr. and young Mike Farrow. The house became one happy shambles.

As soon as Gary grew out of one stage, the twins would grow in. Once they stopped being trouble, Linny made a fine substitute.

Watching their youngsters grow and develop, Dixie and Bing found these the happy years. Occasionally, Dixie came down with some illness and had to be hospitalized, but for the most part, the Crosby menage was regarded as an extremely model one.

BING'S career was progressing at its usual incredible rate. From an individual who could sing in a simple, sincere manner, who could "throw lines away," who could charm a nation with his voice and wit, Bing Crosby developed into big business. That's what Bing is today—big business. How many people make their living through him directly or indirectly is difficult to say. One researcher esti-

There is nothing wrong in big business per se, but when a whole empire revolves about one man, then that man's wife is bound to suffer. Dixie Lee Crosby is the case in point.

To ask a man like Bing to give up his golf, to give up his motion pictures, to give up his ranch or baseball interests is like asking a mother to give up her child.

Dixie will never ask Bing to give anything up. He must do it because he wants it. It must be of his own accord. Dixie realizes this.

What is even more important, Bing does, too. Not that he will ever publicly acknowledge the existence of any strain between him and Dixie. He will carry on as he always has, seemingly indifferent. He will not try to compensate for the emergence of this "breakup" publicity by posing with his family in any series of happy home-life layouts. He is much too sharp for that.

He will go his own way, saying nothing of his private life. Over the years it's been his policy to offer no refutation to his critics. Last year, for example, a national magazine published an article in which the author maintained that Bing had lost his voice and for artistic purposes at least, was washed up.

Many persons urged Bing or his brother Larry, in charge of the Crosby public relations, to offer a stinging rebuttal. Bing would have none of it. Say nothing is his dictum, and the criticism will die. Say something and you increase its momentum.

Dixie believes in an identical policy.

In the months to come therefore, silence will be the keyword as regards the Bing-Dixie relationship.

Bing was genuinely alarmed at the worldwide shock created by the separation story. You can bet your last copper that he will take corrective measures. In his whole, hectic, thrill-jammed life, Der Bingle has never made the same mistake twice.

TALKING and laughing still, she slips out of her smart little suit and marches right to the closet to hang it up, and then she says, "Kiddo, this dress is going to be blue, isn't it?"

"Of course," I tell her. "You know I always include at least one blue dress."

Janie adores blue—maybe because it's her most becoming color. I remember how disappointed she looked when we were working on her clothes for Nancy Goes to Rio. I'd included all the other colors so becoming to her blonde hair and tanned skin—pink, yellow, gray, lavender, cocoa and white, but nothing had been said about blue.

She'd been fitted to all the dresses and was ready to put on her street clothes and her smile had faded a little. So I nodded to Brucie, and Brucie brought out the blue dress. The light went on in Janie's eyes. The dress was a simple gingham one with embroidered organdy, but to Janie it was "The" dress of the picture.

One of Janie's new suits for fall will be blue. Janie has designed her own clothes for years, but this time we worked them out together. The suit (sketch B) has a blue and white wool bolero, with the blue in it picked up by the bright wool skirt.

Surprisingly enough, boleros are very becoming to Jane. Most little girls have to be extremely wary of boleros or they risk looking like penguins. When cut a few inches below the bust-line, though, they make the legs look longer and consequently add height to the entire figure.

Another nice thing about a bolero and skirt suit is that either can be worn separately with no loss of attractiveness.

In the midst of the fitting, Janie shot out her hand and said, "Look, kiddo, what do you think of my sensational nails?"

"Sensational," I said, and they were—long, beautifully shaped, and with a pink coral polish. It was only two or three years ago that Janie stopped biting them down to the quick. That was B.G. (Before Geary). Love can certainly have a wonderful influence. It even influenced Janie's choice of clothes. You can't wear a sweater and a skirt to a dance can you, when you're with an older man? (Geary was all of 22.) So Janie learned another valuable lesson when she started going out with him; she learned where to wear her clothes.

You don't find her getting all gussied up in an evening gown for an informal party. She's more likely to choose a dress like the one in sketch A. That one's an electric blue taffeta combined with net. Black is too solemn for anyone of Janie's size and age, but dark blues, dark greens and cocoa are fine for informal evening clothes.

JANIE doesn't have many evening gowns, the Steffans don't do much night-clubbing, but Janie requires long gowns occasionally for premières and personal appearances.

In the summer, she prefers white in those wonderful, feminine fabrics like marquisette, organdy, net or voile. In the fall and winter she's more careful in her choice of materials. Brocade, as she will tell you, makes her look like an "overstuffed davenport." But taffeta, combined with net makes her look like a Dresden doll.

Like all girls, Janie discovered that when there's a man in your life, you dress to please him. Geary doesn't care much for slacks. Janie has one pair of black velveteen slacks which she wears informally at home. "They're not bad," says Geary hesitantly, but Janie knows he prefers skirts. What can be more feminine than the lovely, full skirt of a housecoat? Janie, herself, can't resist them. And Geary knows, when she wears one, that she's dressing especially for him.

This year, Janie and I got together and thought up the housecoat in sketch D. It's blue with red dots, and the lining is red with white dots. A little cape forms sleeves in the front. Geary ought to like that fine.

Another thing made especially for Geary is the gold wool skirt and white blouse in sketch E. Geary likes anything as long as it's yellow. "I'd wear yellow even if it made me look like a custard pie," says Janie. Fortunately, it's a wonderful color against her skin and hair.

Geary's birthday present to Janie last year was a yellow bathing suit.

"However did you know what size to get me?" she asked.

"Well, I asked the clerk to show me some yellow bathing suits, and I kept saying 'no' until she got down to the smallest one in the store, and I said, 'That's it!' "

It couldn't have fitted her better. But Geary was lucky. Not many stores carry size 8.

So Janie simply had to get one golden skirt for fall. Not many girls of Janie's size can wear a blouse and skirt successfully, because the blouse won't stay tucked in. That's because tiny girls usually have very little space at their waist. Their hips begin before their diaphragms have a chance to end. But Janie's proportions are so exact that she has a completely normal waistline, and a blouse and skirt always look neat on her. Another reason for this may be that Janie always stands up straight. She would love to be statuesque.

Janie wears high heels to appear tall, but I think she should wear them because she has exceptionally pretty feet and ankles, and she knows how to handle them. I mean, she doesn't keep her feet pointed to ten minutes of two, and she doesn't thrust one hip in the air and forget about the other. She simply keeps her feet easily together so she has balance.

This desire of Janie's to be taller is only a small part of her ambition. She's never seen herself on the screen without exclaiming, "Why didn't I fix my hair differently?" Or, "I should watch the way I pronounce my words," and she goes home buzzing with plans for improvement. Janie knows that it takes more than clothes to make a woman glamorous.

I don't think I've ever seen a girl as organized as Janie. Her self-improvement plans aren't idle chatter. Geary has to read plays with her to improve her diction.

When she goes shopping for food, she carries a list. And when she shops for clothes, she has a list, too—a whole inventory of what there is in her closet that's useable and how it can be combined to make another outfit.

Janie buys clothes only twice a year. This makes for a well-coordinated wardrobe. She never buys more than one suit or coat a season. This fall she'll wear the green wool fitted coat in sketch C. It has a diagonal beaver collar because the angled line will give her more height than, for instance, a Peter Pan collar.

If her clothes budget can stand the strain, she'll get herself another suit this fall. (She hopes Geary just might like to give her one for Christmas.) We've already discussed the design and color. It would be a soft brown wool with a line of beige running from the shoulder into tiny pleats at the hip line of the jacket. It's the kind of suit that would be just right early in the season without a coat, and under her green coat later on. If she doesn't get the suit, though, Janie won't mind—but she can dream, can't she?

All I know is, she can dress, too—like a dream. THE END

Jane Powell's thoughtfulness for other people is sometimes tinged with teasing. Recently Ricardo Montalban, her co-star in The Tender Years, hurt his back badly enough to necessitate a brace. In a dream sequence in the picture Janie wears a fancy pink satin corset complete with pink tulle picture hat, long white kid gloves, black silk stockings, shoes with rhinestone heels and a ruffled umbrella. When she heard about Ricardo's accident, she packed up the hat, gloves, hose, shoes and umbrella and sent them to Ric with this note:

"As long as you're trying to steal my thunder with the corset department, you might as well have the rest of the props. Hope you get well soon. Love. Your theatrical partner."

Frank flew to Ava's side in Spain, where she's making a movie. Here they have tea with Mrs. Frank Grant.

Bull fighter Mario Cabre, starred with Ava in Pandora and The Flying Dutchman, publicly declared his undying love for her.

Is it love—or a strange interlude? Nancy keeps faith—and in her heart she prays that Frank will come back.

By SALLY BURNS

TRAGIC TRIANGLE

FRANK SINATRA wears his heart on his sleeve. He always has, and he always will.

It's part of his lack of discipline, part of his willful, charming, generous nature.

He loves and he hates quickly. He went out with Ava Gardner twice, he forgot he was a married man, and he fell for her the way coal shuttles into a cellar basement.

Ava suddenly received a beautiful little spinet piano, and everyone knew at once: Frankie had fallen in love. His studio denied it. "Why," one exasperated publicity woman demanded, "do people go around making up these stories? It's silly and it's stupid."

A day later, Ava and Frank were photographed in a Houston, Texas, restaurant. Frank had been crooning at Glenn McCarthy's Hotel Shamrock, and Ava had flown East to visit him. She didn't fly for the exercise, and she didn't fly because she likes to see Grand Canyon from the air. She flew to Houston, because she loved Frank, and loving him, she wanted to be near him.

When Ava took that trip, she knew full well that she was taking a chance, risking her career, her good name, her good reputation. But she took it anyway. When you've spent a lot of time with a man, and he leaves, there comes into your life this horrible void, and you simply must see the object of your heart again. You are all desire and emotion and the common-sense considerations of the day never figure in your thinking.

There are many people who know Ava very slightly, who misinterpret her flip manner for one of nonchalance. These are the persons who would have you believe that the love affair has always been one-sided. These are the gossip-mongers who spread the ridiculous story that Frank tried to commit suicide in the Hampshire House in New York. "Oh, yes," they said, "Ava told him they were all washed up, and then Frank said, 'If you leave me, I swear I'll shoot my brains out,' and she said, 'Good (Continued on page 101)

For a moment Doris couldn't speak. Then she said, "Anything you say, George."

So they separated, but life went on. Al Levey, an agent who once managed Sinatra, talked Doris into signing with Century Artists. "They can do a lot for you," he promised.

He didn't know it, but Century Artists gave her Marty Melcher. Marty and Doris had seen each other before. Everyone in the music business knows everyone else. But this was the first time they sat down and talked.

To Marty, though, Doris was just another client. A pretty blonde, yes. Charming, yes. Trusting, oh, yes. But just another client. Besides, he was married to Patty Andrews, of the Andrews Sisters, and he had his work cut out for him, managing her. His marriage, as it turned out, was heading for the rocks, and hit them last February.

Marty had been managing Doris professionally for two years when suddenly he discovered he was in love. "I can't tell you when it happened," he says, "but it happened."

He can tell you a lot about Doris, though. "Doris is a bubbler," he says. "She's light and gay and warm, and well, you know what usually happens to girls when they have a little success in Hollywood. All of a sudden they are saying 'cahnt' instead of 'can't.' They are saying 'petrol' instead of 'gas,' and 'mother' instead of 'mama.'

"Not with my baby, no sir. Doris is as wholesome as a hot dog. Maybe you won't believe this, but her career means nothing to her."

Doris' husband-to-be is tall (6 feet 3), dark, handsome and convincing. Besides, if you don't believe him, you can always ask Doris. (And Doris' attitude may have a lot to do with Marty's love.)

"MARTY is right," Doris will tell you, "I think this singing and acting is a wonderful way to make a living. But I don't want to be a career girl forever. You never get to see your husband."

To anyone who's remotely interested, Doris will show the charm bracelet Marty gave her. "Isn't he considerate?" she'll say. "He takes care of everything. He really does. A few days ago I bought a house in Toluca Lake. It's colonial, and I've always wanted a colonial house. It has about nine rooms. Anyway, I'd had my eye on that house for nine months. I asked Marty if I could afford it. He said yes. So I bought it, and Marty went ahead and moved all the furniture from my old house to my new one. He didn't have to do it. After all, we're not even formally engaged."

The reason they're not formally engaged is simple. Doris' divorce from George Weidler didn't become final until June of this year, and Marty's divorce from Patty Andrews doesn't become final until February. But they don't make a secret of their love. It's in their eyes.

Another man who loves her is Terry, though he's only eight. But he has good taste, and she's his mother, besides. The people who work with her like her, too. Not only the stars, but the grips, the electricians, the propmen. They know a good sport when they see one.

ONE afternoon, Doris invited Terry down to the set of Tea For Two. Terry was particularly thrilled by one bit of action—the firing of a revolver with the blank shells flying all over the set.

"That's awful keen," Terry said to one of the prop men. "Do you know where I could get some empty shells like that?"

"Sure," said the property man. "Just ask for Jack Warner. He's in charge of everything around here."

Jack Warner, of course, is the somewhat austere president of Warner Brothers. But little Terry didn't know that. Blithely, he ran around the studio asking everyone he met, "Where can I find a guy named Jack Warner?"

"What do you want Mr. Warner for?" a guard finally asked.

"Well," said Terry, "he's in charge of shooting blanks."

The guard almost collapsed in laughter. When Doris heard the story she howled, too. It never occurred to her to call down the prop man for taking advantage of her son's innocence. But when a former Warner prima donna heard of the incident, she said, "Heaven knows that Jack Warner has his eccentricities, but shooting blanks isn't one of them. If someone had told that to my child, I would've had him fired. Miss Day's son could put her in a most embarrassing spot."

Doris obviously didn't think so. She enjoys a good laugh anytime. And she can take a ribbing. Bob Hope, for instance, calls her Jut-Butt, which isn't very dignified, or even flattering. Doris doesn't mind. She does jut—in the right places—so Hope can have his fun. And he likes her, because she lets him.

Fame did a funny thing to Doris Day. It showed her that she could do without it. Unlike other stars who started off poor, she doesn't clutch fame for all it's worth. She doesn't even know how much money she's earning, and she doesn't care. "Money," she'll tell you, "never brings happiness. In fact, almost the reverse holds true. People with the most money are usually the unhappiest.

"All I'd like," she says, "is to own a little income property, a motel or a small apartment house which Marty and I could manage ourselves. Right now, we don't have enough time for each other. We're both so busy running from studio to studio, we only get to see each other at night. By then, we're both pretty well fagged out."

Whether marriage will have any adverse effect on Doris' career, no one can tell. It certainly didn't harm Betty Grable who's a similar type. Betty received even more fan mail after she married Harry James.

Undoubtedly, the same thing will happen to Doris, because, as Jack Carson once said, "When you see this baby on film and hear her singing, you close your eyes and kid yourself into believing that she's singing only for you."

That's the kind of wishful thinking a girl like Day provokes. That's her kind of magic. THE END

That is why I felt extremely honored one Sunday afternoon when Elizabeth's mother called me to say, "Elizabeth and Nicky have just returned from Carmel. We'd love to have you come over and see us all." I scurried around, dressing my children in their Sunday best—four-year-old Robert, who still considered himself Elizabeth's best beau, and dark-eyed Wendy, who has loved the Taylor girl ever since she read Liz's book, "Nibbles and Me."

Nicky wasn't there when we arrived. Elizabeth was back in her own small bedroom preparing to step into her wedding gown.

"What's all this?" I asked in amazement. "Who ever heard of a bride putting her wedding gown back on during the honeymoon?"

Elizabeth laughed delightedly. "We're making history, aren't we?" she asked. "Sheila, we have an awful confession. In all the excitement no one took a proper wedding picture. So Nicky and I just decided that we'd have to have one. Now he's over at the Bel Air climbing back into his groom costume and all the family is gathering for the event."

Mrs. Taylor came in just then. "Elizabeth," she said, "your hair. It doesn't look at all like it did on the wedding day. Can't you do something with it for the photograph?"

"Not a thing, mother," Elizabeth said happily. "I just can't part it the way it was. My wedding picture will have to be in bangs, that's all." Then she confessed. While playing golf and riding horseback, not to speak of those long walks together on the beach at Carmel, the Pacific breezes had simply loaded her hair with fine grains of sand.

"Look at it," Elizabeth said. "It's completely unruly, but clean though, thanks to Nicky."

"Did he remember to get you to the beauty parlor?"

"Oh no. Not that—he washed my hair for me." Elizabeth blushed. "It was sort of a gag, really. Nicky needed a haircut. You know how it is around the set. Sooner or later you can't resist the temptation to grab a pair of scissors and cut somebody's hair. I've become quite proficient. So I gave Nicky a trim. When he comes in you'll see sort of a pink patch where he moved, I cut too close and he got a touch of sunburn. When I finished he insisted on turn-about, but I can promise you we won't do that always. We were just having a lot of that gay, silly honeymoon fun."

Now Elizabeth was ready to step into her gown.

Wendy stared at her, eyes widening at her beauty. "Geekins, Mommy," she whispered. "Isn't she lovely—and no makeup at all."

"Aha," Mrs. Taylor exclaimed, "you've put on some weight."

And Elizabeth had, just a little.

"Talk about weight," Elizabeth said. "This wonderful gown must weigh all of thirty pounds." She sat down at her dressing table and a faraway look crept into her eyes. She told me then, talking half to herself, things that no one ever knew about the wedding. She seemed a little more assured and worldly than she was when she was still Elizabeth Taylor exclusively.

"Sheila, this wedding gown is going to be put away in a trunk. Mother's going to keep it for me, exactly as it is—with the veil, petticoat, shoes and the little hanky her grandmother made for her to carry at her wedding. The flowers too. It's a little chapter—really the biggest—in my whole life, and I want it wrapped up and kept exactly as it was the day I married."

"That was some day," I ventured. "You know, we didn't have time to talk. I didn't even ask that old cliché—were you nervous?"

Elizabeth grinned. "Not at first, believe it or not. You know, I've hardly ever been on time for anything in my life, but the day of the wedding I was twenty minutes early. I read somewhere a few days later how cool I was. And I guess I was, up until the time the wedding march was supposed to begin and they discovered that the organ wouldn't play. I thought, 'It's terrible—no music for my wedding.' Then someone said everything was all right. We started to walk. After a couple of steps there were frantic whispers. We backed up. It seemed ages before the organist discovered that in his excitement he'd pulled out the electric plug.

"By this time I was completely lost. I don't remember starting up the aisle. I had one hand on daddy's arm and the flowers in my other arm. My dress was long, the petticoat longer. I felt sure that I'd fall flat on my face, and I kept kicking the dress as I walked.

"The rest was a complete dream. The words seemed to come from far away. And then Nicky kissed me."

"Ah, that kiss!"

"I know, Sheilah. I know."

So did all the guests. It lasted so long they began to giggle."

Elizabeth's eyes twinkled. "This is something I haven't told anyone," she said. "I was crying a little, I guess. And when Nicky started to kiss me, well I just didn't want it ever to stop. Then I heard Monsignor Concannon murmur, 'I think that's long enough!' "

After that Liz confessed that she was jolted back into reality. She broke away from Nicky, just before they ran down the aisle, and kissed her father and mother.

So began her honeymoon.

Properly, a curtain is drawn on the memories of the next few hours as the couple was whisked off to Ocean House. Later, when the car in which they rode was returned to the Taylor home, Mrs. Taylor looked in the back seat. There was the wedding gown, one sleeve standing up straight as though there were an arm still in it.

"That," Mrs. Taylor said, her eyes glistening, "was when I realized that I had really lost my daughter. I couldn't help it. I simply broke down and cried."

Next morning, Liz and Nicky overslept. They had to rush like mad to catch the plane for the trip to Carmel. In her excitement, Liz forgot the keys for her baggage and she also left behind her blue mink coat. Somehow, when they reached the hotel they managed to get their bags open.

Miles from Hollywood with the roar of the surf outside their small hotel suite, Liz carefully unpacked her beautiful starched souffle negligee with its big white lace pockets, her nightgown of white satin with its yoke of rose point lace and the little lace nightcap which Helen Rose, head designer at Metro had made specially for her.

At last, her honeymoon seemed officially under way!

There are times when even an alert, prying reporter feels shy, and I did in asking Liz about Nicky.

"What can I say, really?" she replied. "Now I know that he's a lot more wonderful than I thought he was. He's the boss, yet he's so thoughtful and considerate, always."

As for the way Nicky feels now about Elizabeth, he's terribly proud of her as a star. He has seen all her movies, and the only time they quarreled, but gently, was when they went to see the preview of The Big Hangover. Elizabeth thought she played the society girl in too snooty a manner. She doesn't believe that rich people are essentially snooty and during the film she had arguments with Norman Krasna, the director, over how the part should be played. Nicky, in this instance, more or less sided with the director, pointing out that she played it just right, going a little overboard to make the character strong. He does not, however, intend to fall into the same trap other husbands of stars have. He just wanted Liz to know that so far as he is concerned she's perfect.

FUNNY thing about the way Elizabeth feels about her man. She talks about him as though they have been together for years. Sometimes it is so obvious that the bride and groom do not really know each other and are ill at ease when others are around. On this particular Sunday when the honeymoon stood still for the wedding pictures, Elizabeth talked simply and charmingly about intimate details of her honeymoon.

She remembered that as a little girl she used to say to her mother, "I'll never leave you, never. Even when I marry I'll come back and live with you."

She knows now that she never will, but the love that has been between mother and daughter is the normal, natural type. It will never be upset. Every night while they were away they called Mrs. Taylor. Still, Elizabeth is gone from her family for good, that much is obvious. Before her marriage it seemed that while you talked to her she'd frequently go into a little far away trance. She wasn't "with you" all the time. Now she is.

Laughingly, Elizabeth recalled how her mother used to say to her, "Elizabeth, unless you learn to pick up your things you're going to drive your husband crazy some day."

"Mother," she exclaimed, "you'd never know it was me now, after all these years you have tried to reform me, telling me to put away my clothes, put the stopper on the toothpaste and not to squeeze it from the top. You'll be pleased to know I'm a changed woman. All that drilling finally hit the point."

"Is Nicky tidy?" I asked.

"Tidy? He hangs up everything."

"Does he do your dresses up the back?"

"Uh-huh. He buttons when I can't reach. Don't all men?"

"Tell me, did you always eat restaurant food?"

"Almost always. It's wonderful. But one night I insisted on proving that I could cook. I can't really, except fancy, ridiculous little dishes. Anyway, I like to toss off a little thing with crisp bacon and fresh tomatoes. Then I sprinkle cheese over the top. Nick thought it was perfect."

That reminded me. "We've been having terrible weather down here. So bad the Chamber of Commerce has the shudders. How was the weather at Carmel?"

"The weather." Liz giggled. "We never noticed."

That led us off to more woman talk. Elizabeth believes in double beds. "We're always going to have one," she said. "You know, the great big kind, large enough to move around in."

WHILE we talked, she skipped from subject to subject. She always cuts her own hair by holding a mirror with one hand at the back and cutting with the other. She's going to teach Nicky. Despite her beautiful wardrobe, she's going to be happy when the honeymoon is over to get back into slacks. They took along four books on their honeymoon, but didn't read them. Elizabeth confessed that she hasn't had much time for reading.

It was heartening to learn that in all of her confused, busy new found happiness, Liz still thinks of others. Before she returned from Carmel she had a charm bracelet made up for her friend, Helen Rose—and the first item on it was a gold replica of the wedding gown Helen had designed.

Nicky and Liz are camera fiends. Elizabeth has her own Leica, and on the honeymoon they spent hours in the darkrooms they could find developing their own film. Mrs. Taylor gave them a three dimensional camera (on loan) with which they are taking pictures wherever they go in Europe. The golf clubs were left in California. Nick is a near champion type man with the clubs, shooting in the low seventies, and Elizabeth insists on taking lessons before she plays with him again. They went fishing several times. To date Liz says she is one sea bass ahead of her groom.

One small disappointment was the fact that they couldn't have the bridal suite on the Queen Mary. It had already been reserved by the Duke and Duchess of Windsor. In England she visited old friends with Nicky, introducing him to her godmother and godfather, Mr. and Mrs. William Cazelett. In London they stayed at Claridges, famed as the last glamorous stopping place for exiled kings and queens.

Where will Mr. and Mrs. Nicky Hilton go next? Only they know the answer, but Elizabeth, who has driven the executives of Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer slightly batty because she waited so long to say yes or no to their offer of a beautiful new contract, gave me this tip: "When I come home I am going to do fewer pictures. I am Nicky's wife first and I always want to be able to travel with him. Because, you know, I love him." THE END circus daze!

(Continued from page 37) A few feet away, in the tiger department, Corinne and a tiger were gazing wistfully at each other. "Johnee," said Corinne to her husband, "I theenk I will geeve 'eem a piece of candy bar."

The tiger's attendant strong-armed her. "You stay where you are, lady," he said. "We keep him locked up for your health, not his."

Corinne looked hurt. "Ees not healthy?" she said.

"It's like this," John explained as he led her away. "The tiger might like your arm more than the candy bar."

Next we came to the elephants who were wearing headdresses and standing very quietly to show them off.

Yvonne approached one elephant and offered him a peanut. He turned up his trunk disdainfully. Yvonne got the idea. She emptied the whole peanut bag into her palm. The elephant came around. He didn't even want to leave us for the parade, but his trainer finally coaxed him.

We started following slowly when we heard a shout. "Tent's coming down."

I laughed. "They can't take a tent down over people's heads. Isn't that silly." Rock took my head and turned it around. Half of the canvas was already flat on the ground.

On our way to the main tent, the gentlemen bought us souvenirs. Corinne got a fluffy little fur monkey on a stick. Rock bought a whole winter's supply of peanuts. "Saves fingernails," he said.

"I'd like a whip," I said. No one heard me.

Well, we went inside, and took our seats, and I don't have to explain to you what a circus is like—all the bright lights and the color and the music. The trapeze artists swinging their lives away, and the tight-rope walkers leaving us breathless, and the trained seals playing on the xylophones. We just sat there speechless while Clyde Beatty put his wild animals through their paces. John and Corinne held hands, and Rock and Yvonne held hands, and I sat on mine.

THEN suddenly it was over and we all looked pale and tired. "I don't understand," said Corinne thoughtfully, "why they have three reengs when we have only the two eyes."

We puzzled that for a moment as we stepped outside the tent, and there were the clowns—fat, skinny, hilarious. They put on a private little show for us, but it didn't last long. "Everybody out of the way," someone shouted. "Tent's coming down."

Since there was only one tent left to come down, and that tent was still standing, we figured we stood a good chance of seeing the sideshow. It was good.

Alex Linton had packed his swords, but he got them out again. Then he swallowed them. It looked so easy.

"Healthy, too," said Alex. "My father swallowed swords, and lived to be 84."

Jose deLeon had a pet mouse and the mouse did tricks.

"Can you get that mouse to stand on its head?" I said. The mouse looked at me and scurried away. Corinne caught him. The mouse liked Corinne. John had to promise that the next white mouse he saw he'd bring home for a pet.

Between mice and snakes, I personally prefer snakes, if I have to prefer either. Barbara White was the charmer.

The snakes were huge and colorful. "Why don't you take one home?" Rock asked Yvonne. "You could use them in one of your Technicolor productions."

"If I could talk to a snake the way Barbara does," said Yvonne, "I'd think about it."

Barbara not only talked to the snakes, she charmed them—the way it said on the program—and she even scolded one of them. This particular snake kept leering at us.

"He's a new snake," explained Barbara. "He doesn't know any better."

After a while, Barbara put her snakes away. One by one she wrapped them up and packed them in a box. Out of the corner of my eye I could see the circus hands closing in on us.

"Run for your lives!" I said, starting to run.

Rock grabbed my arm. "What's the matter?" he said calmly.

"Tent's coming down!" I shouted. So we all ran—the five of us. Got out, too, in the nick of time. THE END

"I planned to do one picture, then go back to New York. You can work in burlesque no matter how you look."

But Dan listened to a friend's advice, hung on, and today, before Uncle Sam's cut and other professional expenses, Dan draws an annual paycheck that is very close to $100.000

"A man owes it to his family to get ahead and stay ahead," he says. "It isn't that money, in itself, is worth so much. But it is the security that counts.

"Suppose an actor is up against it. Word gets around. Then a producer offers him a hundred a week. It's hard to say no when you're hungry. It's too tough on the wife and kids. But if this same actor had a few dollars in the bank, the producer wouldn't dare offer him only a hundred a week, and before the deal was closed, perhaps the offer would be up to a thousand. It often happens that when you haven't got a buck, it's hard to make one."

Dan traces the responsibility for his financial independence right back to horses.

"When I first started making a little money on Broadway," Dan explains, "I was on the same spot with all the others. We could head for a joint after the show, drink too much and sit there until dawn telling each other how good we were.

"But if you are going to get up early to ride around the park, you go to bed right after the show instead of spending your money in saloons. It costs a little to hire horses, even more to board them, but what you lose on the oranges you make on the bananas, and have fun to boot. You also avoid the danger of leaving your career on some bar stool."

When Dan reached Hollywood, he found even more opportunities than in New York to become a night club habitue.

"Or," says Dan, "if I didn't want to play the boob trap line, I could play gin rummy all night with my friends. And that can cost even more."

Dan feels, too, that an actor should cultivate friends outside of his profession. "This," he said, "is equally true for men and women in any field—engineers, salesmen, garage mechanics or school teachers. It gives you a chance to learn how others think and how they live. It keeps you from believing your own profession is the most important in the world."

AFTER Dan's stretch in the army was over (it ended at the Italian front) nothing seemed to suit him in civilian life.

"Sure, I was on MGM's payroll," he says, "but I wasn't working, and even if I had been making pictures, it might not have been so good right then, because when you get right down to it, making pictures isn't the most important thing—things like staying alive, having the liberty to express your thoughts, and working to prevent another war are very important, too," he adds, smiling wryly at his own understatement.

During those postwar months when, as Dan might say, things strictly were for the birds, he and Liz decided to buy a horse.

They went to an auction in Los Angeles where the army was disposing of surplus horses from the nearby remount station. They saw one they liked, and bought him for $60.

This was an ordinary animal, with the army's surplus S branded on his jaw. But Dan and Liz knew what they were doing, and before they finished training him, he was an accomplished jumper. Liz used him for several months as she carried on her official duties as whipper-in for the local hunt club, and then they had a chance to sell him.

Dan, who seems to have inherited heavily from some Irish ancestor who horse-traded his way the length and breadth of Erin, likes to make a deal. He finally traded his $60 horse for one that had cost $1,300. Dan won't give the name of the horse he swapped; he doesn't want to hurt the new owner's chance of making a profitable deal himself some day.

Dan and Liz have made many horse trades since then, but never one they consider quite so good. "Sometimes we make a hundred," Dan says modestly, "and sometimes we lose a hundred, too."

Shortly before Dan Dailey III was born in September, 1947, big Dan and Liz became charter members of the West Hills Hunt club, which holds its hunts and point-to-point races on an 11,000-acre tract in San Fernando Valley.

Some of the club's activities are dangerous, and about once a year Dan's boss, Darryl Zanuck, feels he must dictate a letter to whoever may be Dan's director at the time, suggesting that jumping races and expensive movie-making don't really mix.

The director has yet to convince Dailey that Zanuck is right.

DAN feels he's fortunate, in many ways, that Liz agreed to marry him, and not the least of his good fortune is that Liz is such an enthusiastic and capable horsewoman. She's won as many ribbons and cups as he has, still she hasn't gone "horsey" to the extent of preoccupying herself with the sport to the detriment of her home. Dan, of course, can't spend too much time with his horses, since his work schedule leaves him only week-ends for riding.

Liz, however, does take advantage of the few hours each day when little Dan is in nursery school to exercise both her own horse, Stormy Weather, and Dan's Orange County.

So far, little Dan has had no real chance to ride—what boy has when he's less than three years old? But almost from birth, he's been around horses. Big Dan started by carrying his son into the stalls, introducing him to the horses, and demonstrating how to pet a horse, rub his ears and feel the angel-down on the nose.

"I was very happy," Dan says, "when little Dan immediately accepted the horses as his friends. It was exactly what I wanted, for I knew how much a common interest in riding had been responsible for keeping Liz close to me in our marriage, and I want all three of us to continue to enjoy this great sport together."

Little Dan is now large enough to ride his mother's horse if his father leads, and after he's had his short ride, he likes to stand and watch his parents. "Make him jump!" he yells at them. "Make him jump!"

Little Dan likes to feed the horses, too. Recently, after he had helped his father put Orange County into the stall, little Dan grabbed a chubby fist full of bleached hay and walked in beside the huge hunter, holding up his offering.

"The hay and little Dan's hair were the same color," his father explains, "and for a minute I thought Orange County might scalp the boy. But the horse worked his lips gently over the kid's blond hair, then reached for the hay. Little Dan laughed as though this were one of the nicest things that had ever happened to him."

DAN has developed another recreational interest designed to provide a common amusement area for his family. The interest is music. "Little Dan has a tin ear, though," Dan says. "Liz has a tin ear, too. Can't carry a tune in a bucket."

But Dan doesn't allow this to get in his way. He has insulated the rumpus room which is detached from the house, and many of the evenings since he took up the trombone have been devoted to jam sessions with his friends.

Liz, encouraging her husband, gave him a home recorder so that when he really wants to cut loose with his trombone, he can preserve the results for posterity—or for such portions of it that will be interested.

Although Dan is somewhat disappointed in his boy's tin ear, big Dan sees a dancing talent in his small son. "The kid's a natural," he says proudly. "I never saw anything like his rhythm. And he's only a little bit more than two-and-a-half years old."

Dan's big complaint is that he has so little time to spend with his son. Fifty weeks out of the year he works six days a week.

One morning this past spring, young Dan got up earlier than usual, and was standing by the yard fence, wearing his Hopalong shirt and his shooting irons, when his father started to leave the house for the studio.

"Where you going?" little Dan demanded, drawing a gun.

"To work," said his father.

"You think so?" said little Dan, drawing his other gun.

"Yeah, I got to," big Dan said, somewhat desperately.

"Why do you got to?"

"If I don't go to work, you won't have anything to eat."

Little Dan squinted up at big Dan and lifted the left corner of his upper lip. "I'm not hungry."

SO now Dan is preparing for the time when he won't have to go to work. Almost since he and Liz married, they've wanted a ranch where they could develop their own strain of hunters.

Dan spotted such a place, but after careful thinking changed his mind and put the money into a large annuity instead.

"But Liz and I will have our ranch some day," Dan says. "We have our eye on just the place—about four and a half acres. We could use the house that's on it, and it wouldn't cost much to build a small stable. Then we could deduct from taxable income the costs of oats, the price of hay and the expenses of keeping up the fences—if we were really raising horses commercially."

How important it may someday be for Dan to have an income from horses is problematical. With his stocks, his annuities and an apparently unfailing popularity at the box office (his latest hit is When Willie Comes Marching Home) it seems unlikely that he ever will be short of money.

"But money comes and money goes," said Dan. "Many men have made millions then died broke. That's why I want a place where little Dan can learn that when the going gets tough, when it seems that everything is complicated beyond all reason, he can get on a horse and shake him loose—put him across a few ditches, over a fence or two. He'll find, as I have, that it's good for what ails him."

Take his latest movie, The Big Lift. In it, he plays the part of Sergeant Kowalski, an air force technician. Was he convincing? Well, there's the testimony of two U. S. Army M. P.'s stationed at Templehof Airdrome in Berlin, where the film was made last fall.

One afternoon Paul was wandering around the airport in uniform, his collar unbuttoned, when the two M. P.'s came upon him. They promptly arrested him for violating dress regulations. Not until William Perlberg, the producer, and George Seaton, the director and writer of the picture were summoned would the soldiers believe that Paul was just an actor and not an enlisted man.

"Does he really look like a sergeant?" the picture executives asked happily.

"Look like an army sergeant!" burst out one of the M. P.'s. "He looks like a thousand sergeants I've seen in this man's army!"

It takes a fellow whose actions are based on natural instincts at all times to be as convincing as this, which is probably Paul's secret. For a guy like him you've got to present stories which are believable and make sense in today's world. Hollywood is just getting around to doing just that.

WHAT those Army M. P.'s didn't guess is that Paul can also look like a bank vice-president, an oil-rigger or just your big Uncle Charlie. To his mother, when he was about nineteen, he looked like a fine prospect for a doctor or a lawyer. Paul became a radio announcer, instead. Everybody said he didn't look like an announcer until he started earning a thousand a week a few years later handling big time programs—Jack Benny's, Fred Allen's, the Fred Waring show and Burns and Allen's. Then they saw the resemblance.

But by this time Paul was way ahead of them—he was wondering whether he looked like an actor. He wanted to go on the stage.

"No!" he was told by all, including his best friend, Toots Shor, aggressive owner of a popular Manhattan restaurant who has given some of his customers the loudest advice they've ever heard.

So Paul wangled himself into the star part of Born Yesterday and proved to the tune of 1,024 performances that his pals were wrong again. That's when Hollywood, which had previously tested him and marked him impossible, decided that nobody knew as much about Paul Douglas' talent as Paul Douglas himself, and if he considered himself an actor there must be something to it. A Letter to Three Wives, It Happens Every Spring, Everybody Does It and The Big Lift, are samples of what there was to it.

Paul was no laggard in his personal life around New York, and Hollywood didn't change his habits. A few months ago Paul walked into Romanoff's in Beverly Hills and fell in love with a girl sitting with his agent, Louis Shurr. Her name was Jan Sterling and while Mr. Shurr was paying the check, Paul took Jan's arm and walked her out of the place. People who were present at the time say the agent looked around for Jan and Paul, shrugged his shoulders philosophically when he realized what had happened, and then sat down again to read his newspaper. Greater love has no agent, says Hollywood, but that he give up his gal to one of his clients.

In justice to Paul for this ungentlemanly behavior it should be reported that he and Jan were not exactly strangers; that is to say, each bore an unusual relationship to the other although they had never met. All the time he was on Broadway playing the role of Harry Brock, the heel in Born Yesterday, Jan was playing the part of Billie Dawn, Brock's dumb girl friend, but not in New York. She was in the Chicago and road company of the some play. They got reports of each other and friends who saw both companies would describe how each acted and talked, so now it was almost as if they had known each other for years.

THEY had a lot to discuss. It started with the show and ended with themselves. This in turn wound up with a diamond bracelet for Jan, and an announcement that they were going to be married.

Somebody, curious about how Paul would go about a proposal, asked him when and how the wooing took place. He replied that it happened aboard Humphrey Bogart's boat, the Santana, one weekend.

"You know Bogart," said Paul. "He doesn't like to have his craft messed up so he doesn't allow any fishing aboard it. There being nothing else to do I proposed to Jan and she accepted me. I went and reported to Bogart about it but he told me not to come running to him with my troubles."

A lot of his friends didn't take the announcement of his engagement seriously and tried to get him out on dates where he would meet other girls. He refused. "I wouldn't dare," he told them.

"You mean you're serious about Jan?" he was asked.

Not even two words of his reply could possibly be printed but the idea of it was that there is nothing more serious in his life. The fact that they were married on May 12 by Superior Judge Edward Brand seems to bear this out.

Having lived in hotels most of his life he rented a little house when he first came out to Hollywood. He promptly had to leave it and go travelling around the country on location trips. Eventually, after returning from Berlin, he gave up the house and moved into the Bel Air hotel. "Hotels are more permanent," was his explanation, meaning perhaps that hotels are where he always winds up.

With his marriage, however, he intends to get a home again even though he is a bit pessimistic about ever being able to live in it for any length of time. "With my luck Jan and I will buy a house, and then go away," he says.

When he's in Hollywood he turns up at the studio regularly whether he's shooting a picture or not. He's ready to discuss roles, read scripts or generally make himself useful. Evenings he likes to dine at the home of friends in preference to restaurants. Outside of driving a fast car and buying, not always wearing, loud neckties, he has no particular hobbies. He used to play golf but quit twelve years ago in the presence of Bing Crosby, Frank Parker and Bill Goodwin, who swear they will never forget the scene.

THE four of them were playing Lakeside (Paul was announcer for Burns and Allen then in Hollywood) and Paul, who was more strong than adept at the game, was spraying the countryside with wild shots. After holding up play most of the afternoon he grabbed his bag of clubs, and was about to throw it into a pond when he saw his caddy's horrified face.

"I suppose you'd rather I give them to you," he snapped at the boy.

"I sure would," the boy said.

Paul slung the clubs toward the boy and yelled, "Take them! And never let me see them or you again!"

The boy obeyed. Paul turned and walked off the course never again to tread on another one to this day.

These days he isn't seen in night clubs either, or at gay private affairs. He doesn't think the night life of Hollywood compares even remotely with New York's doings. One night a friend saw him driving along the boulevard and hailed him to a stop.

"Ah-ha!" said the fellow. "Out for a big time, eh?"

Paul reached down beside him and picked up a letter. "Yeah," he replied disgustedly. "I've been driving around for a half hour looking for a mail box."

The fact that his friends were not exactly cooperative in Paul's new bid for domesticity, was merely a tipoff on what they think of him as a companion. They miss him. He may not always be pleasant, he has a temper, yet there is no meanness in him, and everything he says or does stems from a heart that is warm and sentimental. There probably isn't a person he knows, who hasn't seen him roar angrily at times. But by the same token, not one of them has ever suffered ill luck without Paul offering a helping word and hand.

Not all the stories about Paul are to his credit, but almost all of the unfavorable ones can be traced back to disgruntled people who never said more than "hello" to him before he made good and are irked because he doesn't let them say more than this now.

During the filming of one of his pictures he got to dislike one of the other stars who, he felt, was too much of an eager beaver in front of the camera. Word got around to this fellow and he sought Paul out to apologize.

"I was wrong," he said. "But you'll have to forgive me. I guess I'm just nervous about making good. I can't stand the thought of failure. You see, when I was a boy, I was terribly poor."

Paul snorted. "Who wasn't?" he asked.

The other stared. "You mean . . ." he began. Paul cut in. "I mean, who wasn't? I didn't have what with when I was a boy. Ask ninety-nine out of a hundred people, stars or anybody else and you'll find it's the same story. If people can give that for an excuse for acting the way you do then we'd all be cutting each others' throats!"

Some of Douglas' friends think he's casual about Hollywood but the fact is that he takes his career quite seriously. There are two reasons. One: he likes the money. "Why should I kid anybody about that?" he asks. "Try and make a picture here with actors who don't care for money and you'll find yourself with a cast of palm trees."

The other reason is that he's beginning to believe he can be useful in pictures. "There are good writers here, good directors, and they've got something to say on the screen. If I can help them say it, there's nothing else I can do as worthwhile."

He makes this last statement with a bit of wonder in his voice. As big and strong as he is, as confident as he sounds about most things, when he sees himself in pictures he's embarrassed. As a result he's stopped looking at rushes of him alone.

"At least, in a completed picture, I can look at the other people in it and maybe feel that with them I'm making a little sense up there," he says.

He's making more than a little—and there are two ways of telling—by the look of his wallet, and by the look of the people who put down their popcorn when Douglas' mug is on the screen. THE END

"Know what, Dick?" said Governor Mcath. "Good thing you're not running gainst me in the election."

The sirens and the limousine stopped front of Pat Mehaffy's home. Mehaffy a prominent attorney in Little Rock, nd one of Dick's oldest friends. They even ent to grammar school together.

"This is my wife," said Dick Powell, resenting June.

"And this is my wife," said Pat Mehaffey, resenting Kate.

June rested in the Mehaffeys' home, here they were to stay, and then while ıey were unpacking, June said, "You're oing to be very angry with me, darling."

"Are you sure?" Dick said.

"Yes, I'm sure. You know my purse. Vell, I left my purse in Texas."

Dick called up Texas, and they put the ırse on a plane. Then Dick rushed off help rehearse the Little Rock Boys Glee lub for the première. (Dick's a lifetime ember of the club, and he promised to onate the première's proceeds to it so ıey could build a baseball park.) After ıat he went to a press conference at the otel Marion. Then he was off to judge a ower show.

Later June met him and they attended a ncheon, and sang for the guests and eeted old friends. That night the preière was held. Everyone in town showed for it. There was a little ceremony bere the picture was shown. Governor Mcath made June a legal citizen of Arkansas ith the right to vote. And the ovation she ceived made her eyes bright with tears.

HAT night before going to sleep, Dick said to her, "If there's a town in this nd with greater hospitality, I haven't scovered it."

And June, holding her eyelids open with er fingers, said, "You know, honey, if ere's a man with greater vitality, I ıven't discovered him," and she fell leep. Dick sat up a while, and gloated. Actually, Dick's vitality would be artling in someone half his age. On e Powells' recent trip to Palm Springs, hich Dick planned as a rest after he and ne had finished making Right Cross, ey played eighteen holes of golf in the orning. Lunch followed, and then a tired d blistered June suggested an afternoon Canasta.

"But I'd thought about some tennis," ck said.

"Oh, brother!" said June, and sat in the n, while her husband ran through three ts of tennis and leaped into the swimming ol.

It's even worse when he's working. He's the studio at eight, six days a week, d comes home at seven. He has a dio show, "Richard Diamond," on ednesday, for which there are rehearsals, d he indulges in all sorts of business ntures on the side. He keeps an office town and June would get lost trying keep up with it.

One day she'll see a new heater in his essing room and remark about it. "They e nice, aren't they?" Dick will say. "I ught the company last month."

A few days later, June will tell him, inah Shore was here today and she's zy about that new heater. Could you get her one?"

"I guess so. I sold the firm on Monday, but I think I can arrange it with the new owner."

Every once in a while June sees to it that he relaxes. She does it subtly; she phones her friends—the Leonard Firestones, for instance, and suggests that they invite the Powells for dinner some evening. The Firestones are obliging, the evening arrives and when Dick comes home June says gaily, "We have a half hour to get ready."

"For what?" asks Dicks, who's been planning to read scripts in bed.

"We're having dinner at the Firestones. I can't help it, Richard—they just insisted that we come."

Dick raises an eyebrow and stares her down. "Is this the same trick you pulled with the Cagneys last week?"

"I don't know what you mean," she says loftily, and in a half-hour they're over having dinner with the Leonard Firestones.

IN Little Rock, they had dinner with lots of people—old friends, mostly, who knew Dick when he lived on Schiller Avenue. They dined at the Governor's mansion, and June got dewy-eyed over the Governor's three children.

Pat Mehaffey drove them into Memphis, Tennessee, to the Tennessee Children's Home, the place they'd gone to adopt Pamela. Now they planned to adopt another child. Mrs. Alma Walton took them through the home, and they stopped to talk to dozens of little kids. "Are you going to take me with you?" one of the little boys asked Dick, and Dick looked helpless. "Let's stay a while longer," June kept saying. "We'll have to go," Dick finally announced, as he sat down with a little girl on his lap.

They stayed a while, and when they left, they promised to come back again soon, and they meant it.

They had to leave Little Rock, too, the morning after a wonderful ball at the Robinson Memorial Auditorium.

"I make a motion," said June to Dick.

"Namely?"

"I make a motion we go by train. If you don't pass the motion, I'm not going home."

So at 10:45 Sunday night, a crowd gathered at the railroad station to say farewell.

June stood in the open door of the train, and said, "Dick and I were real proud of you and the wonderful time we've had, and we'd like to sing you a song. As the train pulled out they stood in the open doorway and sang in hillbilly voices, "Have We Told You Lately That We Love You?"

And that was the end of the trip to Dick's hometown. But that isn't the end of the story.

One night, a few days later, when Dick came home, June said to him, "Remember how sick I was on that plane?"

"Remember?" said Dick. "I thought you were gone forever."

"That's right," said June happily. "Only it wasn't the plane—it was the baby."

"The what!"

"The baby, our baby, the baby we're going to have in December."

"Oh, that baby," said Dick, as he floated into a chair. Then he jumped up. "Our baby!" he shouted. "You mean you're going to have a baby? You mean I'm going to be a father?"

June nodded her head.

"Are you all right?" she asked.

"I don't know," said Dick. "Who am I?"

She told him, and he was a very happy man.

Frank Sinatra was the most dazzling meteor to flash across the show business horizon in decades. I couldn't guess how many millions his swoon personality dragged in.

Today he's lost his picture contract and his radio job. He was recently cancelled out of a personal appearance at London's Palladium. He didn't complete an engagement at the Shamrock Hotel in Houston, nor the next at Broadway's Copacabana. He's closed his office in Hollywood. But, apparently, Frankie can't come to his senses and shake off the wandering urge which has been a big part of his downfall.

The break that happened to Frank Sinatra and the king's ransom rewards it brought can never come again—but what does he have to show for it all? The din of bobby-sox screams turned Frankie's head away from the greatest asset he had —ten times more valuable than the fabulous money rolling in—his sensible, loyal and loving Nancy. It was when Frank started playing around with all Hollywood's glamor girls that he started stumbling. It wasn't over-expanding his talents that threw him, it was over-expanding his heart—and in the wrong direction.

I'm convinced that despite Frank Sinatra's foolish handling of his career and his finances he could have saved the pieces with Nancy's help. Frankie lived up to his income, it's true, without remembering that each March 15 there was a tax remittance due. He bought a big house in Toluca Lake, did it over several times, then bought a bigger one from Gloria McLean (now Mrs. Jimmy Stewart) which Gloria told me she was the luckiest girl in the world to get rid of; it was so big and the taxes were so high. He sank over $100,000 into a Palm Springs villa, went hog wild buying high priced modern paintings, scattering his money all over like a child strewing candy, because he was just a kid from across the tracks and didn't have the balance to handle such fabulous fortune when it hit him. But Nancy had her head screwed on right and it was only when he dumped that pilot that he hit the rocks and started sinking.

It may be too late to get Nancy back. She loved him through four or five wanderings and patted his naughty head officially a time or two to forgive the boy she used to love. If Frank himself had any sense he'd be working like a beaver to patch the dam of his empire which has burst with a quick and emptying deluge, because that's all he's got. Meanwhile whatever is left of his tangible assets Nancy will have—the houses and all—as she should, although my guess is that she and the three kids won't have enough to take care of them as they might have been. As for what Frankie's end for himself will be—at the present rate of Hollywood love exchange—I'd hate to predict!

But the giddy ganders who go gallivanting off to cozy new nests somehow can't believe that the golden eggs are ever going to stop rolling into their laps. Right now Kirk Douglas has prospects unlimited and he may make himself a million dollars in the next ten years, for all I know. But also Kirk has just cinched on a respectable load to carry in that unpredictable race. When his wife, Diana, divorced him last February, he agreed to pay her $1000 a month until her death or remarriage. Also $550 a month to support their sons, Michael, five, and Joel, three, until they're both twenty-one. Diana got the house and ten percent of all Kirk makes over $120,000 a year. Kirk will have to sharpen his pencil and do some close financial figuring from now on to marry again.

Tyrone Power was considerably lighter —by a mansion, three cars, insurance policies and bank accounts—when Ty floated from Annabella's arms into Lina Christian's. Whatever Annabella makes as an actress, Ty must add enough to make $50,000 a year, as long as he earns $260,000 per annum. If he earns more than $310,000 he pays Annabella 17 per cent of the with a maximum of $87,500 yearly. And that's a lot of money, over and above taxes these days.

Ty had to tie himself up in those tight money knots to pursue his straying affections—at a time when he was the bonnie prince of Twentieth Century-Fox and his box-office draw was a beautiful thing to behold. It isn't so beautiful as it once was since Prince of Foxes and The Black Rose, two terrifically expensive pictures which aren't paying off enough, and Ty isn't any younger. He has a baby on the way, and his Hollywood home today is a small one. It wouldn't surprise me if he's living on less than he still pays to Annabella. He'll have to, to hold on to what's left of his fortune.

But fortunes can fade mighty fast under the beatings they take from fickle tickets. Humphrey Bogart split all he'd saved with and a goodly hunk besides when he discarded Mayo Methot to marry Lauren Bacall. "Sluggy" as he called her, lived up to her name by putting the settlement slug on Bogey, when he bounced her. Luckily, Bogey has a fantastic fifteen-year contract with Warners which will keep himself, his fourth wife, and little Junior comfortable, although Bogey's box-office value is not what it used to be, either.

Even Mickey Rooney's cocky swagger has been crimped considerably by his expensive excursions to the altar. Mickey's stuck with Ava Gardner, his first, bare over a year but the months of wedded bliss set him back Ava's slice of his $200,000 community property stake. Next trip with Betty Jane Rase, cost Mickey a little more—$100,000 alimony, to be exact, over ten years, and $5000 yearly to feed and clothe their two children, Mickey, Jr. and Timothy, plus $25,000 to buy them a new home. Undaunted, the Mick now owns his third bride. Luckily everybody isn't Mickey Rooney.

For instance, there is a barrel-chested brute named Victor Mature. A very mixed up character to start with, Vic has settled down into one of the canniest stars and the other day he proved it. his first two marriages, with Frances Charles and Martha Kemp, Vic trotted away with minor financial scars, mainly because he had very little himself. However, when his third wedding waltz with Dorothy Berry, the Pasadena society girl turned shaky, Vic found himself slightly more vulnerable.

Mrs. Mature III had a very good idea of just what worldly goods Vic had—his home, two autos, several bank accounts and a TV business earning $38,000 annually, besides his weekly salary of $27,000 and the $25,000 he draws each twelve months from stocks and bonds. The general idea was that all of this would be Vic's exclusively for very long. And the state of agitation this induced in Sandson was so violent, that Dottie Mature also got a restraining order keeping him from "burning down their home" as he threatened rather than let her have it.

Well, Vic and his wife are reconciled now and what's more he's built her a brand new mansion because she didn't like the one he had intentions of arsoning on. I'm sure Vic really loves his wife and happy to ease back into matrimony hich he's often said "is the only life." t he loves a dollar too, especially sev- al thousand of them, and when he faced eing them walk away—well, Vic recon- lered. Or, you can put it this way: He uldn't afford to wander.

Now, why do the stars' flighty affaires coeur ring out so loud on the court cash gister? Why do they pay all that money? it all on the up and up—or is it a cket?

First off, they don't pay unless they've t it. When Paul Douglas took unto him- f beautiful blond Jan Sterling, Jan be- me the fifth Mrs. Douglas. Four times fore Paul swore everlasting love and ar times something happened. But noth- g serious—to his bank account, that is, cause he didn't have any worth men- ning in Hollywood terms. This time it's ferent; Paul's in the money and on the ot, if ever he and Jan decide to part, hich I hope they never do. This time it ll better be for keeps, or else that bo- nza Mr. Douglas has struck in his mid- years might well go a-glimmering.

UT there are almost automatic reasons for paying in California. There's a v, a community property law: Half of ne is mine. When Louis B. Mayer and wife, Margaret, were divorced three ars ago after almost 43 years of mar- ge, the MGM mogul paid her $3,250,000. ark Gable settled $250,000 on his sec- d wife, Rhea, which it took him years pay, and that's one reason why the ng isn't weighted down with half the cheques people credit him with. This so despite his $7500 every Saturday ht and his place on the MGM pension which ought to realize him at least ,000 a year whenever he decides to re- e.

But there are other subtle reasons that ure in the fantastic back-breaking Hol- wood settlements, too.

Every star fears public opinion, because t's the grace by which he lives and xes rich. And tell me what couple ve—in Hollywood or anywhere—could sh their linen in public without some t showing up? If they're caught in love uble, it's just more sensible to pay off h as little fuss as possible. There are ually children involved, too, and even most trifling bumbling bee flitting from e honey to another has a soft spot for kids. Errol Flynn, for instance, is zy about all three of his, and he's won- ful to them; money for them he doesn't grudge.

But sweet reason and sober sense fly t out the window the minute Cupid s his arrows in, sugar tipped or poi- ed, as the case may be. Ingrid Berg- n would be a pauper today and totally pendent on Roberto Rossellini if her Hol- wood lawyer, Greg Bautzer, had obeyed love tormented client's instructions.

Give him everything I have in the rld," were Ingrid's anguished orders. ust want my freedom."

But I simply couldn't do it," Greg ex- ined to me. He couldn't because he w the time would come, and soon, en Bergman wouldn't have a red cent ive on. As it is, after months of hag- g, horrible months which inexorably ught Ingrid the most mortifying fate t can come to a self respecting woman, Peter Lindstrom who held all the mps, is getting half of her $250,000- s fortune—every penny of which Ingrid ned herself, and her Beverly Hills ne. And she is to receive the earnings n her last three pictures, Joan of Arc, er Capricorn and Stromboli, if and en there are any. Everything else she's —her career, her good name, her daughter, Pia. I sometimes wonder if Ingrid's impulsive solution wasn't the best after all to the dilemma on which her rash love crucified her. If she'd paid off her embittered and grasping spouse at once, even though it broke her, at least she wouldn't have had her name dragged through the mud of the whole wide world.

So the woman can pay, and pay—if she's the Mrs. Moneybags and finds another handsome hero who makes her swoon. The sting is just as painful to either sex. Rita Hayworth was painfully pruned of her life's savings when her first husband, Edward Judson, bowed out. Besides large hunks of preferred stock, bank accounts and such they divided the automobiles, jewelry, furs, and even two railroad tickets to New York! Rita further signed up out of court to pay Eddie $12,000 cash at $500 a month and when she forgot to pay, Eddie promptly garnished her Columbia studio salary to prove he wasn't kidding.

So today, financially, Princess Rita finds herself leaning on her husband, the Prince, as a wife undoubtedly should, for support. Only Aly Khan leans, in turn, on his diamond studded poppa, the Aga Khan, and it's not at all certain he'll inherit all the payments and privileges due Mohammed's official heir. Besides, Aly has a weakness for betting and big league games of chance. Knowing Rita, I know she'd like nothing better than her own money rolling in as it used to, some cash in hand of her own for her pretties. But after paying the bills for both Eddie Judson, Orson Welles and assorted heart sprees, where is it? Gone with the windy protestations of love and affection she was always a sucker for.

WHEN William Grant Sherry, Bette Davis' artistic third mate, crashed a studio party at RKO a while back, didn't like what he saw, and sent his fists flying, Bette swore that was the end. But when she swears out her divorce complaint she may well add some new cuss words under her breath, too. Because, the price of Sherry around the house came fairly high. Bette bought them the loveliest castle she could find in Laguna Beach, her husband's home town, hanging over the blue cove where Sherry loved to surf. She bought another big one in town. She presented him with an expensive trailer, bought an airplane, and all kinds of tokens of her love and esteem, including a set of psychiatric treatments, three times a week at thirty bucks an hour, to cure her husband's "ungovernable temper." But they obviously didn't work and when the property settlement is over, Bette may find herself with a Sherry hangover more lasting and distressing than her upsets watching Basher Bill blow his top.

It's funny what money can do to people. Seems I've heard it called the root of all evil. But is there any fool-proof way for the Hollywood Romeos and Juliets to dilly-dally with love and skip out of the love bower scot free? No.

If you're a cagey beau like Peter Lawford, who never gets involved, you don't find the expense too exhausting. Sometimes, too, if you're an amiable adventurer, like George Sanders, you can breeze fairly easily out of one marriage into another where there are benefits of former alimony settlements.

BUT for normal stars—if there's any such animal—there's only one answer to eating a piece of love cake and having the dough to pay for it too—and it's the simplest answer in the world. To wit: talking straight from the heart when they promise to love, honor and cherish until death do them part. Staying married, and staying out of trouble. It's the one-girl guys and the one-guy girls in the main who live longest as stars in Hollywood and have plenty to make life rosy when those enduring young charms mellow and fade.

When Gary Cooper recited his marriage vows he meant them. Today he has everything a man could want, a beautiful wife, a lovely daughter, and a career that's still booming along.

Or take Fred MacMurray, one of the very richest men in Hollywood, a real estate magnate besides a very top-salaried star, still—and still the same wife. Today Fred has his happy family in the gorgeous home Margaret Sullavan sold when she divorced producer Leland Hayward after eleven years of marriage and three beautiful babies. Look, too, at a few other well-off one-time winners at love—like Jimmy Cagney, Fred Astaire, Joel McCrea, George Murphy, Bill Holden, who's quietly raising his three swell kids, piling up annuities for their education instead of new "mamas" for their bewilderment, insecurity and sadness. Bill's paying attention to his work instead of a gallivanting libido—and a performance like his Sunset Boulevard comes in—instead of sheriff's writs and attachments!

Gosh—I could go on all night—right up to Granddaddy Cecil B. DeMille, another one-woman man, all his forty-o Hollywood years, rich now in real esta bank directorships, children, and gran children, prestige and movie profits th still roll his way—but never a cent fri tered away on alimony.

So let the stars with wandering ey cast them first on the alimony bill, a see how paying it has wrecked and w continue to wreck the lives and livings their fellow-men.

There's a tune I like to hum from Sou Pacific—"I'm in love, I'm in love, I'm love . . . with a wonderful guy!" It's tune some Hollywood ladies whose hear melt like butter have been singing f ages—long before it was written by Rod ers and Hammerstein. But, too often, t time that their guy looks most wonderf is when he's in court signing over h life's blood, because he foolishly let it g too hot and it rushed to his crazy-bon which sadly and unwisely he mistook f his heart!

The first impression you get as you step into the large entrance hall is one of limitless space. In this day of high construction costs where every square foot costs money, the mere existence of unused floor space is a luxury. In the Crosby pre-war house there's a lot of this sort of luxury. The halls are unusually wide; the doorways have double doors; the ceilings are over eleven feet high. The windows stretch from floor to ceiling, and the circular stairway (with a bannister fit for sliding) extends for two dozen steps.

Bing claims that when you have boys you either farm them out or get a house where they can grow and expand. "I've managed to do both," he explains.

During the summer the boys work on the cattle ranch outside of Elko, Nevada, and they really work regular cowboy hours and regular cowboy duties. They're paid small salaries. The rest of the year they go to school and spend what spare time they have in Holmby Hills.

Next to comfort or maybe because of it, Bing loves old, beautiful furniture. In fact, he collects antiques. He's not a stickler for any particular period or country. He simply buys what's pleasing to his eye. "After all," he says, "I'm the guy who has to live with the stuff and I'm the guy who pays for it. Dixie and I buy what we like even though the experts might not classify the stuff as exactly correct. Who cares, anyway?"

ALL the bedrooms are furnished in 18th century English pieces. The living room, however, is a harmonious mixture of French provincial lamps, a Louis XVI desk, a Queen Anne card table and modern fabrics. If anyone tells you that you shouldn't mix period furniture, just refer them to the picture of the Crosby living room, as well-furnished and eye-pleasing a room as ever you'll see.

Dixie prefers antique pieces to modern, because, as she says, "If the tables get scratched or the pewter gets dented, it doesn't matter too much. I just polish over the spot and the piece looks better than new. Part of the beauty in antiques is the used look."

The used and useful look is what th Crosbys like. They appreciate the fin workmanship and graceful appearance antiques, but they also insist that the furniture be functional.

Bing hates floor lamps. His chronic com plaint is that they're always in the wa so Dixie has worked out several solutio to the problem. She's taken decorativ old pieces and changed them into tabl lamps and housings for indirect lightin Provincial wine-kegs, a French coffe maker, and two hurricane lamps hav been wired for electricity and light up th living room. Over the piano there hang a French lavabo which is both plant holder and light fixture. Above the Quee Anne card table is a Jacobean cabine that contains a curio collection as well a an indirect light for the game table.

Not long ago, Dixie admired a Sherato breakfast table that she'd seen in a deco rator's shop. Bing told her to go ahea and buy it. Although it was hopelessl small for the kind of farmhand's break fast that's served in the Crosby house hold, she did. It seemed a little extrava gant and impractical to her at the tim when suddenly she got the bright idea o cutting it down to coffee table height.

What was too small for a six-perso breakfast setting became a spacious coffe table on a scale with the eight-foot sofas Bing, of course, approves of this wonder fully uncluttered surface as a fine resi dence for his books and magazines. (Th moral of this is to never throw out an ol kitchen or dining room table. You ca make it do wonders by altering the to and shortening the legs.)

Few people can afford a 14-room hous with a forty-foot living room, or even on share in the Pittsburgh Pirates. But i one respect, many of us can live luxur iously—by making every part of our hom serve us.

If you love antiques, for instance, don' treat them like sacred cows. Make them work for you, as the Crosbys do, and you'l cherish them even more.

"When I get married," little Lindsay says, "I'm taking the television set with me."

"He can't kid me," says Dixie. "It's the Welsh dresser that the set's in that my boy really loves."

Since Lindsay's only twelve, Dixie can hang on to it for a while. And the house, whose future may hang in the balance, she can hold, too—hold tight with memories.

ard-shelled shelley and the perfect catch

(Continued from page 55) pool? No. re, it's nice to know people who ve a swimming pool I can use, but still isn't mine. Nothing is mine. When went to that première the other night th Farley I even had to borrow a fur at to wear."

The words streamed on in an almost arful rush. "I have a big house on Sun- t Boulevard, but there isn't much fur- ture in it. When I get my check there's rdly enough left to buy a wash rag. A g company told me I could have all the gs I wanted for free if I posed for an ad r them. The studio wouldn't let me. I n't understand such things. It's just innocent rug ad, and how I could use n."

Is this outburst a thing called "tempera- nt?" Hardly. When someone is wor- d about paying his bills and blows up, one screams temperament at him. hen someone is upset because she had d a fight with her boy friend, causing r to be snappish at the office all day, she 't publicly rebuked in newspaper col- ns. No, her co-workers realize that e's simply giving way to a normal emo- n and she'll get over it.

HELLEY needs time to get over the sub- conscious bitterness born in her during e time she was just "that Winters gal," cking around town, doing a day's work re and a day's work there, plus an erage of about ten screen tests a month. Shelley decided one day that she'd had ough. A road company of Oklahoma! s being cast. She put in a call for New rk and made a pitch.

"Is there any film on you?" she was ked.

"Film?" Shelley almost yelled. "There e tests available of me in practically ery state in the Union. I'm sure New rk must be crawling with them."

Next day Shelley had a telegram. How on could she be in New York? How on? She was ready to leave in fifteen nutes, but how could she admit that e didn't have cash for plane fare? May- she could have borrowed it, but Shelley 't the borrowing kind, so she stalled. e wired back that she was just finishing picture and would be there the follow- week.

Then she called a bus company and quired about rates. By the time she had ished two days' work at Metro she had ough for her ticket and meager ex- nses. But fate was cooking up new stacles. Her agent called and said some t things" were coming up. She was nted at Universal to do a test for A uble Life.

"Oh no! Not another test!"

"Okay," the agent said, "but this might it, and I suppose you wouldn't care to rk opposite Ronald Colman."

"That's different," Shelley said. "I'll ke the test."

"That's more like it. You have to be on between three and four tomorrow."

"Okay," Shelley agreed. "I'm working Metro tomorrow, but I should be ough early and I'll make that test—my t one—if it kills me."

And it almost did.

N THE Metro set next day Shelley sat waiting patiently for the director to around to her scene in which she had meager line to say. Finally, at 3:30 began to get really nervous. She roached the director.

"Why, honey," he said, reproachfully, u should have told me before. We'd ve taken you right away."

"Now he tells me," she moaned.

Fifteen minutes later, Shelley dashed madly out of the studio. She had forty-two cents in her pocket. Not anywhere near enough for a cab, probably not enough for a bus. She stopped the first motorist to pass by the Metro gate, with one dazzling look. By 4:15 she was at the corner of Hollywood and Vine. Now her luck at hitching ran out. She was about to shrug off the whole thing, when a voice called out, "Hi there, gal!"

Good old Lou Costello!

Shelley climbed into Lou's big car and they roared out over the pass to Universal. They arrived just as the cameras on the test stage were being locked up for the night. Shelley was hot and tired. Only a vestige remained of the makeup she had applied with such meticulous care that morning. This, she thought, is me at my all time worst.

At home she forgot about the Double Life test in her rush to get off to New York. She packed her battered suitcase and next day was sitting in the bus station, ready for the painful trek to Broadway. Hollywood they could give back to the real estate agents and the used car salesmen. She was through.

As the big transcontinental bus rolled in, a frantic figure dashed into the station.

"Wait!" Shelley's sister, Blanche Schrift, shouted. "Wait—they loved your test!"

Shelley was unmoved. "Which test?" she inquired sarcastically. "I've only made 999."

"The Universal test," Sis painted. "They think you're great. You have the part."

"Well," Shelley retorted numbly, "that's saying it different." She waved the bus on its way. "That's saying it exceedingly different."

Now she was faced with the problem of being in two places at once. Mr. Rogers expected her in New York. Mr. Universal needed her in Hollywood. And that, in case anyone wants to know, is one thing that executives know how to handle. Mr. William Goetz called his good friend Mr. Rogers and promised that if Shelley could have the script of Oklahoma! to study while she was doing the picture she'd be available immediately thereafter.

And she was, but a fact that has escaped many a delver into the life of Shelley Winters is that while she was seeing herself featured in reviews as the greatest discovery since Jean Harlow, she was at the same time sitting in a small midwestern hotel room, hundreds of miles from Hollywood. If she had told the bellhop who brought her a club sandwich after the show that she was a movie star now he would have shaken his head with understanding and refused a tip. Actresses in road shows are apt to get delusions of grandeur.

Now we are getting to the bottom of Shelley's reasons for blowing up on sets and sounding off in a manner that always causes columnists to mark her down as "difficult." Shelley has a deep rooted feeling of insecurity because the struggle has been long. Money has become the symbol of security because she had so little.

For example, Jack Warner gave a big party one night. Shelley was invited. She called up a friend. "Please come over to my house right away and look at my dress," she urged. "I'm not sure whether or not I should wear it."

The black formal was a nice enough dress but not quite the thing Shelley Winters, a new star, would be expected to appear in. Her friend didn't want to be too blunt.

"Tell you what," she suggested. "I know a shop where we can have this altered."

They jumped into Shelley's Plymouth and rushed to the shop. Shelley went into the dressing room and started pinning up seams.

"What will this cost me?" she asked, cautiously.

"Oh, about ten dollars," the salesgirl replied.

"Gee," Shelley protested. "That's sort of high."

Her friend gasped silently. To the salesgirl, Shelley was a successful actress. What she'd just said made her sound almost cheap. The friend bit her tongue, wondering whether or not to explain that Shelley hadn't become accustomed yet to the fact that she was no longer living from one pay check to the next, ever fearful, just like girls in dress shops, that the following week might bring unemployment.

At that moment the manager of the store came in. On her arm was a Ceil Chapman original. She asked Shelley to try it on. "It's only $69.95, Miss Winters, and ideal for you."

Shelley tried on the dress, turning round and round before the full length mirror, pleased with what she saw. She wanted the dress, but she was hesitant.

"Do you think I should spend the money?" she asked her friend.

The reply was firm, immediately explaining Shelley to the people in the shop. "It looks marvelous on you, Girl Star. You keep forgetting that the lean days are about over. That you just signed a contract for umphteen hundred dollars a week. Buy it. You'll kill 'em tonight."

The story illustrated how unused Shelley was to fame and fortune. She still is, although the outward evidence is nearly gone. Instead there is that madcap supercharged dynamo, and people ask, "What's she trying to prove?"

Too bad about people who don't really know, for there is no pretense about Shelley. When she makes up her mind about something she blurts out her enthusiasm.

One afternoon a buddy of hers found her floating in a swimming pool shouting happily. "Today's my birthday. Today I'm thirty. Yeee-hooo!" Any other girl who's just thirty is almost a cinch to back up and call herself twenty-five. Not Shelley.

THAT night she had a date with Bill O'Brien and because it was a special occasion she wanted to go to one of the glittering night spots, like the Mocambo.

Still, she didn't know whether Bill would like the idea. She and a friend worked out a plot. Shelley was to get a date for Bill's friend and this date was to suggest, nonchalantly, that they stop at Mocambo, and Shelley was to toss off a remark about how much she hated night clubs, "But, if it will make her happy let's go."

The thing to remember is that Shelley is not one of those charming, scheming wenches who contrives to go to the glamor spots night after night at the expense of some chump's pocketbook.

The fact is, she is the extreme opposite. Only recently she went on a beach date with a young man who, noting that his gasoline gauge read "empty," pulled into a filling station. "Fillerup," he ordered.

"Fill it up?" Shelley almost screamed. "Where do you think we're going? Five gallons will get us to Malibu and back ten times."

"What's the difference?" her date asked. "I'll have to buy it sooner or later."

"Yeah," Shelley replied, "but a buck-twenty sounds better to me than four and a half."

Kick that thought around and you'll find yourself understanding what makes the girl tick. That's more than some of her co-workers can do. They think of her as "hard-shelled Shelley," failing to realize that her bursts of so-called temperament are merely an attempt to protect her individuality.

While South Sea Sinner was being filmed, another rash of those SHELLEY WINTERS AGAIN BATTLING WITH DIRECTOR paragraphs began showing up in the columns. The reason was that the director

LIKE SHELLEY SAYS

When Shelley read that Cary Grant was shipping his car to England, she said, "I guess he's given up the idea of driving over."

When someone questioned her about her proposed trip to Paris she replied airily, "I cancelled it and went to Romanoff's instead."

A couple of days after the Liz Taylor wedding, a friend was telling her how deliriously happy the couple was. "Yeah," Shelley agreed, "and they said it would never last!"

found himself unhappy with the way Shelley was doing a singing scene. He tried to explain what he wanted. So did Shelley.

"I feel too much like Betty Grable."

"Well," the director replied, "that's about what I want."

"But I'm not a singer or a dancer," Shelley declared. "I'm a dramatic actress. I'll do my best. Even so it will turn out not Grable. Only Shelley Winters."

The heat of this small argument generated from person to person until it became magnified out of all proportion. Who's to blame? Nobody, really, except that Shelley in trying to explain her position sometimes overshoots the target. If she could relax, more of the public would grow to love her as one of Hollywood's few really sound, sane and witty girls.

NOW she's been saddled with a hard-to-handle reputation. Now she's learning that the privilege of occupying the limelight exacts its toll.

Real love is now harder to achieve than if she had remained just a minor actress. People are more difficult to meet and really know. For instance, Shelley must be more than usually cautious about accepting dates for fear of being on the receiving end of gossip barbs.

She stays home a great deal of the time. Home and Schwab's Drug Store. Drop in there sometime and you'll probably find her holding down a stool at the soda fountain, thumbing through magazines and looking at pictures of the glamorous, much sought after Shelley Winters wearing a beautiful mink stole flung casually over her shoulders as she steps out of a limousine on première night on the arm of Farley Granger.

Then you'll see Shelley put the magazine back in the rack and settle down to the soda placed in front of her, a thoughtful look in her eyes. And you'll know that she's thinking, not about her old friend, Farley, but about Bill O'Brien or his counterpart, the sort of guy she really wants to fall completely, permanently in love with if he can just have the patience to learn to understand her.

When that happens, the guy will never have it so good. THE E

he's not the man i married

(Continued from page 59) had left. And I came to the conclusion that, in a way, he was right. Although Alan and I have never had any trouble talking. (As a matter of fact, we have trouble not talking.) When I first knew Alan I guess he did have difficulty meeting strangers, particularly on interviews, because he always has been very modest and reticent about himself. He didn't feel that he was interesting enough.

I thought he had a lot to talk about because, after all, he had been a track athlete in school and had been a west coast diving champion, and he had had a series of interesting jobs. He sold cash registers and was promoted to head salesman of his district; he started as a reporter on a newspaper and was promoted to editor of his department; he worked at a hamburger stand and eventually owned one; he started as an extra hand on the set and wound up a grip; he went into radio as a bit player and eventually wound up as one of the Richfield Reporters and did leading roles. He seemed unsuccessful to himself because he had given up one job after another, because he had a burning ambition to become a successful actor. He was insecure, and therefore, shy.

TEN years have passed since the day I met Alan. I should have been aware of what was happening to him in relation to other people, but it took our Minneapolis friend to really wake me up.

Not long ago we came back from Douglas, Arizona, where we had been for some time on location for Alan's latest Paramount picture, Branded. Two incidents of our stay there, a party and an illness, stick in my mind. One evening after work quite a few members of the cast and crew dropped by our hotel room to combat homesickness. With an ease of manner that made everyone feel comfortable, Alan just took over. He seemed to find so much to talk about and he was really so entertaining that in a short while the spirit of everyone changed. I got a big kick out of watching him and realizing what a warm, good host he had become, and by being such a good host he made a pleasant evening out of one that could have been a complete bust.

When I first married Alan I thought my life with him would be very quiet and uneventful because he would want it that way, but I didn't realize what a great sense of humor he had and how much fun he had in him. Life with Alan is anything but dull because, although he protests and says how he loves peace and quiet, the minute it is quiet he dreams up something to make it exciting. However, I won't give Alan full credit for this because exciting situations always seem to seek him out, consequently our lives are anything but monotonous.

At the time that Alan had worked trying to become a successful actor, he often went hungry and as a result became very susceptible to colds. However, while on location a nasty virus flu suddenly invaded the troupe. Everyone started coming down with it. It took the average victim a week to get back on his feet and one giant of a prop man had to be sent back from location by special car. Well, Alan caught the germ one Saturday night. I was worried because I was still clinging to an old conception that he would have a difficult time throwing the germ off, overlooking the fact that he hadn't been seriously ill for years. Sunday, he was quite sick and I bustled around trying to do things for him. After a while he insisted I quit, so I did, as he seemed quite cheerful even though his fever was high and his bones aching. Four o'clock Monday morning I was horrified on awakening to find him dressing.

"Where do you think you're going?" I asked.

"On the set, of course. There's an early call," he replied.

"But you're sick!" I cried.

He laughed. "Who, me? That was yesterday."

His voice was firm, he looked chipper as a nut as he left. I lay there and marveled. The old Alan used to catch cold by as little as a five degree drop in temperature, and really have it stick for weeks. Well, he isn't that way now. He's the opposite. He gets rid of a cold today by just clearing his throat; or at least that is the way he feels about it.

A person who doesn't change doesn't grow. But when it happens to your own husband, and when it happens like it is happening to Alan, it gives one a sense of pride and satisfaction.

Alan has always been interested in the other fellow's problem, but there was a time when he couldn't do anything about it. Today one of his greatest pleasures is in trying to help other people.

ONE day one of his friends asked him, "Don't you take too much responsibility on your shoulders watching over all these men? It's nice of you, but is it wise? You're just one man and you're not giving yourself a chance to enjoy your own success."

He laughed. "Maybe you're right. I'll forget about all that now. Now what should I do first to enjoy my success? Should I just sit back and relax? After all, through great luck and good fortune my family is comfortably situated and I have more than I need. Therefore, when I try to help someone and am successful, just a little bit of their happiness rubs off on me and I don't know any other way in the world to achieve the same results." His sympathetic understanding of not only the children and me, but of our friends, is demonstrated almost daily.

We have a friend who is in radio in a middle-western city. Alan is as close to the progress of his career as he is to his own. One day he proposed to the studio that his friend be used for a part in a forthcoming picture. It wasn't a very important part and I pointed this out to Alan.

"Why don't you wait until something bigger comes along?" I asked. "Why have him come all the way out for just this?"

Alan answered thoughtfully. "The part isn't big," he admitted. "It won't mean a thing as far as picture work is concerned. And maybe, some day, there will be a better spot. But in the meanwhile, what effect will it have on his hometown radio contacts when they know he has been summoned to Hollywood for picture work? Won't his stock go up? Won't there be an immediate benefit?"

I understood. Then I found out more. Things were slow in radio and he had heard that producer calls for his friend had fallen off. The Hollywood trip would not only fill a gap gracefully but create a new demand for him. It worked out this way perfectly.

Alan's helping hand has done as much for other friends, dozens of them, almost, whose lives he follows. Some come to him for help, some get it before they even have a chance to ask because Alan has kept tabs on their situations and has seen a chance to help.

Among the people Alan does nice things for is his wife—very nice things. I don't just mean giving me a present, even if his last present to me, on my birthday, is one I won't forget for the rest of my life. (It was a dresser set with each piece bearing a picture of one of the children, and one piece, of course, with his own picture on it.) It is more than that. He does the sort of things that give an inner satisfaction which no material gift can match.

He said something about me one day while talking to a group of men and it got back to my ears via a friend. The men were discussing a new Paramount picture and one of the heads of the company declared that while it would be a success in the larger cities he didn't think it would go as well in the smaller communities. At that Alan is reported to have said, "Isn't that funny? Sue said the same thing just a few weeks ago. It seems to me that every time she expresses an opinion on a picture it is verified by one of the industry's top leaders sooner or later."

Now the point is not that I said such a thing. Maybe I did. I seem to remember that it was Alan who said it originally. Other incidents like this have happened. Some time ago he got into a hassle with me about something I didn't think he had noticed, and when he won this argument he replaced a growing disquietude in me with a feeling of solid happiness.

AFTER working closely with him on his career for a couple of years I became a little sensitive about always being with him at the studio. I got to thinking that people would talk about my tagging along all the time and I didn't like the idea at all. So little by little I tried to stop. I would invent excuses for not going with him when he went to work, or, at least, not showing up on the set if I did go. Eventually I had an excellent excuse; we started building our Holmby Hills house and I could claim that I was busy working with the painters.

That was exactly what I did tell him when I would pick him up after work nights and we drove home. And out of this came one of our rare quarrels one evening. He seemed resentful and finally came out with what he was thinking. If the new house was going to interfere with our lives that much, he declared, if it was going to keep me from the studio and meant the end of our lunching and working together as we had always done for years, why . . . he just didn't want the house. Well . . . ! Need I say that I managed to scuttle right back into the old routine without too much sacrifice on my part? When your husband makes you feel that good you can live in a lean-to with him and be happy. Which reminds me, we now spend part of our time in a lean-to on our ranch in the valley.

WHEN we bought the place it was a lot of scrubland with a cement reservoir and a long open shed where the previous owner had parked everything from his car and tools to some chicken roosts. The house, itself, had burned down to the ground.

"We'll have to build," I said. "You're busy at the studio so I'll talk to some contractors about putting up a little house."

"What's the matter with that?" said Alan, pointing to the shed.

"Live there?" I asked, not believing my ears.

"Sure . . . after we put up another wall to go with the back walls," he continued, as if it were the easiest thing in the world.

So that was how I discovered that Alan was architecturally inclined. He drew up a sketch of how the shed could be converted into a home, gave it to a carpenter, and when the job was finished we had as colorful a rustic retreat as anyone could possibly want—and a comfortable one, too.

Incidentally, that reservoir had to be dug deeper and when Alan hired some men to do the job they declared they needed a derrick to remove the debris. That put us in a fix because the ranch is hilly and no such contraption could be driven onto the property safely.

We were faced with this impasse and the men were standing around doing nothing for the money we had contracted to pay them.

"Sorry, the bank account won't stand for this," Alan remarked. "I'll have to think of something."

He did. He went to the telephone and soon a small truck loaded with pneumatic drills and equipped with an auxiliary motor to power the drills arrived. Alan took a drill, had the motor started up, and attacked the cement. It pounded through immediately. He didn't have to say a word. The men walked over to the truck, got out the other drills and went to work and broke the cement in such small pieces it could be easily removed in wheelbarrows, which they did, with Alan nonchalantly leading the parade of laborers.

"How did you happen to think of that?" I asked. He looked at me and just smiled. Then I remembered. Alan Ladd the actor was also Alan Ladd the ditch-digger once, also Alan Ladd, cash register salesman, advertising salesman, studio laborer and what not. (And he has changed a lot since then as the man from Minneapolis and I have both found out.)

But perhaps the best proof is something I had to do about this new man myself not long ago. Once I was his agent and used to help guide his career. I would go to the studios and discuss him and the sort of pictures he should get. Today I don't do this at all. Alan does it for himself. I stepped down voluntarily and against his protest, but I had a good reason. An agent should know more about the movie business than his or her client, and I felt I knew more than Alan did and could talk better than he could . . . once. But the new Alan . . . well, he knows far more than I, and can put it a lot better.

So one day I told him that he was not only not the man I had married, he was also not the original man I had agreed to represent. For this reason I declared our contract null and void. Our agency contract only, you understand. The other is for keeps.

Like so many youngsters, I was brought up on the idea of punishment if I did wrong, of hellfire and damnation.

Most of us were raised to believe these things. We were brought up to believe in a God who punishes, a God whom we are told to love but taught to fear.

When I grew up and matured, I had to unlearn all the things I had been taught. I found that I had to dig out all these old ideas on which I had been raised before I could put new ones into my mind.

How did I get rid of them? Through philosophy and through religion. To me philosophies are religions. Religion is the cornerstone of my philosophy.

THE only time a lot of us become religious is when we're unhappy, forgetting that we really need religion every day.

I read the Bible half an hour every morning before I start working. It's so important to get the day set right, and my reading of the Bible helps a great deal. I always read the 23rd Psalm, the 91st and the 121st. I get something new out of them every day.

The 23rd Psalm is perhaps the best known of these. Remember the famous lines, "Yea, though I walk through the valley of the shadow of death, I will fear no evil: for thou art with me; thy rod and thy staff they comfort me." What a world of comfort and serenity is expressed in them.

God is not only a person to me—He's a belief, an ideal. He is omnipotent and I don't think He's ever failed me in anything that was right for me. He teaches me very gentle lessons and sometimes very harsh ones. I speak of God as "He" yet very often there's a comforting influence in the power of God that can only be a motherly thing, too. He combines the qualities of a wonderful father and mother.

I believe in an after life but not in heaven, hell or purgatory. We go on and have to learn whether in this life or the next. I'm so busy worrying about this one—trying to make this a good, full and happy one—I don't think much about what happens afterwards. But I don't believe in a God of vengeance and punishment. God isn't cruel. He's good and kind. Do you think He'll say, "You did this. I'll strike you down for it." No—those would be the thoughts of an angry child, not of an omnipotent, benevolent God.

I believe in immortality—not in spiritualistic meetings and seances—but in the survival of good. You won't find me holding hands under a table with the idea of summoning up the spirits of the departed. If I hold hands under the table, it will be with people who are vital and alive, for altogether different reasons. But I do believe that all good lives forever, regardless of whether we carry it around in our bodies or it lives after us.

I DON'T feel for one minute that Norbert Lusk, the magazine editor who was a very good friend of mine, is dead. There were so many good things about him, and those are the only things I can remember. It's the good that lives with every person that's passed on. Good, I think, can never die.

I correspond all the time with people who were friends of Norbie's. There are three whom I have never met, but who wrote me after his death. If ever we do meet, it won't be like meeting stranger because we all knew Norbie, there warmth and friendship among us—an that's life.

Norbert Lusk was so wonderful tha everyone whose life he touched was th better for it. When he lost his job on magazine, I wrote him that it was th magazine's loss, and wished him grea success in whatever he did. Up to tha time he had disliked me as a person. H had been disappointed in me because was not like the girl he'd seen on th screen in Our Dancing Daughters. Bu after I wrote to him wishing him happines and success, we became the closest c friends.

I know how he must have felt when h lost his job on the magazine. I know wha it means to be in trouble and have ha the people you've known walk away fro you. At times like that, I found comfor through my faith in God.

I pray every day. I pray as I think. Be cause I study my Bible in the mornin before I start the day, the thoughts I nee and the help I need come to me durin the day when I need them. I pray con stantly during the day. Each new inciden is met by prayer.

GOD, I know, guides me into the experi ences I should face. Whenever I hav learned enough to face a new experience I experience it. Sometimes I run awa from it, but it comes after me. Now I'v reached the point where walking into nev experiences is fun. I still break out in cold sweat now and then, but usually say, "I bet I can," and regard new prob lems as a happy challenge.

Lots of people, I know, who are ver religious, never go to church, never seem ingly pray. But they have powerful phi losophies formed through their study o nature or through poetry, for most grea poets are philosophers.

However, for myself, I gain great com fort from going to church. When I wall into church and see hundreds of peopl there, I am warmed by the feeling tha like myself, they must have had difficult getting there. Perhaps they worked lat the day before or had children to take car of that morning. But knowing the inspira tion they would find in the church o their choosing, they came. When I se them, I realize the need of religion fo everyone in the world. I see them com out with their faces alive. I send my chil dren to Sunday school for the same kin of inspiration.

At home, I teach my children about th privilege of giving and sharing—not jus material things, but the giving of time, o oneself, of a happy face. At night, if on of the children is pouting, I say, "Anyon who hasn't a happy face can go to hi room till he feels better."

A happy face is giving. It's the giving o joy.

When the children and I walk down street, we count the happy faces. W count the unhappy faces, too. I say to th children, "Watch their bodies, too. Watc the way they walk. When you're happy you look it; you live it; your happiness i in every motion of your body." The wa some people slump down the streets is dead giveaway. It's a great pity, too. Go meant us to be happy. We were created to create and to give.

ALL giving is really selfish in a sense because the giver derives so much happiness from it. I remember how much happiness I got when I gave Jeanne Lei ber, my hairdresser and loyal friend, French poodle she had wanted for years When Pierre, the French teacher at Chris tina's school, had five puppies to dispos of, I bought a French poodle for Jeanne. I called her several times that day, but was unable to reach her. I sent her three telegrams, which said, "Come and get it." There was no answer. I couldn't understand. Finally I reached her through Mary Benny. She had moved that very day.

When she called me I said gaily, "Come and get it."

"Come and get what?" she asked.

"Your dog is here. Your French poodle. Didn't you get my telegrams?"

She hadn't. She was so excited, she dropped her dinner dishes.

When she came to get her dog, she cuddled it in her arms. She cried with happiness. So did I.

I have found that it is fun to try to do things for others, to try to follow the Golden Rule. It's a toughie, too. What wonderful people we would be if we all followed it and lived up to our faith in God and God's faith in us.

As hard as I try, I never live up to half of my religious beliefs. I shall never stop trying as long as I live. THE END

Anyone who knows Sinatra even slightly knows how fantastic that story is. From time to time The Voice may suffer from melancholia and feelings of persecution, but to take his life because of a girl—this borders on the ridiculous and completely disregards the existence of Frank's sizable ego. The only one he would ever commit suicide for is himself.

He is not the kind of lover who pursues a girl merely for the sport. He does not believe in throwing his ardor away. His love must be returned, and it is safe to assume that Ava has returned it.

WHY else would a man renounce $5,000 a week from MGM? Why else would a man disobey his doctor's orders and fly from Florida to Spain (accompanied by Jimmy Van Heusen) to see his girl? Why else would a man leave his wife and three children, endanger his career, jeopardize his future, alienate his fans? Not merely for the masochistic pleasure of having a beautiful brunette rebuff him. No, sir.

You can rest assured that Ava Gardner loves Frank Sinatra as much as he does her.

All this idiotic talk about Ava loving Mario Cabre, a Spanish actor and part-time bullfighter, is so much hogwash. Cabre may be madly in love with Ava—so are a thousand other guys—but Ava knows that all these impassioned confessions of love make excellent publicity.

When Sinatra was in Spain dining with Ava, and she had a few days away from Pandora and the Flying Dutchman—(that's the name of her picture), he never even mentioned Cabre. He looked into Ava's eyes, and he knew the answer. She was still very much in love with him. Later Ava explained about Mario. "It's just one of those publicity gags framed to help his career and our picture. Personally I think it's a shame to involve him in that sort of a story. He's a nice guy."

AFTER Frank left Spain and went to Paris and then to New York and then to Hollywood—Ava denied most emphatically the rumors which had her retiring from the screen for a period of nine months.

Here again, the ridiculous rumor-spreaders in California went about saying that Frankie would get a divorce under any circumstance, no matter what demands Nancy made on him, that he and Ava would then marry, take an apartment in Paris, raise a child or two, and then they would both resume their careers.

As a matter of fact, the rumor received such wide circulation that Howard Strickling, MGM publicity director, phoned Ava long distance. She was alternately angry and amused. "I'm not planning to take an apartment in Paris or anywhere else," she said. "I'm coming home as soon as the picture is finished. I'm terribly homesick. All those vicious rumors about Frank and me are wrong. The only reason he came here was to recuperate from his throat illness."

Just what is the fundamental attraction between Ava Gardner and Frank Sinatra?

This is the question so many people have asked over and over again. Ava knows men. In her years on the Pacific Coast, she's dated all the eligibles. Experience has taught her to read men like the top line of an optometrist's chart.

Prior to Sinatra, she made it a strict point never to "date" or go out with married men—and she must have had some a priori assurance that all was not well between Frank and Nancy Sinatra, and that they were on the verge of a legal separation, before she would give Frank her companionship.

SINATRA can be the most charming man on earth. He has a soft, ingenuous way about him. He can start out with a hostile audience and inside of fifteen minutes have that audience rooting for him. Night after night at the Copacabana in New York he proved this. Many of the people who came to see him were decidedly antagonistic. Some of them wanted to be in "on his vocal funeral." He not only fooled them—he captivated them.

This, in a sense, is what he did to Ava. She won't talk about it publicly, but she finds in Frank a man who's generous, ardent, intelligent, and, above all, an equal.

This last is most important. For many years Ava has suffered from an inferiority complex, an inferiority born of the knowledge that her fame was originally founded not upon talent but merely upon the possession of a beautiful face and figure.

In Frankie, Ava's found a man who not only is willing but actually treats her as an equal. He respects her opinions. He caters to her whims. He indulges her fancies. He seeks her companionship.

Whether this love and affection is transitory no man knows.

Frank himself, when asked how come he'd been completely smitten by Ava, told a friend, "She's a million laughs." In Sinatra's book, that's the highest compli-she's sensational

There was a craze for the kind of photography that had made Hedy Lamarr the rage in Algiers—big, dreamy, softly lit closeups. That was the treatment the MGM representative gave Ava. Placed before a camera, she was told, "Now look up . . . Look down . . . Now smile . . . Pick up a vase of flowers." Hollywood legend has it that when her silent test arrived MGM's brass reached for their telephones and yelled, "She can't act; she can't talk; she's sensational. Get her out here!"—Pete Martin, from Hollywood Without Makeup.

Sinatra wants a divorce. In the past five years, he's had so many quarrels, disputes, and separations from Nancy that a divorce seems best.

Nancy, however, won't give Frank a divorce—at least at this writing. Some ultra-high-pressure salestalk by Sinatra may do the trick—but Nancy has been against divorce from the very beginning. A devout Catholic, she feels that divorce is opposed by her religion, and she won't countenance it.

Frank can have a legal separation which is what he has now, but he can't have freedom to marry again, not so long as Nancy holds out.

THIS is where Ava might get hurt, and she knows it. She may go around for years with Frank, hoping always to become his wife. Frank may want her as his life-mate, may want her now. In a year or two, he may not. Ava will then have wasted that much time.

Lots of girls say that Nancy should give Frank up immediately. "Who wants a man when he doesn't want you?" That's easily asked. It's not easily answered. Nancy married Frank when he didn't have a dime. She's the mother of his three children, as fine a mother as there is. She has seen Frank through countless escapades. If she and Frank were divorced, who would want to marry her with three children? These are the questions she's asked herself time after time.

She knows Frank a good deal better than Ava does. There's nothing, absolutely nothing he's ever done in the past ten years, that she doesn't know about. She has friends all over the entertainment business who keep her informed.

She has proved herself tolerant, understanding, and faithful. Moreover, she still loves Frank, and that's the apex of the triangle. Deep in her heart Nancy's convinced that Frank will come home again, home to stay. It may take years. His voice may then be gone, his unique charm and hair with it. He may be broke, disillusioned, penniless, his talent dissipated, his friends forsaken, but he'll come home.

Instead of regarding Ava as he does—as the grand passion, the bright flame, the guiding star in his life—Nancy regards Ava without bitterness or rancor, as the strange interlude. Frank has strayed before and Frank will stray again, but there must always be some place and someone to whom he can return.

Nancy feels that that someone is she.

"When no one else wants him," she says, "I'll take him back. I've always loved him."

ava's budget

Even on a salary of approximately $50,000, Ava must still live with comparative frugality. What with her manager-lawyer's fee and her agent's 10 per cent cut, plus state and federal income taxes, about 71 per cent of her pay is gone before she gets her hands on it. Her manager-lawyer allows her only $176 a week as expense money. Out of this she must pay her rent and maid's salary, as well as her clothing, food, lighting, auto upkeep, cleaning and drug bills. The rental for her two-bedroom, living room, kitchen and dinette apartment is $200 a month. The portion of her gross earnings that remains—goes into savings.—(Pete Martin, from Hollywood Without Makeup)

Here's the truth about the stars—as you asked for it. Want to spike more rumors? Want more facts? Write to THE INSIDE STORY, Modern Screen, 1046 N. Carol Drive, Hollywood, Cal.

Q. Can you either confirm or deny the rumor that Barbara Stanwyck is very unhappy in her personal life, that her marriage to Bob Taylor has been a farce for years, and that she loves him too much to divorce him despite his aberrations? —J. B., Weston, Mass.

A. Bob Taylor has many hobbies and pursuits which his wife does not share, but to say that their marriage is a farce is a complete falsehood. The Taylors have established a marital way of life which allows them both a maximum amount of personal freedom. Lately, they've been separated a good deal, because Bob has been making pictures in Europe while Barbara has been at work in Hollywood.

Q. Why is it that I never read anything in your magazine or in other fan magazines about Katharine Hepburn? Is she on the blacklist or something? —V. O., Columbus, Ohio

A. For years, Miss Hepburn has been uncooperative as regards interviews. She steadfastly refuses to share one iota of her private life with the public. She considers this unnecessary and an infringement on her freedom.

Nicky's Liz

Q. Do movie stars ever take snapshots of each other, or do they get fed up with cameras? Did Nicky Hilton take snapshots of Liz on their honeymoon?—R. E., N. Y. C.

Q. Does Shirley Temple live with her parents now that she's divorced? —D. R., Omaha, Neb.

A. Shirley's home is on the same estate as her parents'. She lives with her daughter in a separate house.

Q. Does Howard Duff have any plans for marriage in the near future? If so, to whom? How many times has he been engaged?—T. W., Boston, Mass.

A. Duff says he has no immediate plans for marriage in the near future. His name in the past has been linked with Ava Gardner, Yvonne DeCarlo, and Ida Lupino. He's been engaged twice.

Q. Why does Gene Kelly's wife call herself Betsy Blair? Where did she get the name, anyway? —U. F., Baton Rouge, La.

A. When she was 14, Betsy had a schoolgirl crush on a boy who attended Blair Academy. When she entered show business a year later, she thought the thing to do was to take a stage name. She chose Blair in honor of the boyfriend. All this, of course, was before she met Gene.

Q. Is it true that the studio executives have gotten together and banned Frank Sinatra from pictures because of his conduct? —P. Y., Hoboken, N. J.

A. There is no truth to that rumor. Stars with box office appeal are very rarely banned from anything. That Sinatra still retains much of that appeal is evidenced by the crowds he continues to draw to night clubs, video performances, and stage shows.

Q. After seeing The Jolson Story and Jolson Sings Again, I was under the impression that Jolson had been married twice. I understand he's had four wives. If so, who are they? —M. C., Erie, Pa.

Q. How many times has Roy Rogers been married?—R. X., Emporia, Kan.

A. Three times.

Q. Is Peter Lawford a Catholic? A friend of mine in Hollywood says he always wears a St. Christopher medal. —B. D., Freeport, N. Y.

A. Lawford is a Protestant but wears a St. Christopher medal as a good luck charm. Supposedly, it was given to him by a girl some years ago.

Q. Now that he's divorced from Jane Wyman, is Ronald Reagan dating any other girl steadily? —B. S., Enid, Okla.

A. Reagan says he's playing the field.

Q. I wonder if you'd settle an argument. Who is older, Alan Ladd or his wife? —C. R., Rochester, N. Y

At the West Hill Hunt Trials, Dan Dailey puts his mount over a barrier. Dan and his wife, Liz, helped found the club after the war; it now has over a hundred members. They use hounds as in fox-hunting—but the hounds follow a scent instead of a fox.

Two of Hollywood's happiest couples, newlyweds Polly and Jerome Courtland and their pals Barbara and Marshall Thompson, attend the private preview of Paramount's new drama Sunset Boulevard, starring Gloria Swanson, Bill Holden.

YES, I'm in love with that wonderful guy, too! Can't think of anyone I'd rather spend an enchanted evening with more than that 56-year-old charmer, Ezio Pinza, who has completely taken Hollywood by storm.

The arrival of the singing star of South Pacific is the GOOD News of the month—and he hadn't anymore than brushed the dust off his suit from motoring across the country—than I grabbed him for an interview on my radio show.

Did he live up to all I had expected after seeing him on Broadway? DID he? That stage presence, let me say right out loud, is nothing compared to the charm the real Ezio exudes.

When he came into the broadcasting room, I thought my radio secretary was going to swoon. And I admit, I teetered a bit myself!

He looked even more attractive in his gray suit and deep blue shirt than as the French planter he played so long on the stage with Mary Martin.

The first thing to impress me was his wonderful suntan contrasting with his gray hair. The next most colorful thing about him is a little trick he has in talking: He actually booms everything he says to the point of sounding a little gruff—and then, suddenly, comes that ingratiating grin, like a small boy, conveying, "I was only fooling."

He is vastly amused when asked what he thinks about Hollywood—as though this were his first visit here. "I lived here for years," he rolls out with that fascinating accent which I shall not try to copy. "Everything looks much as I left it—except for one thing. When I was here before—I was unemployed."

That wicked smile of his flashed brilliantly. "Now I am Lana Turner's co-star."

Yes, he had met Lana. His wife had met her. And so had his dog. "We all found her delightful," he explained, "even the dog purred like a kitten."

He swears his favorite screen actor is Jimmy Durante—but whether he was spoofing, I do not know. That "not knowing" quality is one of the most fascinating things about him.

He went through the radio rehearsal and

BOULEVARD . . . IRENE DUNNE TAKES TEA WITH THE QUEEN . . . THE DUCHESS OF WINDSOR ENTERTAINS THE NICKY HILTONS.

Liz Dailey awards Dan one of the many ribbons he won that day, while Dan's horse nuzzles his appreciation. Liz is a fine horsewoman, too, and spends many hours daily, riding in the hills near their Valley home.

Ronald Reagan, who used to be a sportscaster in Iowa, announces the events for the hunt club. Reagan didn't ride that day but he's a member of the "horsey" set. The club has frequent meets—for fun and sportsmanship.

Jane Powell and Geary Steffen confer with Roddy McDowall in the lobby of the Paramount studios. As is usual at screenings, guests at the Sunset Boulevard preview were given cards and asked for their reactions.

Making a handsome foursome, Arlene Dahl with Lex Barker, and Adele Mara with Forrest Tucker fill out their preview cards. They all agreed that the movie was superb—the best they'd seen for a long, long time.

the recording with such ease I could hardly believe he had a script before him. Ah, yes, this man who put sex-appeal into mature love does everything with such ease and charm he fractures us gals.

But don't call him "Essio" for Ezio. It's pronounced "Eightzio."

My heart aches for Judy Garland. In all the tragedies of Hollywood, there is no sadder story than this of the little singing, dancing girl who has lost her way.

As a newspaperwoman, I am supposed to be used to the dramas of this industry. But I have seldom been more shaken than I was writing the news story that Judy (just a little girl such a few years ago) had tried to take her life by cutting her throat with a broken glass!

When her shattered nerves and distraught emotional state brought on her second suspension within a year at MGM (she was taken off Annie Get Your Gun and Royal Wedding) Judy went all to pieces.

During a business conference at her home between her husband, Vince Minnelli and her agent, Carlton Alsop, she had dashed hysterically from the room, locked herself in the bathroom and attempted suicide.

But her devoted Vince got to her in time—and as she cried in his arms, Judy said, "I'm sorry—so very sorry."

Physically, Judy will recover. But what damage is done to the spirit by an act like hers—only God can know.

No one has deeper sympathy than I for the actress, who took to sleeping pills and stronger sedatives to calm her shattered nerves—and I think, over the years, I have proved my feeling for her. But I can't stand by and see maudlin sympathy built up for Judy at the expense of her studio.

I know this to be a fact—Louis B. Mayer, the head of MGM, is deeply devoted to Judy, the little girl he discovered when she was a child and built into one of the greatest stars of the business.

A PRODUCT OF BRISTOL-MYERS

awakened in the middle of the night, when she was particularly distraught, and gone to her house and sat by her bedside, comforting her and telling her, like a father, that everything would be all right.

He has insisted on giving her chance after chance—sometimes when his staunch support has meant arguments with other studio executives. I have heard L.B. frequently say of Judy, "She is like my own little girl"—and his heart has ached for her.

And it isn't true that the studio insisted that she return to work in Summer Stock soon after she came back from the Boston hospital early in the year.

It was Judy who begged to go back to work. "I've worked all my life. I am restless and unhappy being idle. Please, give me a picture to do. That will make me well faster than anything."

But, we can't believe that any more, Judy. You must go away and rest, rest, rest for a long time until you are completely well. (For "The Brutal Truth About Judy Garland," see page 56.—Ed.)

IRONICALLY, the girl who replaced Judy in Annie Get Your Gun is the happiest girl in our town. Betty Hutton actually glows these days. If you ever saw a happy girl, it's the "Huttontot"—as she calls herself. (For another viewpoint about Betty turn to page 44.—Ed.)

Betty is in every Charleston contest and she has beaux for every mood. She sings and dances around her home, with her little blonde daughters in her wake, just like she does on the screen.

Betty, like Judy, has worked ever since she was a child—in fact, if anything, Betty's childhood was much grimmer than Judy's. Where Judy traveled in an act with her sisters and got "headliner" treatment—Betty danced on the streets outside Lansing, Michigan, saloons for the dimes and quarters tossed to her and her sister.

Yes, they came up much the same way But what a difference in what success has meant to them!

Don't think bouncing, bombastic Betty isn't mindful of her blessings.

"Every night when the children say their prayers, I kneel with them and thank God for my wonderful life," Betty told me.

SHELLEY Winters may be temperamental—but she's one of the most honest belles I know. When she was asked if she and Farley Granger would marry when they meet in Europe later this year, said snappy Shelley:

"If we married now—we'd probably kill each other in six months. We are both so wrapped up in our careers. We both have such a long way to go.

"But who knows? Maybe, we might go crazy and get married. But, if we keep our right minds—we'll wait awhile."

ALL those members of Parliament who were "shocked" out of their wits when "an American," Irene Dunne, was cast as Queen Victoria in The Mudlark may have been amazed when the King and Queen of England met Irene at a "family tea party."

The red faces in Parliament must have been very embarrassing.

But all Hollywood felt a glow of pride when

Awake or asleep–FILM is gluing acid to your teeth!

Pepsodent removes FILM– helps stop tooth decay!

Tooth decay is caused by acid that film holds against your teeth—acid formed by the action of mouth bacteria on many foods you eat. When you use Pepsodent Tooth Paste right after eating, it helps keep acid from forming. What's more, Pepsodent removes dulling stains and "bad breath" germs that collect in film.

FILM NEVER LETS UP! It's forming night and day on everyone's teeth. Don't neglect it. Always brush with film-removing Pepsodent right after eating and before retiring. No other tooth paste can duplicate Pepsodent's film-removing formula. No other tooth paste contains Irium* or Pepsodent's gentle polishing agent.

Don't let decay start in your mouth! Use Pepsodent every day—see your dentist twice a year.

YOU'LL HAVE BRIGHTER TEETH AND CLEANER BREATH when you fight tooth decay with film-removing Pepsodent!

LOUELLA PARSONS' good news

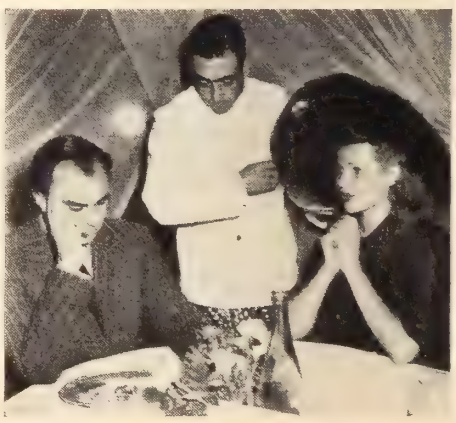
word came that Their Majesties had met Irene at an intimate tea given by Lord and Lady Carisbrook at Kings Cottage, Kew, just outside London. The Carisbrooks are relatives of the Royal couple.

The party was strictly private—the only guest other than Irene and her husband, Dr. Francis Griffin, being ex-queen Ena, of Spain, a granddaughter of Queen Victoria.

What gave us home folks such a kick is that Irene is said to be the first American star to meet the King and Queen so privately. Many others, of course, have been received at public functions.

Reports are that the King talked to Irene with great interest about The Mudlark and the role of Queen Victoria which she is playing. Well, I should think that the King, who is a great-grandson of Queen Victoria, would be interested in this movie.

Irene said afterward that she told His Majesty the picture was being made as faithfully as possible and described to him scenes shot in the dining room of Windsor Castle—one of the many castles called "home" by King George and Queen Elizabeth.



NEVER had any more fun in my life than I did on a bus ride with a lot of stars to a church social fiesta in Pomona. The idea was to help raise money for Father Thomas English's church and school—and I invited some of your favorites to go along—hardly dreaming so many would be free to accept.

We started out in a Tanner bus from my house about six o'clock in the evening—and here are the stars who went along: Joan Fontaine, Eleanor Parker, Mercedes McCambridge, Robert Young, Maureen O'Hara, Dinah Shore, George Montgomery, Freddie Brisson (Roz Russell's husband) and Tom Lewis (Loretta Young's spouse).

Never was there such a fancy bus—inside and out. To make the hour-trip pleasant, box lunches had been packed for us—fried chicken, sandwiches, pickles, hardboiled eggs and the rest of the trimmings.

The back of the bus was equipped with a bar serving beer, soft drinks, and yes, even cocktails for those who wished one.

All the way down to the little college town—and back—we "sang" all the old songs—led by Dinah Shore, natch—and what we

You a teen-ager? Then read this—a monthly feature especially for you.

FROM the letters I've read it seems that boys aren't the only problems in this world. In fact, I didn't know there were so many problems—or so many kids!

I guess I'd like to thank you right now for feeling that you can talk to me about them. Before I get gooey with sentiment, though, I'll dig right into the burning question of the month. It's the relationship between you and your parents. Many of your letters said—"Gee, you're lucky to have such understanding parents. My mother never lets me do anything I want to," or, "My father never lets me take the car when I have a date with a girl," or, "My mother won't let me use lipstick even though my friends do."

Every kid who thinks he is the only one so bothered is wrong. Before I go any further I want to say that we're all in the same boat. I've had troubles, too. There was a time when I thought nobody, but nobody understood me.

I was crazy about a boy and my parents didn't approve of him. They told me he wasn't right for me. I thought he was perfect, and I was sure that I was the only girl who'd ever been in love, and that my parents had forgotten what love was.

Well, I was wrong, and I learned a lesson. The other day, my mother said to me, "I didn't know how to get through to you, Joan, because when I talked to you a curtain would seem to come down over your mind."

That's a point I'd like to make. When you learn not to let that curtain fall, when you can honestly talk about important things to your parents, without prejudice and without letting emotion get in the way of your reasoning—then you'll have nothing to worry about. You and your parents will be friends.

I think one of the reasons we sometimes have trouble with our parents is that we're just beginning to grow up, to assert ourselves, and our egos get in the way. Everything is so new to us that we think we are the only ones who know this fact or that emotion

I WAS about nine years old when we had Greek mythology in school. It was all new to me and I loved it. Very proud of myself I asked my mother one day, "Do you know who Diana is?"

Right away she answered, "She's the Goddess of the chase."

I was amazed and angry, "How do you know that?" I asked her.

She laughed. "Well, you see, Joan, I went to school, too."

I honestly believe that if we could remember that our parents "went to school, too," we would be a lot better off. I'm not talking about grade school and high school but—if you won't think me too corny—the school of life.

When I was a little kid I was always asking why. "Why do I have to do it?" My mother tried to be reasonable, but once she lost patience with me and said, "You have to do it because I say so." This didn't seem right to me until she explained. "Suppose we're walking in the woods and I see a snake in the path and you don't see it. And if I say, 'Stop' and you ask me 'Why?' it might be too late. The snake may have struck you."

Wise parents can often see the dangers that lie in our path before we do. They have had more experience.

But don't get me wrong. There are two sides to everything and parents can be wrong, too. For example, here's a typical letter. "All the girls my age are wearing high heels but my mother doesn't approve. I feel like a silly baby wearing flats at a party. How can I make my mother understand this?"

Now I really think that this mother is wrong. Since all the other girls are wearing high heels, her daughter feels like an outcast in low heels. And that's not a good feeling. So you should explain. You should tell your mother just how you feel. You might even ask her to consult with the other mothers—those who let their daughters wear heels—and see if she won't change her mind. You should make her realize how important it is to you.

I think that too many parents live in the past. They want everything to be just the same as it was "when I was a girl" or "when I was a boy." But times have changed and nobody should judge a person of one generation by the standards of another generation.

Also, I know that there are some parents who are so unduly strict that it almost amounts to a neurosis and this kind of treatment can wreck a young person's whole life. If this is the case, don't be afraid to seek outside help. If you're really being made absolutely miserable by your parents then you should not hesitate to go to your teacher—if she is nice and kind and sensible—and tell her your problems. Or go to your minister or to your family doctor. So many times teen-agers bottle up everything inside themselves and are afraid to seek help from older people. Well, don't be afraid of that. Because the very worst thing you can do is to bottle up bitterness and resentment.

In our family we believe that everything can be solved by "talking it out."

For example, I've been criticized for calling my parents by their first names. I've always done it, since I was an only child and didn't hear anybody else saying, "Mother" and "Dad." Now I like to call them by their first names. I feel that this makes for a greater intimacy—as if we were friends as well as parents and child. Some people might not approve of this—and that's all right. But if my parents approve—then I can't see why anyone else should interfere.

The business of growing up is painful—believe me, I know, because I'm trying very hard to be an adult. But here's something I've learned. The day you say, and say with conviction, "I was wrong. I made a mistake. I am sorry and will try not to make the same mistake again"—on that day you have taken the first step toward becoming an adult.

All of us teen-agers should stop trying to assert our own individualities so much. We should wait until we have more individuality to assert, and we should try to put ourselves in the other person's place, to understand why he believes what he does. If families could just sit down together and, quietly, calmly and sanely, air their troubles and their problems and try to reach a solution that is best for all concerned—well, we certainly wouldn't have any more family fights. And, for that matter, if we carry this thought a little further, it just might be possible that we wouldn't have any more wars.

I hope I've been helpful. Keep on writing to me, please. And thanks for reading.

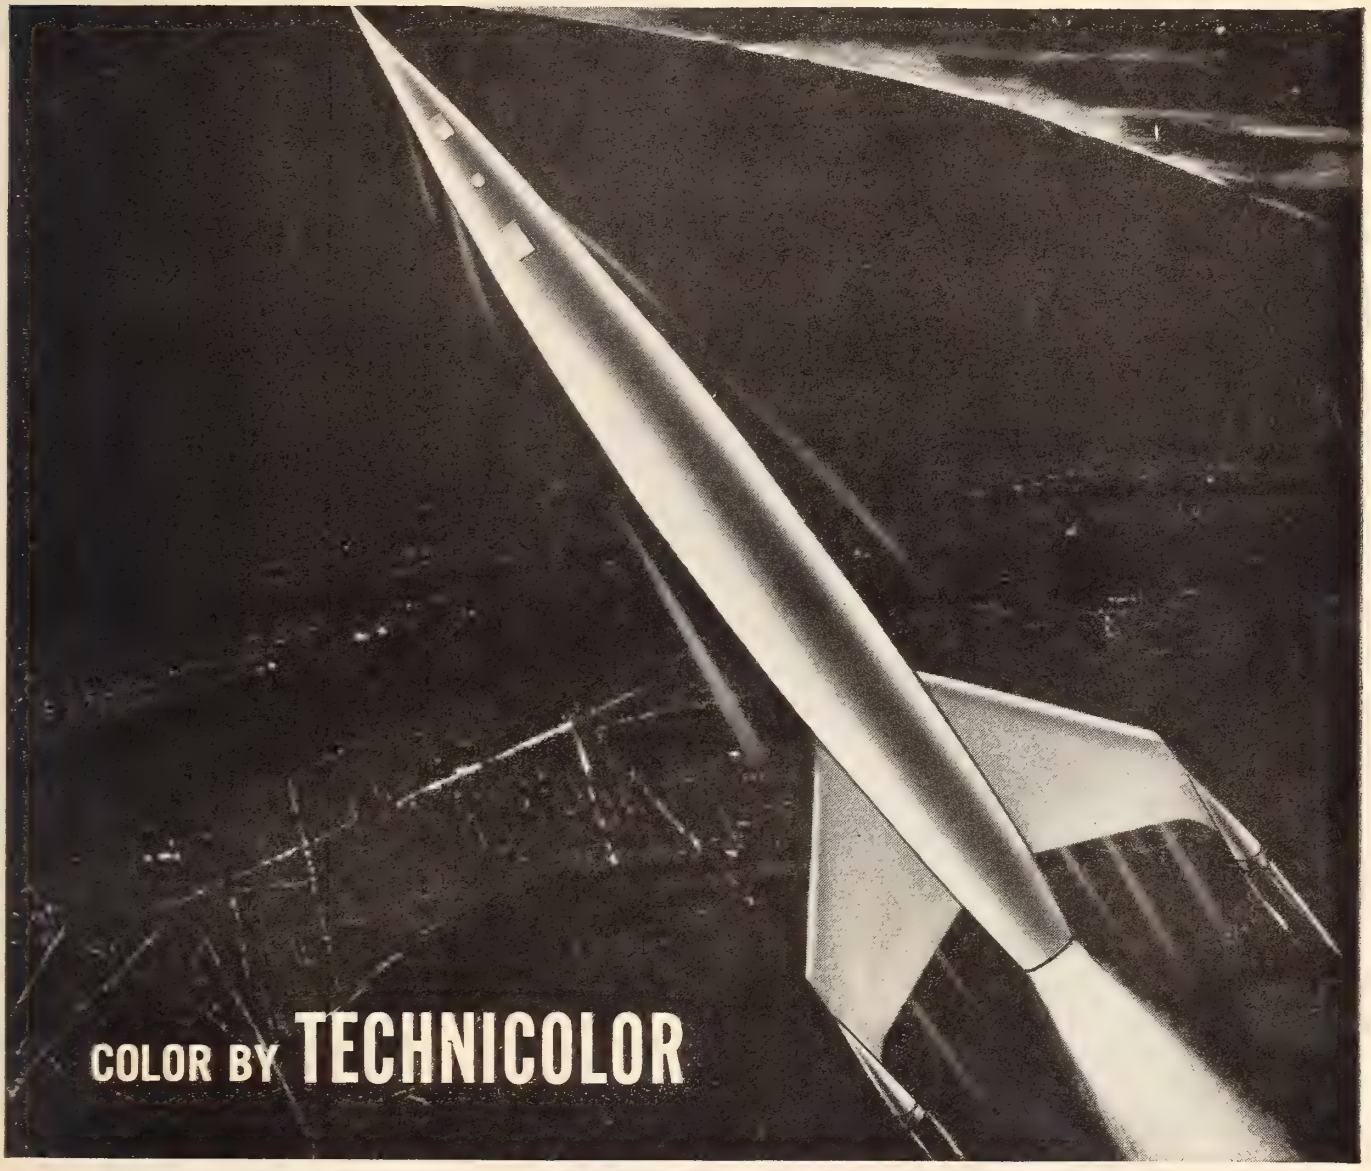
THE NEXT VOICE YOU HEAR . . .



■ How would you feel if the next voice you heard were the voice of God? What do you think would happen if on one weekday after dinner, people in every part of the world turned on the radio at the same time and heard the same voice in every language? MGM's Dore Schary has taken this provocative idea and developed it into one of the most disquieting and unusual films ever produced. The story is chiefly concerned with the effect of this miracle on a typical family, James Whitmore, a California aircraft mechanic, Nancy Davis, his pregnant wife, and their young son. As they hear the voice each night at the same time for six nights, their reactions change from disbelief, to fear, and, finally to a reawakening of the meaning of God. Whitmore makes a highly difficult assignment believable and Nancy Davis brings warmth to a fantasy that is at once farcical and dramatic.

Editor's Note: We think that this is a picture you ought to see. We think that you will be moved by its message—whether you go in humility, in sophisticated indifference, or simply because you want to be entertained. It is a story you will remember and talk about for a long time to come.

MY FRIEND IRMA GOES WEST

Irma (Marie Wilson) Peterson, whose lovely head covers an atomic brain (it's the size of an atom) is still trying to make boyfriend Al (John Lund) marry her, and Al is still collecting his unemployment checks and acting like "work" is a rare Tibetan cuss word. Jane (Diana Lynn) is still in love with singer Dean Martin. Dean is still loyally dragging Jerry Lewis everywhere he goes. That's how we left them in My Friend Irma, so it's a good place for a sequel to begin. Sequel concerns the whole gang's heading for Hollywood, after Dean's been signed up by a producer. Producer turns out to be an escaped lunatic: a French actress (Corinne Calvet) develops a yen for Dean and nearly wrecks his wedding plans, Irma is kidnapped by a couple of thugs who regret this act immediately thereafter because she talks so much she gives them a headache, and Jerry Lewis, the monkey-faced boy-man, walks away with the picture.

Cast: John Lund, Marie Wilson, Diana Lynn, Dean Martin, Jerry Lewis, Corinne Calvet. Paramount.

THE HAPPY YEARS

If ever there was a picture more delightful than The Happy Years, I missed it. It's got so much charm and gayety, it's so continually and surprisingly and wholesomely comical, it's a real American masterpiece. Not that it isn't a work of art in the universal sense, but it's as peculiarly American as "Oklahoma!" It goes back to the horse-and-buggy days, and the peaceful life of the upper middle class then, and the trials and errors of a small man named John Humperdink Stover, who's a candidate for a reformatory, really. Expelled from school after school, he returns home unregenerate and while his father and mother are worrying themselves sick, John Humperdink goes next door and performs some such feat as painting the neighbor's prize white horse green. "Same color as the grass," he defends himself. "Now the flies won't be able to see him, and bother him." Sent to a school called Lawrenceville, Dink (that's his nickname) finally meets his match. He's put in a house where the other boys are just as tough as he is, and even prouder of it. But I can't explain the flavor of these kids, and their escapades. The skinny little one who breaks a pancake-eating record, and insures free pancakes for the whole school. The little demon with two black eyes who rings the church bell on Sundays by leaping at it and swinging on it with snarling zest, like a character out of a Charles Addams cartoon. The lessons, the fights, the games, the way the boys call on young ladies. Every minute of this picture is pure pleasure. The kids' acting is magnificent, so are the adults—Leo Carroll plays Lawrenceville's wise Latin master—and the Technicolor is lovely.

Cast: Dean Stockwell, Darryl Hickman, Scotty Beckett, Leo Carroll. MGM.

COPPER CANYON

Here we have Ray Milland, a dashing Confederate ex-colonel who tries to make Nevada safe for Southerners after the Civil War. A mining community called Coppertown is treating the rebels rough. The crux of the matter is copper, logically enough, and the ins and outs of all the robbery and murder and politics that go on can't be told here. I'll just give you the bare bones. First off, Ray runs up against Hedy Lamarr (whose bones aren't bare a bit, but simply beautiful). Hedy works for a crooked northern mining syndicate, in close cahoots with a crooked sheriff and a crookeder deputy (Macdonald Carey), until she (Hedy) falls for Ray. Then she tries to make amends for her disgraceful actions. Mona Freeman is a southern belle at the end of her rope. Her father is a southern gentleman at the end of his rope. Now that I look this over, I find it doesn't seem to hang together so, as Benjamin Franklin once said, it will just have to hang separately.

Cast: Ray Milland, Hedy Lamarr, Macdonald Carey, Mona Freeman. Paramount.

and has his fears confirmed. The murdered man has had pneumonic plague. Now it's up to Widmark, and the police. Plague can kill off a city in no time, so they have to find everyone who's come in contact with the Armenian. They can't let the news out, for fear of starting a panic. If people flee the city, infection will spread to other cities through the country. Widmark's task seems hopeless. The identity of the corpse (which has to be burned) is unknown, the people who've had contact with him are equally unknown, and since some of them are murderers, they're anxious to keep it that way. Panic in the Streets is half-way fascinating, though not entirely satisfactory. You feel so strongly the terror that must accompany a ghastly epidemic that you're not nearly as optimistic as the city officials at the end of the picture. They believe catching the murderers will help them discover everybody who's been exposed to the disease. Me, I'm still haunted by the thought of all the restaurants the dead man ate in, and all the bartenders he gave change to, and all the hundreds of citizens whose clothes brushed against his clothes in the street.

Cast: Richard Widmark, Paul Douglas, Barbara Bel Geddes. 20th Century-Fox.

LOVE THAT BRUTE

This one is very Damon Runyon-ish. It tells about Chicago in the 20's, and the feud between Big Ed Hanley (Paul Douglas) and a boy called Pretty Willie (Cesar Romero), both racketeers. The feud's interwoven with a love story. Jean Peters, lovely clean-limbed American girl is the object of both these bums' affections, but she can't be bought. She can't even be borrowed. Throws a mink coat right back in Big Ed's face. (He's hired her to take care of a juvenile delinquent he claims is his son.) Jean doesn't really want to be a nurse anyhow. She wants to throw her heart (and quite a bit of the rest of her body) into night-club singing. Somehow, getting a load of her in bugle beads torching away, you start wondering if she's a split personality—half the time shocked, and the other half—shocking. Still, Big Ed is smitten, Pretty Willie is smitten, there's a terrible mess of trouble when all the men Big Ed's supposed to have murdered escape from his cellar (where they've been living in luxury because Ed's too kindhearted to rub anyone out) and the ending's happy. It's reminiscent, but fun. Also, a gay Rodgers and Hart tune called "You Took Advantage of Me" runs through the whole picture. Since Fox doesn't credit Rodgers and Hart, I'd like to.

Cast: Paul Douglas, Jean Peters, Cesar Romero, Keenan Wynn. 20th Century-Fox.

WINCHESTER '73

It seems that once in a dog's age, there's a rifle turned out, perfect in every detail. It even shocks the manufacturers. Such a gun can't be bought; it's priceless. Jimmy Stewart wins one (a "One of One Thousand" 1873 model Winchester) in a Dodge City contest (in 1873) after out-shooting a man called Dutch Henry Brown. (Other fancy names in this picture include High Spade Johnny Wilson, and Waco Johnny Dean.) Dutch Henry beats up Jimmy, steals the prize gun, loses it to an Indian trader who's murdered for it, etc. As we follow the Winchester's progress back into the hands of its rightful owner, we pass lightly through a piece of the war with the Indians, witness the plotting of a bank robbery, see assorted killings, and meet Shelley Winters, whose cowardly boyfriend tries to desert her when the heat is on. Natch, Shelley starts yearning after Jimmy, who'd never let a girl down. (He'd never look at a girl long enough to let her anything.) Jimmy gets his gun, Shelley gets her man, and Dutch Henry and Dan Duryea (he's Waco Johnny) gets their just desserts. There's a surprise ending, but as it was stolen straight out of Eagle-Lion's The Sundowners, you won't be surprised unless you missed that excellent western. This coincidence notwithstanding, Winchester '73's a good rough and ready western with fine acting.

Cast: James Stewart, Shelley Winters, Dan Duryea, Stephen McNally. Universal-International.

TREASURE ISLAND

Walt Disney's all-color, all-alive production (not a cartoon in the carload) of the Robert Louis Stevenson children's classic about pirates and buried treasure and adventure. Bobby Driscoll is fine as Jim Hawkins, the little boy who goes on the long voyage to Treasure Island, and Robert Newton has a field day playing Long John Silver, that crafty, mutinous split personality of a pirate who makes a buddy of "young 'orkins." You'll meet all the old familiar characters—Squire Trelawney, Doctor Livesey, Captain Smollett, Ben Gunn. The movie sticks passionately close to the book, which is as it should be.

Cast: Bobby Driscoll, Robert Newton, Basil Sydney, Walter Fitzgerald, Denis O'Dea. Disney-RKO.

PEGGY

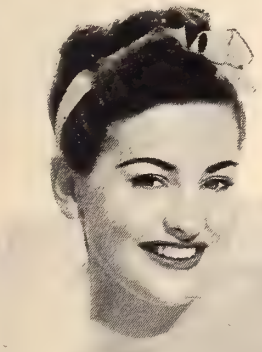
Some motion picture companies can make a nice, light-hearted Technicolored comedy. Universal isn't one of them. Peggy's not as boring as Yes Sir, That's My Baby, but it comes close. Story concerns retired professor Charles Coburn. His daughters, Diana Lynn and Barbara Lawrence, go to Pasadena City College, so they're both forced to enter the Rose Queen competition. (You never heard of a rose queen? That's the most thing they have in Pasadena!) Diana's secretly married to a football hero, and married women can't be rose queens, but if she drops out of the contest, her pop will find out she's married, and he hates football players, and he'll annul the young couple quicker than you can say "she's a minor." Then we have widowed Charlotte Greenwood pursuing Coburn whom she wishes to marry for reasons known only to herself and God. You never saw a crabbier old daddy in your life. And so it develops. Will everything go good? Yes, but who cares.

Cast: Diana Lynn, Charles Coburn, Charlotte Greenwood. Universal-International.

THE FLAME AND THE ARROW

Burt Lancaster's an Italian version of Robin Hood, back in the days when portions of Lombardy were under the yoke of the Germans. Man named Ulrich of Hesse is the villain who soaks the poor Italians of tax money. Besides taxes, he collects women, once took Burt's wife away. Burt doesn't care because he's still got his little son, and his merry men. Eventually, little son is kidnapped, there's a showdown between invaders and invaded, Burt winds up with Virginia Mayo (Ulrich's niece), and you see an acrobatic exhibition by Burt and his real-life old carnival partner, Nick Cravat, which is just as good as the ones in any circus. Besides the evil Ulrich, there's a two-faced no-good-nick named Allessandro, played by Robert Douglas, and just in case I've never mentioned it before, I'd like to mention it now. He has the sneeriest face—or the sneeriest two faces—in motion pictures.

Cast: Burt Lancaster, Virginia Mayo, Robert Douglas, Aline MacMahon. Warners.



THREE LITTLE WORDS

The giants of popular music having been accounted for (there've already been movies about Rodgers and Hart, Jerome Kern, etc.), MGM's reduced to telling the story of a couple of song-writers named Bert Kalmar and Harry Ruby. This duo wrote such numbers as "So-long, OO-long," "Sunny Tennessee," and, of course, "Three Little Words." Astaire plays Kalmar, the vaudeville dancer who injures his knee and goes in for lyric manufacture (he

THREE HUSBANDS

Emlyn Williams, a corpse with a sense of humor, arranges for letters to be delivered (after his demise) to his three best male friends, informing them that he's had love affairs with their wives. Then, because Mr. Williams is the star of the picture, and no good to us dead, the flashbacks begin. His association with Shepperd Strudwick's wife. (Ruth Warrick. He took her to symphony concerts.) His association with Robert Karnes' wife. (Vanessa Brown. She was his nurse.) His association with Howard Da Silva's wife. (Eve Arden, and her he taught French, among other things.) Whether the three girls were really bad girls, I leave it to you. Picture's amusing, and there's a particularly funny bit by Louise Erickson as a serious-minded menace who's got her eye on Strudwick.

Cast: Emlyn Williams, Eve Arden, Howard Da Silva, Shepperd Strudwick. United Artists.

LOUISA

When Louisa (Spring Byington), Ronald Reagan's widowed mother, moves in on Ronald and his family, there are complications. Louisa has time on her hands, so she interferes in the affairs of the household. "Get some interests, mother," the desperate family suggests. They mean knitting, bridge, ladies aid. Packing spam for hungry slobbovians. Well, Louisa gets an interest—but it's men. Pretty soon she has two old codgers fighting for her; one of them's a grocer, and the other's Ronnie's wealthy boss. To Ronnie and the family, none of this seems dignified. A grandmother holding hands in the movies! Next she'll be climbing trees and playing on a softball team. There's the problem. Picture's simple, kind-hearted. These are virtues. Picture's pretty dull. This is a vice.

Cast: Ronald Reagan, Piper Laurie, Ruth Hussey, Edmund Gwenn. Universal-International.

WHERE THE SIDEWALK ENDS

Dana Andrews as a taciturn detective who'd rather beat up a crook than eat a good meal. That's why he's so lean, and all the crooks hate him. Reason for his ways: his father was a criminal, and Dana's escaping his heritage. "Detectives should find evil-doers, not punish them," the police department tells him gently, but to Dana, a sock on the spot is worth two in the bush. When he accidentally kills an ex-war hero and then tries to cover up his deed, and then runs afoul of a gambling syndicate, and then falls in love with model Gene Tierney, the ex-war hero's ex-wife, he's got himself a case Mr. Anthony wouldn't touch. Special acting medal should go to old-timer Ruth Donnelly who plays a restaurant keeper with comedy and tenderness.

Cast: Dana Andrews, Gene Tierney, Gary Merrill, Bert Freed. 20th Century-Fox.

SPY HUNT

Apparently, there is nothing more ferocious than a panther. Oh, them deadlly killers. Penniless Howard Duff is escorting two caged panthers home to America and a circus, in return for his own passage, when en route to Milan, Italy, he gets mixed up with Marta Toren who hides some microfilm in one of the panther's collars (first she dopes the beast) and first thing you know, you're in the middle of a spy story. At an inn in the Alps, we meet several suspicious characters, all supposedly out for the panther hunt (I forgot to tell you the panthers escape from the train when it's sabotaged). A few of these characters, however, are really out for the microfilm. Which twin is a secret agent? Which twin has the tommy-gun, and on whom will he use it? Very nice adventure stuff.

Cast: Howard Duff, Marta Toren, Robert Douglas. Universal-International.

how about hollywood morals?

■ Ever since the first actress blinked into a movie camera and bared her lovely legs, the morals of Hollywood citizens have been subject to attack and condemnation. Hollywood's reputation as a sin-loving, pleasure-seeking mecca spread throughout the world.

In an effort to counteract this, Hollywood created a self-censoring organization in 1930 under Will Hays. (Now Eric Johnston is the director.)

Still Hollywood's reputation grew. The Bergman adventure, Rita Hayworth's royal and racy romance, Errol Flynn's eternal escapades provide ample material for Sunday sermons —and even congressional inquiries.

When Mr. Jackson, at the request of Senator Johnson, came to Hollywood to study its morals, he did not expect to go back to Washington empty-handed. Nevertheless, he did. At the moment when Hollywood could at last step forward and take its place on a level with cities everywhere, Judy Garland attempted to commit suicide, and the chorus of condemnation was heard again.

What really is going on?—MODERN SCREEN editors asked themselves. Exactly how did Hollywood get its reputation? What are the facts and what is the fantasy?

We decided to find out, and print the truth —without bias or censorship. Is Hollywood really as bad as they say or is it no worse—and no better—than any other American community? Do Rita, Ingrid, Errol and Judy typify the stars, or are they only the occasional expressions of the most glamorous, and at the same time, the most emotionally-consuming industry in the history of the world?

We think you will find the answers in our report on Hollywood morals. It starts on page 54.

BY JANE WILKIE

Thou swell

• People who don't know Lana Turner have peculiar ideas about her. They think she's five-feet-three of whipped cream. They think she's dumb. They think she is haughty, flighty and shallow. Magazine editors assigning stories about her usually ask their reporters, "What does she —can she—read?"

This story is a defense of Lana Turner—not that she wants one, or really needs one. She stands very well on those beautiful legs of hers. But somewhere along the line too many people began to assume that a woman who is blonde, or eye-stopping, or possessed of any amount of sex-appeal, is bereft of brain power.

The assumption has no logical basis, but it's continually strengthened by a lot of less attractive women who say to themselves, "Well, she may be prettier than I am, but I'll bet I'm more intelligent."

Nothing could be farther from the truth. Lana, as her friends will tell you, is a clear, logical thinker. She is one of the best-read women in Hollywood, and has a great awareness of the world outside Hollywood.

She is an animated conversationalist with a magnificent sense of humor. The first day she reported for work in one of her pictures, others in the cast warned her that the director had an annoying habit of working until seven or eight at night. Lana thanked them for the hint, and that evening, at six o'clock, the momentary quiet of the set was shattered by the pealing of a bell. Around the corner of a prop living room came Lana, swinging a huge cow bell (Continued on page 81)

WONDERLAND

by June Allyson

I have an absent-minded husband and an addle-pated dog and a darling baby daughter who shop-lifts. Oh, I've got a lovely bunch of characters— so come on in, I'll introduce you to the folks who make it fun to be at home.

■ I always wanted a family of my own in a big house—the kind where the cookie jar is never empty, where someone's always sitting in your favorite chair, and the sunlight streams through the windows.

Well, now I have a family, and a house that I hate to leave in the morning—or any other time. At first glance, my family's small. There's Richard, Pamela and myself. But there are a lot of other people whom I like to include in our clan. Some of them live with us; some don't, but that doesn't matter, it's because of them that the house deserves to be called a home.

To explain what I mean, I'll present all of us to you one by one in a sort of play that doesn't really need a plot. First, there's the cast of characters:

Richard Ewing Powell: Actor, husband, head of the house. A disturbing man with deep blue eyes and sensational eyelashes.

Pamela Allyson Powell: Small ham, two years old but not cured. Twinkling eyes, wrinkling nose, 16 teeth.

Frances Olson: Nurse, called Olie. Patient, full of humor, busy 24 hours a day trying to cure the ham.

Marian: Cook, Scottish with brogue. Worries about me.

Pat: French poodle, grey, birdbrain.

(Non-Resident)

Pat Grenier: Secretary. Knows all, tells nothing, can't ever find me.

Mr. Eggart: Gardener. No first name. Speaks eight syllable words only.

Act I: Breakfast. Mr. Powell and Me. At least, I think it's Mr. Powell. He's behind a newspaper.

ME: Good morning!

RICHARD: (Two eyes appear briefly above paper) Hi!

ME: (I walk around the table, kiss the top of his head, get no reaction, sit down.) Nice party last night, wasn't it?

Silence.

ME: I'm glad we came home early, aren't you?

Silence.

ME: What are you going to do today?

RICHARD: What?

ME: (slight edge) What are you going to do today?

RICHARD: Oh. Couple of meetings. Radio.

ME: I'm going to play golf this afternoon with Helen.

Silence.

RICHARD: (from behind paper) Eat your prunes, wife.

(Enter Frank, bearing eggs.)

ME: Frank, can you see me? Am I here—in this room?

He's not ready to settle down yet, so be patient, ladies. There's a lot of living he has to do— a lot of questions he has to answer . . .

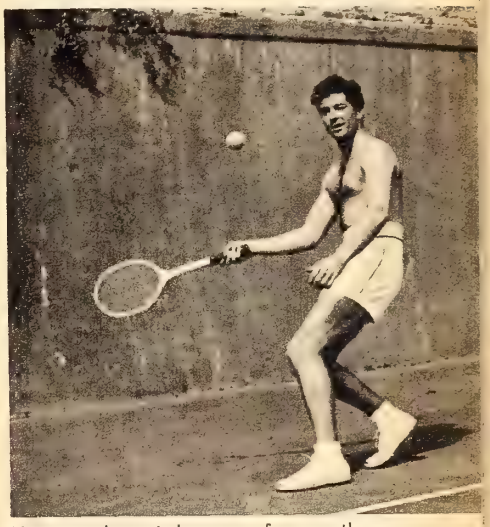
BY JANE MARNER

the private affairs of FARLEY GRANGER

■ The ladies will have to wait—the five hundred beautiful ladies at the Barbizon Model Agency who voted him the Most Eligible Bachelor of 1950, and the thousands of other ladies who never got to vote, and the ladies who call him up all the time and say, "Mr. Granger, I would be happy to marry you"—they'll all have to wait.

Mr. Granger lives alone. He makes his own breakfast, and sometimes, his own lunch. He washes his own socks, and he plays tennis on Sundays. When he stops to think it's about his work, and perhaps about the day just recently when Sam Goldwyn called him into his office, and he went there in fear and apprehension.

He'd just finished work on Edge of Doom. It was a demanding, dramatic role which required him to kill a priest and then to wrestle with his awful conscience. He thought that he'd failed, and when Mr. Goldwyn looked at him quizzically and waved him to a chair, he was sure that he'd failed.



"I know you're tired," Mr. Goldwyn began. "I know you need a vacation. You can start today. But first—you know this picture is the thing I've been wanting to put you in for a long time, don't you—but didn't dare?"

Farley nodded. Here it came.

"I want to say to you that all the expectations and hopes I've had for you have been realized. I want to say that I'm very proud of this picture and of you. It's taken seven years, but it's been worth it. Together, you and I have made the greatest thing you can make in Hollywood. Together, Farley, we've made a new star." (Continued on page 68)

Farley lives alone and loves it. He's only a stone's throw from his parents' home, close enough to get some good meals.

He started tennis lessons a few months ago and whenever he's not working—he's on Bill Wyler's court, practicing his drives.

His apartment has a small, well-used sundeck. Farley is still adding art books and paintings to his already fine collection.

the BIG SPLASH

Keeping cool was no problem at Tony Curtis' swimming pool party. His warm guests simply immersed themselves for the whole afternoon.

Joyce MacKenzie looked much too comfortable floating lazily down the Santa Ynez pool, so Tony Curtis, Roddy McDowall and Marshall Thompson decided to upset her rubber raft. "Help!" she shouts. "I'm drowning!"

Throwing caution to the winds, the girls climbed on those manly shoulders and tried pushing each other off. Barbara Thompson on Marshall and Amanda Blake on Roddy give Joyce (on Jack Beutel) the old heave-ho.

SWIMMING POOL PARTIES? "AW, THEY'RE ALL WET!" SAYS YOUR UNDERWATER REPORTER. by Beverly Ott

IT WAS one of those lazy summer Fridays when a working girl hates her typewriter, or any other excuse for lifting a finger. I'm a member of that species, and I wasn't wasting time glaring at my Remington. I was busy staring out the window—watching the sun shine on everything in sight.

The phone rang. "Martyred Screen," I answered, and tried to keep the bitterness out of my voice.

"It's Tony Curtis," said Tony Curtis. "What're you doing?"

"Slaving over a hot story," I lied, hoping to make a fine, upstanding impression.

Mental telepathy never had it so good. "Come slave over a cool one," he invited. "We're going swimming at the Santa Ynez pool." Naturally, I played hard-to-get.

"Who?" I asked.

"Well, I'm not exactly sure who's coming," Tony said. "Most of the people I called are busy. But I thought I'd launch Harvey anyway."

I had to think that one over. Poor boy. The heat had gone to his head. "Tony," I replied gently. "Rabbits don't swim. Not even invisible rabbits."

He laughed. His assurance that this rabbit would float was all I needed. Right away I recognized my duty. If Tony Curtis had a sunstroke, I should be writing a story about it beside a swimming pool—beside the Pacific ocean, if necessary. And preferably, under a beach umbrella.

Of course, when I made the announcement, everyone in the office thought I was the one with the bothered brain. But I have faced these insinuations before. So instead of being fazed, I went home to get my bathing suit and fountain pen and headed for the Santa Ynez Inn.

The pool, I found, is a body of water surrounded by a building. No wind. A sky full of sun. And beach chairs galore—two of which held Marshall and Barbara Thompson.

"Day off?" I inquired.

I got an indignant look for my curiosity. "I'm studying a script," Marsh said.

I didn't see any script. Later on, I noticed that he'd been sitting on it. Suddenly Roddy McDowall and Amanda Blake came up out of the pool for air. "Office closed?" asked Roddy.

"I'm doing underwater interviews," I told him and produced my fountain pen. "I thought you couldn't come. Don't you have a radio show this afternoon?"

He seemed slightly sheepish. "Today I'm transcribed," he said, mopping his brow.

Amanda disappeared for a minute. She returned with an armload of towels. "Let me help," I volunteered, grabbing a handful and scattering them around the cement.

"Hey, wait a second—they go over me, not under me," she grinned. Then she stretched out and covered up. Amanda's a gorgeous redhead, who looks like Greer Garson, and could probably accumulate a mass of freckles by sitting near an electric bulb. But the weather had proved too good to resist so she'd joined our happy group of truants.

Joyce MacKenzie showed up next. "I shouldn't be here," were her first words. "I just moved into a new apartment and I ought to be getting it straightened." (Continued on next page)

Joyce decides to get even by sinking all the men. Armed with an inner tube, she paddled over to Jack Beutel, yelling "Prepare to submerge! Prepare to submerge!" Jack blithely ignored her—and she promptly sank him.

Barbara stretches out on the diving board while Marshall and Amanda apply the suntan oil. Amanda was next and they really coated her—she doesn't even need the sun to get freckles.

Joyce MacKenzie takes over chef's duties at the Santa Ynez pool, while host Tony Curtis hopes for the best.

There's nothing like a swim to rouse those appetites—and hamburgers and salad go down in record-breaking time.

As the sun sinks slowly in the west, the gang collapses on the water's edge while Harvey, the rabbit, keeps watch.

She went in and put on her bathing suit instead.

Jack Beutel was the worst offender. "I had an appointment with the dentist," he admitted. "But maybe it'll be cloudy tomorrow and I can make another one."

Finally we caught sight of Tony. He was carefree. He was so carefree that he'd forgotten his bathing suit. But he remembered Harvey. Harvey was a rubber rabbit. He took to the water as if he'd been floating all his inflated life. And Tony, who managed to borrow a suit, followed.

A small voice in the back of my head told me I should be working. "Come down and say a few words," I told Roddy. Then I held my nose and headed for the bottom of the pool. Might as well make this authentic.

Roddy joined me. "Blub," he said.

We surfaced and saw Joyce drifting up and down on the raft. After a short conference, Roddy and the rest of the fellows maneuvered a surprise attack. "Now Joyce will say a few words," he yelled as they tossed her overboard.

"Blub," said Joyce.

Next came what is known in polite swimming circles as a water battle. Barbara climbed on Marsh's shoulders, Joyce on Jack's and Roddy carried Amanda. The idea was for one of the girls to get dunked. Tony, who refereed, declared that the large splash signified Joyce had lost the fight. I think she spent more time underwater than anybody—except me. And I was there on business.

Joyce took her revenge out on Jack. Under he went. I guess I don't have to tell you what he said. He came up in time to just miss getting hit on the head by Marshall, who was jumping, feet first, through the water ring.

I was sitting by the pool soaking my feet when I heard a couple of familiar snickers. I turned around to see a couple of much too familiar faces. Bob Beerman and Bert Parry, MODERN SCREEN's ace photographers, were leering down at me. "Underwater interviews, floating rabbits. You're all wet," they snickered.

"What're you doing here?" I wanted to know.

"We thought we'd try out our waterproof cameras," they retorted. And then they went away. I thought their tone a little cold for such a warm day, so I slipped back into the pool and went under two and a half times.

Food brought all of us back to dry land. The chef carted out a grill and began to whip up some hamburgers and trimmings. "My specialty," Joyce murmured.

Can June Haver LOVE again?

When is tragedy forgotten, when can love grow? For June, the time is now.

by Cynthia Miller

■ She was sitting in the commissary at 20th Century-Fox, poking away at a fruit salad. A friend sat with her but they didn't talk much, there was too much noise swirling around and the incessant clattering of dishes made them tired. Now and then someone waved to her and June would smile and wave back, but there was no gaiety in her gesture.

Suddenly June looked up and found herself staring into the eyes of a stranger sitting a few tables away. For a second which seemed like an hour they sat gazing at each other and then, almost blushing, June jabbed her fork into the cottage cheese once more.

"Who is that man?" she asked her friend, motioning in his general direction.

Her friend looked startled. For months June hadn't shown the slightest interest in anyone remotely resembling a male, but her friend obediently replied, "That's Sy Bartlett."

"Sy Bartlett? The man who wrote Twelve O'Clock High?"

"The very one."

"You know," June sighed. "I'd like to meet him."

That was the moment when June Haver came alive again. Not long after, her friends began to wonder if June Haver was in love again. They hope so; they think so. But sometimes they can't help worrying. . . .

Love means different things to many women. Some measure it by the diamonds in their jewel box; some treat it like an accessory to their winter wardrobe and discard it with each new season. But there are other women whose hearts can be reached by a sudden smile, whose (Continued on page 101)

I called up Betsy Kaplan, another old friend, and I said, "Why don't we go to San Francisco?"

And we went just like that.

We took The Lark out of Los Angeles on Thursday night, feeling as gay as a couple of schoolgirls on their way to a fraternity dance.

"This was a wonderful idea," said Betsy.

This weekend they wanted me to be their guest at The Guardsmen Race, whose proceeds would go toward the camp.

On Friday morning we were standing in the corridor of the train, looking out at Oakland's Bay, a thin wisp of fog away from San Francisco. The Golden Gate Bridge stood in the early light like a giant sentinel. Oh, San Francisco, I thought, how I love you—the sights, the sounds, the smells . . . I was lost in my rhapsodic musings when a voice behind me boomed, "That San Francisco! The worst earthquake couldn't spoil it. The big fire couldn't destroy it. And it's a cinch you can never forget it!"

The voice belonged to a tall, grey-haired man with a military moustache who looked as if he'd done a lot of traveling. If he can feel this way about San Francisco, I said to myself, I guess the lump in my throat is understandable.

I've been to San Francisco before. We staged camp shows there during the war, and some of my friends live there. But it's a funny thing. Every time I get off the train I feel like an explorer. I feel lost in all the excitement. I feel that this is one place in the world where no matter who you are or how much you've seen there's still so much more to learn and experience.

We had quite an experience almost as soon as The Lark glided to a stop. There were no frenzied mobs to greet us—just a few nice children with flowers, and some friendly reporters who took our arrival down for the record. MODERN SCREEN's photographer, Sprague Talbot, waved a greeting. A couple of The Guardsmen welcomed us officially, and then we met Milton Miskel and Bill Williams, two motorcycle policemen. Milt and Bill were very nice, I discovered, but Milt and Bill are also very speed-crazy.

Betsy and I were shown into a shiny convertible with the top down, and as soon as the door was closed behind us, sirens rent the air. I felt like sliding to the bottom of the car, but after all, it was an open car and someone would have noticed. As it was, traffic had stopped and everyone started staring.

"What is it?" I said to Betsy. "What's the matter?"

She smiled at me weakly. "I guess it's us," she said.

It was Milt and Bill, and suddenly I was too busy hanging on to my head to even ask why they needed sirens to take us at seven-thousand miles an hour to the Mark Hopkins Hotel.

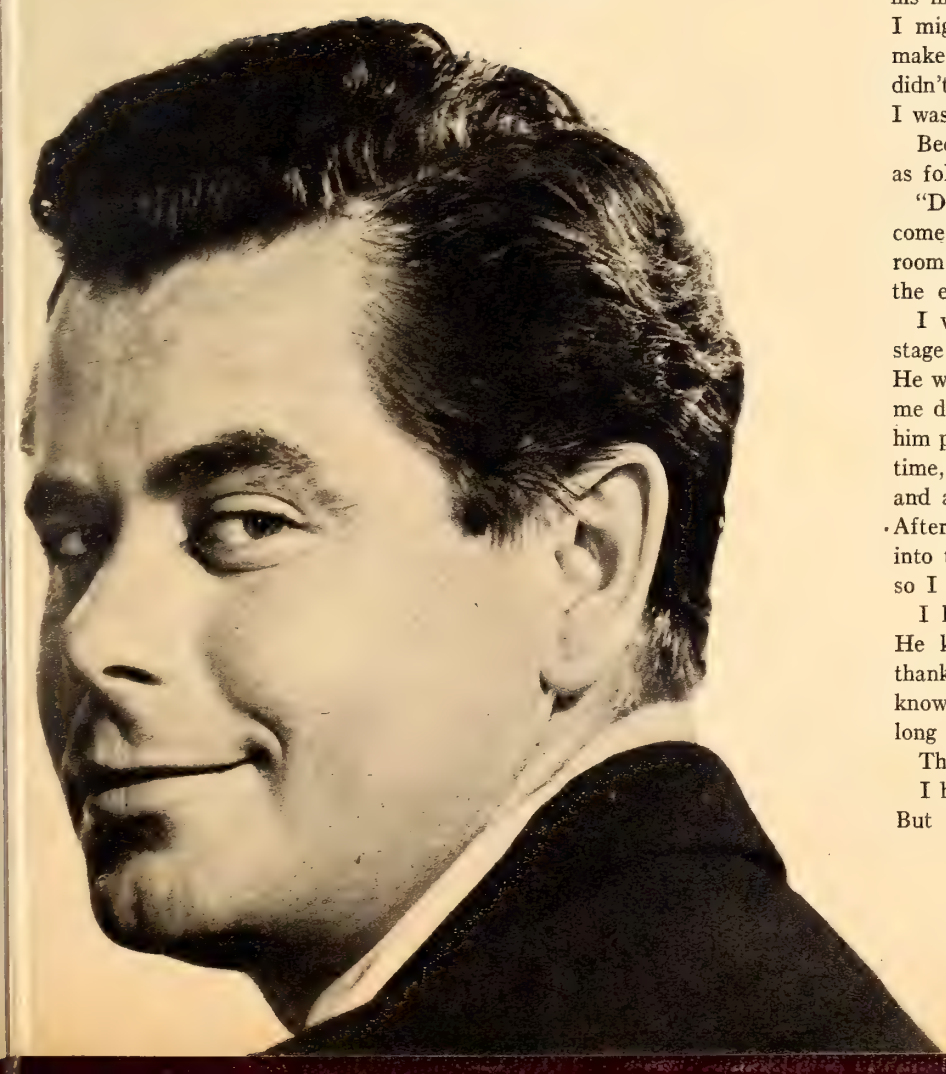
When we got to the hotel we saw a big group of men standing out in front, apparently waiting for someone.

"Why, isn't that sweet," I thought. "All those nice men have come just to greet us."

As it happened all those men had come to stage a drawing of ten names for The Guardsmen Race which was to be held at the Tanforan Track. Each name was to be assigned to a horse in the race and prizes would be given out accordingly to the winners.

Thousands of tickets had been sold for the event, and it was my honor to select the ten names.

After the drawing, Betsy and I attended a welcome luncheon, and I was interviewed by motion picture editors of San Francisco papers. I must have answered dozens of adroitly put questions, and I don't think I can be accused of apple-polishing if I say there's a distinctive, rugged quality to San Francisco newspapers that is typical of the city itself.



The press conference was followed by sightseeing. We wanted to see everything—and anything. We went down to Fisherman's Wharf and wandered around. Sprague Talbot came with us to take pictures—but he had competition. There was a little (Continued on page 84)

I remember when

by Glenn Ford

. . . I measured a man by the size of his reputation. But then I learned that people are only as big as their hearts . . .

■ When I was 19 and getting nowhere in the acting business I wrote a fan letter to two stars. The first star I won't mention by name. I asked him for an autographed photograph. He neither sent it nor acknowledged my letter in any other way. My request to the second star was not so simple. He was Henry Hull whom I had just seen on the stage as Jeeter Lester in Tobacco Road. I was fascinated by his makeup and actually asked him if I might see him personally with the makeup on. That was the letter I didn't think would be answered. But I was wrong.

Because back came a reply reading as follows:

"Dear Mr. Ford, you are most welcome to come backstage to my dressing room anytime after seven o'clock in the evening."

I went. He had left word at the stage door and I was taken to his room. He was without his makeup but he set me down on a chair and let me watch him put it on. He talked to me all the time, explained the technique he used and answered every question I asked. Afterwards he had someone take me into the theater and put me in a seat so I could watch the show again.

I have never seen Mr. Hull since. He knows I was grateful because I thanked him that night. But he doesn't know what went on in my mind for long afterwards.

This was it:

I had always liked him as an actor. But now, (Continued on page 73)

Deceptively small when viewed from the road in Mandeville Canyon, Diana Lynn and John Lindsay's modernistic home is rambling and sunny. Behind that stone exterior are three big bedrooms, a den, three bathrooms, a dining-living room, and a deluxe kitchen. John, an architect, designed the house, fitting it into its natural setting without moving a tree. He brought nature inside, too—via an indoor garde

THEY GET THE SUN IN THE MORNING AND THE MOON AT NIGHT IN THE MODERN HOUSE THAT JOHN BUILT. AND EVE

■ This was their third date. They'd seen a ball game and gone dancing and held hands through a double feature; and now they were sitting in a Beverly Hills restaurant.

First, she was chatty, then she was witty, then she was attentive, waiting for him to talk. But John Lindsay, the young architect, wouldn't. He sat there in his best Brooks Brothers suit, polite and smiling, his thoughts obviously elsewhere.

"Strange guy," Diana Lynn mused.

Suddenly, John sprang to his feet. "Let's get out of here," he said urgently. Diana gulped her coffee and they got out of here.

They hopped into his car and started for the ocean highway. Most Hollywood couples drive there on warm, August nights. A mile from the Pacific, John swung his car onto one of the winding, woody canyon roads that branch off from Sunset Boulevard and disappear into the hills.

"This guy is getting a little corny," thought Diana. "If he comes up with some thing like running out of gas, I'll simp laugh in his face."

John pulled up beside a grove of syc mores, turned off the motor, and reach out. Diana retreated. He laughed. "I just looking for a flashlight," he explain "I want to show you something."

Before Diana could blush, he was out the car, sweeping a beam of light back a forth across a partly-constructed house.

n the back of one of their wool-covered couches, Diana looks toward dining table and candelabra designed by John. The far wall is s Verdes stone—the same stone used on the house's exterior.

A "cook's view" of the living room (through the sliding section between kitchen and dining area) shows the spectacular fireplace. Built into one wall, it's their favorite corner for entertaining.

ether or not Diana's expecting company for dinner, she always dines candlelight. Drawstring curtains conceal the picture-frame windows; r to the kitchen is visible next to shelves on the wall at right.

The service bar between kitchen and dining-living area enables Diana to chat with John and guests while fixing a snack of Royal Crown Cola. Here's a glimpse of her sparkling kitchen.

Come on, I'll explain it to you."

He helped Diana rip her nylons as she gaily jumped over the foundations. "See how this house nestles up against the hill?" he asked excitedly. "I've hardly had to disturb a tree to fit it in. When all the plastering and painting are done, I think I'll plant some fool-proof shrubs like cyclamen and fuchsia and begonia. A month after the house is completed, you won't know it's new. There won't be any of that raw, new look about this place. I've designed it so that it would merge with the natural background. Get the picture?"

Diana, who could barely see two feet in front of her, smiled wanly. "It's just fascinating," she said.

The Lindsays' living room looks into the garden through an almost solid pane of glass. But there's nothing like the real outdoors for playing with their lively dog.

As she looks over some new plans with architect John, Diana nostalgically remembers the days when her house was a mere framework. He calls this den his junk shop.

One whole corner is devoted to Diana's impressive record collection and big Philco radio-phonograph. Out of the camera's range are her music cabinet and piano.

out some sort of interior planting. There's nothing like having a garden inside your house as well as outside."

"That will be real nice," said Diana.

"And another thing," John ran on, "these stone walls that you see. Well, I'm going to make them a structural part of the house. I'm not going to cover the stone with paint or plaster. It's much too beautiful for that. I'm going to let it show. This wall will be part of the den and this one with the fireplace in the middle, completes one end of the living room."

Diana felt it her duty to be interested, intrigued, enraptured, so at this point, she decided it was the propitious time for an intelligent question. She pointed to the floor areas where pipes were zig-zagging all over the place. "Are these the bathrooms?" she asked.

Lindsay's laughter shattered the night air. "All this a bathroom?" he howled. "Why, no, honey, hardly. These pipes are for what is called radiant heating. They're built under the floor. When you turn the heating on, the heat comes up from the bottom, through the floor, and heats the house without causing any drafts. What's more, it's very economical."

"Is that right?" Diana said, ready to cry. "Economical, and no drafts. Right up from the floor . . ."

"And that's not all, either," her date continued. "This house is jammed with the latest economical system. Take the electrical system. All the light outlets are on a bell cord and the current runs at a low frequency rate which can be stepped up by a transformer when it's needed. This house has an awful lot of wiring, but the bills will be cut in half by this low frequency system."

"Oh, brother," Diana thought, "what is he talking about?" Finally, she took a deep breath, and plunged. "John," she said, "how many rooms has this house got?"

"Three bedrooms, three baths and a den," he explained. "It sounds large but a young couple could live in it very reasonably. The kitchen is small and compact. A girl could do all her work by just pushing buttons. All she'd have to do is put the children out on the patio and watch them through the large window." And then, just as suddenly as he'd begun his lecture, John Lindsay stopped. "It's late," he said. "I'd better be taking you home."

In the months that followed, John and Diana had other dates, only they were of a more conventional nature. She invited him to buffet suppers at her bachelorette apartment where they ate and talked about each other. She introduced him to her family, and he presented her to his. They didn't say any more about the house.

Very cleverly and in easy stages, Diana let John find out what sort of life a young actress leads: the tight schedules, the demands of the publicity departments, the confabs with agents, directors, and studio executives. She mixed this up with a little piano-playing; and exactly four months from the day they met, the inevitable happened. On December 18th, 1948, in the Healy Chapel at the University of Southern California, Diana Loehr (that's her real name) became Mrs. John Lindsay.

A three-week honeymoon in New York followed and then they went back to Beverly Hills where they rented a cute little cottage at an astronomical rent. Diana tried to be a patient and efficient housewife, but in those cramped quarters, it was tough. Her gowns and his (Continued on page 92)

Diana has put her wedding silver behind sliding glass panels in the dining area. It's always on display here, yet remains untarnished and ready for immediate use.

When John's busy in his studio, Diana can still talk to him from the living room via the two-way Webster electric telephone speaker system linking all rooms.

The master bedroom is a triumph of beauty over economy—drapes are sailcloth, bed merely box springs on legs.

Betty steps out

Anything you can do, she can do more of—the dancing, the singing, the dissolving in tears. That's Hutton—the hoyden, the fiery angel.

BY JIM HENAGHAN

■ A handsome actor, who would rather keep his name to himself, took Betty Hutton out on a simple date a few years ago. He appeared at his studio the next morning obviously shaken from the experience. When quizzed for details of the evening's fun, he said warily, "I'd rather not discuss it. There is one thing, though. Along about eleven o'clock the situation becomes tense, and you're not quite sure whether she's going to marry you right on the spot, dissolve into a mist of tears, or just plain explode and get all over everybody."

Try to pin an appropriate label on this girl and your choice is as good as anyone's. Take all the fancy phrases ever used, hook any one of them on Hutton and it'll fit—Blonde Bombshell, Bouncing Beauty, Sad Sandra, Moody Myrtle, Bitter Betty, Marvelous Mama. To make up a brand new word, Betty Hutton is an enigma.

Hollywood was introduced to Betty at the Paramount studios via a musical called The Fleet's In. The set was a studio designer's idea of a battleship and there was a large stage on which a hundred or so performers were just about ready to burst into song and dance in a producer's idea of the gay life in the United States Navy. Half a dozen cameras were set up at strategic positions ready to capture the action. The director was absent at the moment as none of the principals were involved in the scene, and the shot was in the hands of an assistant director. He turned to his assistant and said:

"Where's that new girl? What's her name—Button?"

Recently in New York, Betty planned on doing the town—came down with a virus instead. She spent most of her time in her Plaza suite with Lindsay and Candy.

it's Mutton—and here she comes now," the second assistant whispered.

Betty Hutton, her head down, a suspicious, doleful expression on her face, came into the set and took a pre-determined position at the front of the stage. The man with the megaphone shouted a few last minute instructions and ordered the action to get underway.

The music started, the sailors began to sing and dance and it seemed as though somebody had whacked the new girl across the backside with the carving edge of a sabre. Howling at the top of her lungs, she began to leap high in the air and from one side of the stage to the other like a spring fly that had just made an emergency landing on a pancake griddle. There was a moment of uncertainty during which all of the assistant directors exchanged puzzled glances. Finally, one gathered his wits.

"HOLD IT! HOLD IT!" he howled. "What the devil is going on up there?"

THE action simmered down and the head man walked to Betty.

"Is there something the matter with you?" he asked.

"Certainly not," said Betty. "I feel fine."

"You're supposed to be a singer," said the director. "What's all that jumping around?"

"That's how I sing," said Betty belligerently.

"Well, try and keep it down," said the director, "so we can get you in the picture."

Eleven hundred dollars worth of film later five jibbering cameramen held a meeting and called Buddy De Sylva, the studio production head. Somebody was out to get them was their complaint. A total of a hundred and nine years service in Hollywood they had, and they couldn't get a clear shot of a silly stage full of sailors. Every time the music started, some girl began to leap like a dervish and the whole thing became blurred.

"That would be Hutton," said De Sylva. "Tell you what to do. Just keep all of the cameras on her. Don't pay any attention to anybody else. We might as well realize right now that nobody is going to ignore Betty."

And that's practically the way it has been ever since.

There is an emotional instinct in Betty Hutton that rules her life, passes beyond normalcy and makes of her a thing removed from lesser mortals. It inspires her work, forbids ordinary friendship—with her it's either complete love or bitter hatred—and fouls up her romantic life completely. She has been pictured many times as a simple housewife, tolerantly capable in the domestic scene, and apt at stoking a man's pipe and carrying his slippers. Hogwash! Pipes and slippers, phooey! If her home isn't a madhouse she's sick. If she likes a guy, she'll settle for nothing less than washing his hair, doing his laundry, filling his teeth and making him an overcoat. If she doesn't like him, he'd better keep his door locked, for she is likely to conk him, cut him up in little pieces and feed him to some cats.

VICTOR MATURE could tell you about the maudlin Hutton. Betty, Victor will tell you, has a heart closer to the surface than anyone he has ever met. On his first date with her a few years ago, they dined with another couple at a Hollywood restaurant. At the end of dinner, it was decided that they would all go to Vic's new house for a nightcap. They set out in separate cars. Vic arrived last and shut off the car lights in the driveway. A soft flow of music came from the speaker of the radio and Betty and Vic sat for a moment to hear the tune through. A speck of dust flew in Vic's eye and he rubbed it. A half hour later they went inside, both of them sniffling and red-eyed.

Afraid that something terrible had happened, Vic's friend pulled him aside into another room.

"What's the matter with you?" he asked. "What have you two been crying about?"

"I don't know," said Mature. "Some dust flew in my eye and I guess I rubbed it too hard. When I turned to Betty, she saw it and said, 'Why, honey, you're crying.' She burst into tears, then I did, and we've both been sitting out there ever since weeping like a couple of lost kids. I don't know what came over me."

Most of the guys who meet Betty Hutton have no idea what comes over them, either. One chap described it as, "It's sort of like being engulfed—if there is such a word. She's the sweetest thing you ever met. Wants to go dutch at dinner and things like that. And when you dance with her, you feel as though she needs you. Then somebody hits a hot lick on a trumpet and you have to hang on or go flying off into space. And on the way home, you're not sure whether to call a cab—or go swinging off through the tree tops. She's just, well, different, (Continued on page 83)

but Hollywood has itself to blame for a reputation that the public refuses to forget.

What the public fails to realize is that Hollywood has changed, and so have the people in it. (The next six pages are devoted to an analysis of morals in Hollywood.)

Senator Edwin C. Johnson of Colorado let loose with one of the most recent blasts against the screen colony. Having been shockingly hurt by Ingrid Bergman's conduct, the senator announced that Hollywood was turning out Communist propaganda in return for free dope which Chinese Reds were supplying. He also urged that all screen stars be thoroughly investigated and licensed.

This prompted Georgie Jessel, the unofficial toastmaster-general of the motion picture industry, to utter these pithy words: "Here is a man who says that because a Swedish girl and an Italian man have fallen violently in love—Ethel Barrymore should stand in line to apply for a license to act."

In his forcible comment, Jessel pointed up the gross unfairness in seeking to punish all movie stars for the transgressions of a reckless few.

Probably the most honest evaluation of screen personalities ever made is contained in the dialogue of a forthcoming motion picture, All About Eve. Joseph Mankiewicz, an outstanding writer-director who wrote the play, has (Continued on page 91)

This is about Judy—a little girl whose ambition came too soon, grew too fast, a woman paying for too much fame . . .

BY JIM BURTON

the brutal truth about judy garland

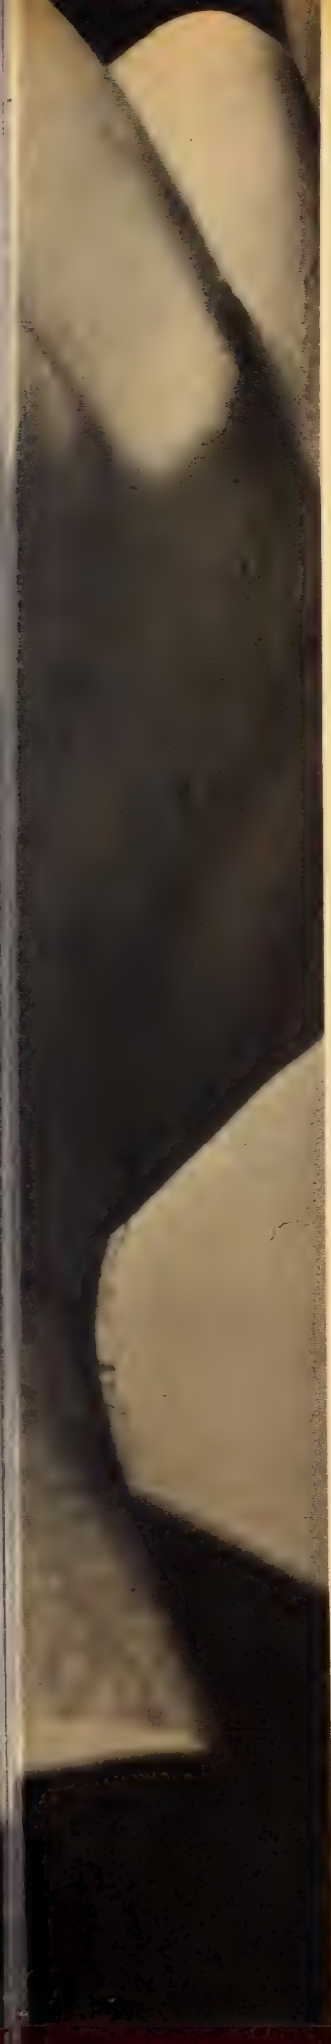
Judy married Vincente Minnelli (here with baby Liza) in 1945. There were many rumors of separation, but he remains loyal.

Carleton Alsop, Judy's agent, stuck by her side when she went to Brigham hospital after suffering a nervous collapse.

■ By this time everyone has read of the night in June when Judy Garland broke a glass tumbler and jabbed it into her throat. The action was met with many responses—shock, sympathy, horror, contempt. The sympathetic wondered how a 29-year-old woman who was acclaimed by many critics as perhaps the most talented actress in Hollywood could so hit the depth of tragedy. The contemptuous sneered, "it was just a put-up job for publicity's sake." An MGM official stated that Judy had "pretended suicide on at least ten other previous occasions." And her own doctor, Francis Ballard, called the incident an "impulsive act to attract attention."

Whatever the cause, whatever the intent of that act, it became obvious that Judy Garland is an extremely confused and troubled woman.

Only a year ago, Katharine Hepburn, her good friend, said, "Judy, if you don't quit this wild kick you're going to wind up a suicide."



What wild kick? Why suicide? What are the problems of Judy's life that make her unable to cope with the present and to face the future?

The cause goes back through many years and many stories. You can even say it started when she was three years old and was plunged into the erratic, exacting and public life of the vaudeville performer. But if you want to start a little later you can go back to the time when she was a plump teenager and it was said that she was madly in love with a producer, a married man. He regarded her as a sweet, precocious child and his attitude was distinctly paternal. Judy, however, was supposedly lost in passion, and she wore her heart on her Sloppy Joe sweater for all the world to smile at.

The world did smile, and the stories began and made the rounds. Each time a different producer's name was used, and each time the story got back to Judy. The first crush, the first heartbreak wasn't allowed to be forgotten. There are some who say that this unrequited love led to a sleeping pill-benzedrine cycle and marital and professional discord. There are others who deny this; these others say that the cause for Judy's (Continued on page 70)

the story robert mitchum never told

He never looked for breaks; he never got them. He grew up like a lot of other kids—with fate laughing at him. He grew up trying to escape a world he hadn't made . . .

BY STEVE CRONIN

■ It happened in Chicago several months ago. Robert Mitchum ambled into a night club discreetly followed by his bodyguard, a bulk of muscle named Kemp Niver.

Patrons looked up, caught sight of Mitchum, and began whispering to their neighbors. An ominous air of expectancy filled the room.

Mitchum sat down at a table. He took in the room with a glance like a lasso. In a minute he knew why people were talking.

Less than five tables away from him sat Lila Leeds; she was dressed in a gown that fit like a sunburn. With her was her fiance, young Gus Arvey, son of the Chicago political boss, Jake Arvey.

Mitchum hadn't laid eyes on Lila for months, since that fateful day when they'd both been sentenced to serve ninety days in the Los Angeles County jail for possessing marijuana cigarettes.

The patrons tried not to stare. They just couldn't resist the temptation. What was going to happen? Would Bob go over to Lila's table? Would she come to his? Would they even acknowledge each other? Their eyes focussed first on Mitchum, then on Lila.

Suddenly, a thin, sallow-faced man with dull, flat eyes edged up to Mitchum's bodyguard. He spoke softly and with menacing deliberation.

"The boys and I," he said, "want a grand."

Mitchum's bodyguard played dumb. "A grand for what?" he asked. He moved away, and the racketeer followed.

When they reached the lobby, the sallow-faced man explained the setup. "A lot of the boys are in the joint tonight. Your boy's on pro (Mitchum was placed on probation for two years at the time of his sentence). He can't afford a scene. We start a fight, and he may wind up pulling a stretch at San Quentin. Let's have a grand, and everything is very peaceful."

Kemp Niver is a shrewd man. A former private detective, he knows how to handle himself in the clinches.

"Look," he said, "I don't carry that kind of dough on me. (Continued on page 86)

Most of Hollywood's stars deserve good conduct medals, but there are a few who'll never learn to behave. No one knows why—except maybe Hedda Hopper who gives them the once over—and not so lightly.

why they get in

by hedda hopper

■ Not too long ago, I collared a startled young man at Ciro's in Hollywood and gave him a piece of my mind. Married and a father, he was chasing around with Hollywood's glamor girls and making a fool of himself and I told him so. "If you know what's good for you, you'll go back to Nancy as fast as you can and beg her forgiveness," I told him. "Why, nobody's ever talked to me like that before," gasped Frank Sinatra. "You're right, Hedda. I'll call home right now." And he did.

Yet, just a few weeks ago, back from Spain, and this time in world headlines for that same kind of irresponsible philandering, Frankie called me up, as he always does when he's in some trouble or other.

"Why do people take cracks at me all the time?" he complained petulantly. "What have I done wrong anyway?"

"Come, come now, Frankie," I sighed. "Certainly you can't be that dumb!" Patiently I pointed out what should be obvious to a schoolboy: that when a married man with a family, celebrity or not, involves himself publicly in international scandal, gives his lady love kisses, and diamonds with money that should go to his wife and kids, he's asking for trouble in a very loud voice.

One day about four years ago, I put in a long distance call from Hollywood to the Waldorf-Astoria in New York and asked for Bing Crosby who was there on a vacation without Dixie. "He won't answer his phone and the door's locked," I was told by the hotel publicity man.

"Go up to that door," I told him, "and knock as loud as you can and say that Hedda Hopper sent you. Tell Bing I say to get home fast to his wife or he won't have a home or a wife either."

Bing wrote a six page letter thanking me for that. And on his next trip, a few months later, he took Dixie along. I called Bob Stack's starring role in Torero may be the turning point of his career. He practices for hours before a mirror with a toreador's cape.

Society boy, rich man's son— that's how they tagged Bob Stack. The label stuck hard, but Bob worked it off, and he's nobody's playboy now!

BY TOM CARLILE

WHEN Bob Stack first started working in motion pictures in 1939, he was a modest, handsome young man with a nice personality and a big, boyish grin. He was just 20 years old when he made First Love opposite Deanna Durbin, but already, the record of his other accomplishments read like a chapter out of the Sports Almanac. He wasn't offensive about it, but it was pretty obvious that all his life he'd had a burning desire to excel in everything he undertook.

At 12, with his brother Jim, he'd won the International Motor Championship at Venice, Italy. At 16, he was an All-American Skeet champion and a crack pistol shot. At 17, he played brilliant, hard-driving polo for the U.S.C. polo team, and gave up the sport only after breaking his mallet wrist for the third time. His house was overflowing with cups and trophies which he'd won in his speed-boat.

Bob tackled a movie career with the same sort of intensity. Immediately after First Love was released everyone in Hollywood took notice. "Who is this guy Stack?" they asked.

The people who answered that question were cynical sharpshooters who made a business of knocking everyone.

"Oh, he's a society boy," they said. "Son and heir of J. Langford Stack, the advertising man." Then they'd add knowingly, "You know the type, a rich man's son—shoots skeet all day long."

People naturally swallowed the idea that he was a playboy, in movies for the fun of it. One story even got around that he was in the business just to meet some pretty girls.

Even though he didn't flaunt his money, or leave it in nightclubs, even though he was pleasant and friendly with everyone he knew on the set, the playboy label stuck to him like rubber cement.

A thousand nights in summer stock are finally paying dividends to ambitious Nancy Davis.

■ Nancy Davis was one of those kids who wouldn't walk unless it was on a stage. She went through Smith College with her mind on Broadway. Every summer she'd go into stock and sweep the theater. After a while she got lines. Winters she invaded producers' offices like a bill collector. The day came when an MGM scout came across. He took her to Hollywood, for The Next Voice You Hear.

Success turned their heads—toward each other. And what they saw, they liked. Now Betty and Larry Parks are building their future together . . .

In five years they filled tho pockets. In five years they fell in love, g married, had a son, saw their names spell out in blazing lights.

From the outside he doesn't look unusual—except that he's taller than most (6 feet 2) and handsomer than most. He has an intense way of looking at you when you talk, a way that makes it very easy for you to feel that you two were meant for each other. . . . But there is something very unusual about Farley Granger. It's the way he set himself a goal when he was just a high school kid, and the way he stuck to that goal. He wanted to be an actor, and nothing else would satisfy him or take its place.

When you start getting romantic about him, when you start pairing him off with Shelley Winters, or Joan Evans or anyone else you have to contend first with this—his wild and soaring imagination, his overwhelming ambition that's always far ahead of him, an ambition that only a very rare woman can run fast enough to beat.

His mother had joked about him before he was born. She was thirty when he came along, after thirteen years of marriage and no babies. The girls kidded her about it on the golf course where she was a near champ.

"An athlete like you," they teased. "And at your age. Well—too bad—you'll never break eighty now!"

"That's all right," she grinned. "You can have your golf. I'll have a genius."

Maybe he didn't turn out to be a genius. Maybe he turned out to be just a lively kid with black ringlets and doe eyes. But before long he began to feel that everything in the world had to be touched and known and possessed by him.

He attended a private school and when he was six he was in a Christmas play. He had only a couple of lines to say, but he knew everybody else's part, and he substituted for two boys who got sick.

"He's an amazing little actor," his teacher said.

Actor? His mother suddenly remembered that she'd always longed to act when she was a girl, and she wondered if it were possible that in San Jose where they lived, where acting was hardly ever mentioned, her son could pick up a dream that had been buried, and shape it to himself. . . .

His mother helped him. She let him swipe her old velvet dresses and make costumes for the puppets he kept in the garage. She helped him even more. As the years went on, she let him go his own way. She let him take his disappointments on the chin without rushing for band-aid. When he was old enough to want to live alone, she picked out an apartment.

Girls always liked him. But when he was in his teens it was the older women he admired—from a distance. A bunch of guys from high school used to load into an old jalopy on Saturdays and breeze off, puffing forbidden cigars, on their way to Main Street in Los Angeles. They'd take in the popular burlesque beauties at the Follies Theater. They'd whistle and clap, and it was plain to see that they were men of the world. Unless someone from home happened to spy them. . . .

Young girls had a funny effect on him. They paralyzed him. He worshipped one little blonde in junior high who caused him particular anguish. She was pretty, shy and sweet. When he gathered up enough nerve—and cash—he took her to the movies, but he was always afraid to hold her hand. The minute this shy flower got to high school and met older boys she went wild. "Turned into the jazziest babe in school," Farley recalls. "It was a terrific shock to me."

When he was in North Star he met Jane Withers. He was 18 and she was his ideal. They went dancing at the Palladium; they went crazy together over the big name bands. But everytime they got to talking, it was about acting only.

He met June Haver next, while working in The Purple Heart. They used to go to her house and raid the ice-box. Then the war came along, and when he was stationed in Honolulu he sent her a hula skirt. Once, he wrote, "Get out the highest platform shoes you own because we're going dancing as soon as I get home." They went dancing, but that was all. . . .

Cathy O'Donnell was his co-star in They Live By Night, and they looked so good together on the screen, people thought they should be together off screen, too, but Farley and Cathy didn't think so.

Besides, important things happened to Farley after They Live By Night. The movie won artistic raves wherever it played. The Encyclopedia Britannica Yearbook named him the most promising new star of 1949, along with Montgomery Clift. Alfred Hitchcock wanted him for Rope. Since then Farley hasn't had much time on his hands.

Anyway, he took his first trip to New York. He'd never been east of Palm Springs before. The first week he was too excited to sleep. He walked all over Manhattan, stood in Times Square and let the crowds swirl around him. He took in every tourist trip, ferried around the Island, saw the Statue of Liberty, Radio City. He stepped from matinees to buy his evening performance ticket, and all alone, he saw every play on and off Broadway. He discovered the Museum of Modern Art, the opera, the ballet, Carnegie Hall, Greenwich Village and Greenwich, Connecticut. He stayed two months, and it affected him profoundly. He brought home a new idea of the world he lived in.

Then he was back East again to make Side Street, exploring the rest of the city he hadn't had time to see. After that, he flew to Mexico City, Taxco, Cuernavaca, Acapulco for as long as he could stay before Our Very Own.

In Our Very Own, there was Joan Evans. And Farley treated her like a younger sister. When they went out together he took over—the time, the place, the evening. When Our Very Own was finished he sent her the largest bouquet of all. Once, after another movie they did together, the director threw a party at a restaurant across the street from the studio, and everyone rushed over—except Joan. She waited on the set for Farley, and they went together. And for people who like to speculate about romance, there are these two who aren't saying anything—or who may not have anything to say, because after Edge of Doom, Farley rushed to New York again to see his city friends—Betty Comden, George Coulouris, Judy Holliday, Leonard Bernstein, Adolph Green. He wanted to go on to Europe but he didn't have time.

Today Farley has well-worn symphony records on the crowded shelves which stretch around the room of his smart, modern Hollywood apartment. He has reproductions on his walls of his favorite Manhattan views, an original by Diego Rivera of a Taxco boy's head, mobile sculpture from the Museum of Modern Art. He has well-thumbed collections of art books and classic literature. And he has Shelley Winters for his girl.

They met at a party. Shelley was being the life of it, and Farley was sitting in a corner. "He looked just the way I felt," she said later. "He looked very shy and very scared."

On one of their first dates they went to The Players, and Shelley, who knew all the waiters, took things into her own hands and ordered the meal. Farley relaxed. He always relaxes with her.

"She's wonderful for me," he admits. "She wakes me up and makes me laugh. She's an extrovert—I'm not. We're interested in exactly the same things—music, art and acting. We both love acting. Shelley's a very bright girl and fascinating. We can talk for hours on end."

He likes to talk—although not in crowds. Once, Shelley was attending a party and left word at home for Farley to call her there. The hostess answered the phone and invited him over. He declined, and asked her to tell Shelley that he'd come by for her.

"Fine," said the hostess. "Then you can drop in for a minute."

"Well, no," said Farley. "I'll just stop out front and honk the horn."

He stopped out front, and honked, but Shelley didn't want to leave the party, so Farley just drove home and read a book and went to bed.

When he's in the mood, though, Shelley spins him around Hollywood on gay evenings, and fun with his friends, most of them older than Farley—like Gene and Betsy Kelly. "They can teach me things I don't know," he explains.

So with Shelley he learns about the world, and now he's looking for a house. "But not because I'm getting married, at least, not for a while," he hurries to explain. "I'm not ready to settle down, not nearly. I haven't been a bachelor long enough. I've got so many things to see and places to go. I've got to travel. I want to make a picture and then get out of town. Not because I don't like Hollywood, but—well—I didn't go to college and the world's got to be my college. I've got to find out everything there is to know that I've missed. And I can't get it second-hand."

The ladies may have to wait, because there is this feeling in him which can't be denied—the same feeling which made him a star, and which makes the ladies pine. . . .

But whatever the truth may have been the stories never let up in their ferocity.

Recently a rumor was circulated that Judy is still carrying a torch for her first husband, the composer David Rose.

One of Judy's friends even went so far as to say, "I think that secretly Judy would still like to be married to David . . . Her memories of him, after she got her divorce grew warmer and richer as time went on, and, eventually, she remembered only the good things about their life together. She began to want him back, but it was too late, the divorce had been secured, and she was going with Vincente.

"She'd tried to fall in love with care, slowly and gently, but she has an ardent nature, and so has Minnelli; and they got married very quickly. I think it was a week after Judy's divorce from Dave became final. They hardly had time to know each other well."

JUDY still talks of her first husband with affection, but it's hard to believe that she's still in love with him. David's been married three times. He's nervous, taut, and temperamental. So is Judy, and that's why they couldn't get along.

But, as so many divorcees do, Judy chose a second husband who was very much like her first.

Ben Vincente Minnelli is basically an artist, with the volatile temperament of a perfectionist. Judy fell in love with him on the set of Meet Me in St. Louis. It was he who helped her make the difficult transition from child to adult roles.

It is difficult now to tell whether Judy was attracted by the man or the director. She and Minnelli were constantly together on the set. He was instructing her and she was taken by his knowledge, his understanding, his gentleness. One night when she was out with her sisters, she tried to explain him, but all she could do was squeal ecstatically. "Vincente is just wonderful. He understands everything I do and just how I should do it."

The sisters wanted to know more. Where did he come from? Was he kind? Did the two of them have much in common?

Judy told them all she knew. He was older, maybe ten years older than she, but he knew the sort of life she had lived, because he'd been through it himself. His folks like hers, had been show people. As a boy, Vincente had toured with a tent show. Later, he became art director for the Radio City Music Hall in New York. After that, he came to Hollywood.

Judy's sisters were impressed. "I've never seen her any happier," one of them recalled, "than on the night she was telling us about Vincente. The Sunday after that, she was married at mother's house."

Nine months later, Judy gave birth to her daughter, Liza, an appealing baby with her dad's high forehead and her mother's facial contour.

It was after the arrival of the child that Judy's mental, physical, and marital troubles became apparent.

AT first, the doctors thought it was a normal but delayed reaction to childbirth. Judy began to lose weight, body tone, her natural exuberance. Her eyes, once bright, became dull and sad. Her voice, extremely powerful, took on a trembling quality. And, she began to worry about everything, the baby, Vincente, her house, her career. One day she went over to see her sister Jimmie.

"I'm petrified," she told Jimmie, seriously.

"About what?"

"About Fred Astaire. I'm working with him in Easter Parade."

"That's nothing to be scared about," Jimmie said.

"Yes, it is," Judy answered. "He's a perfectionist. He really is. They tell me that if you sit down for a few minutes he hates you, that he picks you up and makes you keep dancing."

Judy was genuinely worried. She needn't have been. Astaire is one of the most considerate actors in the motion picture business. During the making of Easter Parade he showed Judy every possible courtesy, let her take all the rest she wanted, and told newspapermen that she was the equal of any dancing partner he had ever had.

During the making of the film, however, Judy continued to worry. She couldn't sleep at nights. Her husband became distraught. This, in turn, made her more anxious, more fretful, more sleepless. She began to think that she couldn't please Astaire, she couldn't please Vincente, she couldn't please herself.

At this point, a Hollywood scandal sheet began running a series of sensation columns on Judy and seconal pills, the implication being that Judy was addicted to them. This was sheer nonsense. The only thing Judy's ever been addicted to has been her career.

When the stories broke about Judy and her sleeping pills, she was enraged. "I can't understand it," she stormed. "I've never even seen the man who's been writing that stuff. I've never seen him in my whole life. My health is fine. Really it is. You just call my doctor, and ask him what sort of condition I'm in."

The doctor was circumspect and smooth. "Miss Garland is in fine health," he said. "In fact, she weighs more than she has in years. True, she's been nervous. True, she's taken a sleeping pill or two. But her physical condition is excellent."

A few weeks later, just after her studio publicity department had told reporters that Judy was in the pink of condition, the announcement was made that Ginger Rogers would replace her in The Barkleys of Broadway, and Walter Winchell broadcast that Judy was en route to a sanitarium in Boston.

Judy's explanation was, "I stayed out of The Barkleys of Broadway at the request of L. B. Mayer. Mr. Mayer knows I've done three tough musicals in a row, and he suggested that I take a vacation."

At MGM it's been Mayer's policy to treat stars with kid gloves. At a time when the publicity boys were vociferously denying Judy's ill health, Mayer was talking to Judy in his office. He recognized at once that she wasn't a well girl, but he didn't bawl her out. He is too much of a gentleman for that. He's always regarded Judy as he would his own niece, and he's bent over backwards to give her every break. Mayer had told her to take a rest, not to worry, that she had earned his respect and support, that he was interested only in her health, that as soon as she recovered, she would be starred again.

Judy was thrilled. She was going to rid herself of all those unnecessary fears. To her, such medications as dexedrine and seconal would be academic items.

Judy took a vacation. In a few months she came back to Hollywood and heatedly denied that she and her husband were separating. One week before she started working on Annie Get Your Gun, though, she changed her mind, "I'm sorry to say it, but Vincente and I have come to the realization that we're happier apart. We've separated. We both tried very hard to conquer the difficulties of incompatibility. But it just didn't work out." Judy moved out of Vincente's house and rented a place of her own in Beverly Hills.

She then began work on Annie Get Your Gun, a film she wanted to make more than any other. During the making of this picture, she went completely to pieces. She took a stimulant or two. It buoyed her up. At the same time, it made sleep difficult. She took a sedative or two for relaxation. The medications acted against each other. She began to lose more weight.

At the studio, she snubbed people, people she had known all her life. She was late for fittings, late for rehearsals, she kept entire crews waiting. Arthur Freed, her producer who's loved her as a daughter for more than a dozen years, was kind, and tolerant.

But Judy didn't improve. She got steadily worse. When they took her off the picture, she was on the verge of a complete nervous breakdown, and she weighed less than ninety pounds.

Once again, L. B. Mayer came to her aid. It was he who insisted that the studio pay all of Judy's expenses to the Peter Bent Brigham Hospital in Boston. He was interested solely in Judy's health. He said nothing about the fact that her illness would cost MGM thousands of dollars, that everything would have to be scrapped, and a successor found for Judy's part. (The successor as you all know was Betty Hutton.) According to the records, Judy weighed 88 pounds when she arrived at the Peter Bent Brigham Hospital for a complete checkup. Dr. Augustus Rose who took care of Judy, will of course, reveal nothing of her illness or treatment.

She was checked into the hospital and after a few days of preliminary tests, permitted to come and go as she pleased between the hospital and the Hotel Ritz Carlton.

Carleton Alsop, her agent and an old friend, used to call for her each afternoon and take her to the ball game or to Lexington to see the Revolutionary War memorials or down to the Cape. He made certain that she was in bed, back at the hospital, by eleven.

Gradually, Judy began to add weight. As a youngster, she was always on the plumpish side, and once again she reverted to type. She began to fill out. In two months, she was back to 109 pounds and in fine spirits.

"I want to get back to work," she told her doctors.

The doctors advised her not to make a picture for fifteen months. But Judy wouldn't listen. She was sure that her mental and physical health was superb.

Back she came to Hollywood. She and Vincente effected a reconciliation. They gave up their old house and rented a new one on Sunset Boulevard. She shouldn't have, but Judy insisted upon playing the lead in Summer Stock opposite Gene Kelly. She wanted to show everyone that she was the Judy Garland of old, the same bouncing, bubbling, effervescent kid from Minnesota.

When she reported to the studio for work, she proved herself to be a game trouper. The prop men and electricians, the gaffers and girls up at wardrobe said they'd never seen her in better shape.

For a month of actual shooting, Judy was great, and then suddenly that former neurosis of hers began to plague her. A director would ask her to go through a scene, and she would begin to cry. Black circles started to appear beneath her eyes. She became sick again, and Summer Stock became a nightmare.

During the last week of shooting, she was beside herself with worry. She knew she was cracking and at the same time, she tried to control herself. "Cripes," she said to her director, "let's make this one a take before they come and throw the net over me." She was joking, of course, but she felt her strength ebbing.

She finished Summer Stock and suffered a relapse. But then she took a new hold on herself.

When Judy found out that June Allyson was pregnant and couldn't play opposite Fred Astaire in Royal Wedding, she asked to be given the part. "I'm in wonderful shape," she told her bosses, "and I want you to let me prove it."

Arthur Freed, who's produced so many of Judy's musicals in the past, was only too happy to give her the chance.

A FEW weeks before the movie was to start, Judy and her husband's physician, Dr. Ballard, drove up to Monterey so that Judy could accumulate energy.

When she came back it seemed that everything would be fine. Judy went through rehearsals gaily. It's said that whenever she met anyone on the lot or in the commissary she'd shout. "I'm back at work . . . I'm back at work!"

Then a song rehearsal was called for 10 o'clock Saturday morning. The rehearsal was to last an hour. Judy didn't show up. She was promptly suspended; her $5,500 a week salary was cancelled.

Judy was hurt beyond belief. That weekend she brooded over the incident until she reached the bleakest depression. On Monday night, her agent, Alsop came over, and with him and her husband Judy discussed her career. Suddenly, Judy got up and dashed out of the room. She went into the bathroom and stood before the mirror and only she knows the tortured thoughts that raced through her mind—the thought that perhaps her career was finished, that she was a failure.

Sensing danger, Minnelli left the living room and called Judy. She didn't answer. He called again; he knocked on the bathroom door, he pleaded with Judy to open it. She unlocked the door and it opened slightly. Minnelli rushed in and found Judy bleeding from the throat. He picked her up, carried her to the bedroom and called the doctor.

Dr. Ballard announced that the wound was superficial and declared it the result of melancholy and mild hysteria.

Now that the incident is over, judgments are being made. They say that Judy should never have attempted to work; they say that the studio was too harsh.

MGM defended itself by issuing a 600-word statement. "We did everything we could to make her comfortable and keep her happy," the statement said in part. It is estimated that the studio has spent more than $100,000 on doctors, hospitals and various types of treatment to improve Judy's health.

"Several times, against our better judgment, at her insistence, we have started films with her, and her consequent illness has caused us embarrassment, delay, inconvenience and loss of morale to coworkers. . . ." The statement also emphasized that her suspension from Royal Wedding was "not a hasty move, prompted by pique or irritation," but was "arrived at with greatest regret."

Few outsiders are qualified to draw conclusions about the affair, or to predict Judy's future. While she made movies for MGM, her movies always made money, and she was one of their most valuable properties.

Only time will tell whether she will work for them or for anyone else again. Meanwhile, a great talent is being submerged in a sea of illness and despair.

(Continued from page 39) sitting in the eater after our meeting, I knew him also a man. And how much bigger he oked to me now, how much more stature e had! Why? I puzzled about it . . . d then it came to me.

The amount of man in a man is the most portant thing about him. The star who dn't bothered to answer me was simply dazzled by himself. A little fame, a tle money, had done the trick. To be bedazzled is nothing more than kidding urself. There is no sillier looking, no ore foolish human than one who is ilty of this, and the whole world even a child instinctively knows it and ows that such pomposity is absurd. Mr. ull was somebody before as well as after me. To me, to all who know him, he ill always be somebody. He looked big ecause he was big.

DON'T often give myself a headache trying to puzzle things out—not often ough, anyway. But I have never forgot- n this little analysis of human values. ow and then it gets me in a sort of a mess. ut I can't get it out of my mind and I do y to live by it.

I wonder if I am making myself clear. am not only the man I am today, but I n also the fellow I was yesterday. I am ot only Glenn Ford of Hollywood but also wylln Ford who barely used to earn ffee and cake in shows that flopped om San Francisco to New York and many town in between. When I sit down to ast beef these nights I can't forget the llow who spent his last 15 cents on pump- n pie à la mode in a New York automat a Christmas Eve 1938 . . . then walked ty blocks south to Greenwich Village here some friends had kindly provided a ee bed. When I see somebody getting cked around today it's as if the fellow used to be is getting kicked, too.

Not long ago there was a story about me a fan magazine that began something ke this: "What's happened to Glenn Ford? e got into a row with one of the police- en over at MGM studios. Is he get- ng too big for his boots? Et cetera and cetera . . ."

Well, it was the same old thing again. did get into a row with the policeman. ut the motivation behind my actions was mething no one bothered to ask about.

I was stopped at the gate because I dn't have a pass. I asked if I could one my producer for an okay. I knew e gate policeman hadn't recognized me t in such a position you don't always el like identifying yourself. You can agine saying, "I'm Glenn Ford. I'm arring in the picture on stage six," and u can hear the gateman replying, "Yeah? what? You still need a pass!" See hat I mean?

Up to that moment everything was rmal. We were just talking and I wasn't tting anywhere in particular, at least t getting inside that gate, when another udio policeman walked up who did recog- ze me. He told his fellow officer who epped aside and waved me inside. And en it happened. As I walked by this ap who hadn't known me he said, "I'm rry, Mr. Ford. I thought you were just ne of the extras."

THAT did it. I stopped short. What a thing to say! What a slur on a group people without whom there couldn't en be a picture industry! Or, aside om that, what a condemnation about ybody, to refer to them as "just a some- dy or other!" Well, no use going into tails about the fracas. I set forth my ideas on the subject, probably in not too polite language, and it was quite a mess. But, as I say, I get into these things regularly. I just feel that first and foremost a man is a man, a person is a person. On that basis he or she must be primarily recognized and respected. Whether he's a star, an extra, or has three-and-a-half eyes, is a secondary consideration and only a technical one.

Yes, it gets me into messes. It even happened to me in the Marines. During my twelve weeks of "boot" training as a private, a very unpleasant and arduous little period in which you mostly wish you were already dead instead of having to die muscle by muscle, I was awakened one night in the barracks by a lieutenant. He called me outside to talk.

"We just heard who you were," he began. "We want to invite you to make full use of the officers' quarters for anything you like."

"I don't understand," I said. "I'm just a private and . . ."

"Yes, I know," he cut in. "But you're also Glenn Ford. We, the other officers and myself, thought it must be tough for you, living in a Quonset hut, isolated, and all that. Come on up anytime you feel like it."

I was a little staggered but I nodded. "I'll be glad to . . ." I began, "provided I can bring the other fellows of the platoon with me."

He was shocked. "That's impossible!" he retorted. "They're just enlisted men."

I nodded. "Me too," I said. "Just that. Nothing more."

He studied me a moment and then, asking me to forget all about the invitation, walked away. As I turned to go back inside I realized there were three chocolate bars in my hand and that he had given them to me when I first came out. For a second I had an impulse to chase after him but I changed my mind. I stuffed them into my mouth one by one. Eating them served a good purpose, kept me from feeling too noble about what had just happened.

You know, I don't want to sound overly modest. Nobody in Hollywood (no producer or studio head anyway) has ever heard me complain that my salary was too big. But there are times when I do feel I am overpaid, uncomfortably so, and this is whenever special privileges fall my way because I am a star.

For instance something else happened when I was a marine. I hit San Diego with a 48-hour pass one weekend and decided I would start out by getting a good meal. I went to a top hotel in Coronado where most of the navy and marine officers live with their families when ashore. I sat down in the main dining room, just a hungry GI, and for two hours not a waiter came near me. Then one of them felt sorry for me and stopped for just a few seconds.

"I wouldn't wait any longer, leatherneck," he said. "We don't serve enlisted men here."

"Why not?" I asked. "I've got the money. I can pay."

He shrugged. "Do yourself a favor and check out," he said.

I did . . . sore, disappointed and awfully hungry. A few years later I was out of the marines and back in Hollywood. The California première of Gallant Journey was held in San Diego and I went down to make a personal appearance. When I got to my room in the hotel there was a big bottle of champagne sitting in a basket of fruit. Attached to it was a note from the manager of that hotel in Coronado stating that he would be proud to have me as his guest for dinner anytime. I couldn't help snorting bitterly. Two year before I could have used that meal. Now Well, you won't blame me if I say I didn go. If I had I would have felt like traitor to that marine I used to be.

LITTLE things made me very happy whe I had nothing—happier, perhaps, tha seemingly important things today. As lon as I live I will never forget two lines o type which ended a long San Francisc newspaper review of the play, The Chil dren's Hour, in which I made a fleetin appearance as the grocery boy in the thir act. These two lines were written b Claude La Belle, a noted theater critic They read as follows:

"A bit by Gwylln Ford in the third ac was a knockout."

Oh, man, I needed that! Because thos days, and especially before I was twenty

"What are you trying to do—break up the act?"

"Why are you, a stranger, doing this for me?"

"What do you care for your wife, eh? Fifi she love you, too. Come, geev Fifi beeg kiss."

By NUNNALLY JOHNSON

I was as gawky and shy a kid as anyon ever saw. At the studios in Hollywoo the kindest thing ever said to me b casting directors was, "You're certainl no pretty boy, are you?"

I must have looked far from good be cause when Tom Moore (the famous silen picture star and then talent scout at Fox tried to get me a job he almost lost hi own.

"But the kid can act," protested Tom.

"He's horrible," came the flat verdic "We want leading men. Good looking lead ing men."

It seemed impossible that I would eve make good. What happened? Was sheer artistry? No. It was the same i my case as I think in the successes o others. I worked hard, I never quit tryin but that would never have put me over I hadn't had luck.

Not long ago, after I completed Th White Tower, I was asked to make a tal before stageminded students in Sant Monica where I grew up. I didn't want t do it because I know I am no fountain o wisdom. Yet I couldn't refuse the invita tion of old friends, some of them the sam teachers who had taught me as a kid.

I didn't go into the technique of acting much. I talked about the students' decision to become actors. I suggested that they think it over. I suggested that they go home, go into a dark room where nothing could distract them, and think it all the way through. If they decided that there was any other vocation in life that they might like . . . nursing, law, business, anything, I told them to forget the stage at once. But if they were convinced that it must be acting, acting or nothing, then to plunge in for all they were worth, stay with it, and not let anything or anyone dissuade them.

My idea in trying to frighten them off, that's what you want to call it, is that think breaking into pictures or top stage work is ninety percent luck and only ten percent ability. After you are in, you had best develop the ability part of it to reverse this percentage somewhat. You still will need luck to stay on top but you do get a chance to demonstrate ability if you can work some up.

That's what I'm busy at now. But in any case I never can forget the part luck played in my life. Every time I get close to posing as a genius, the old Ford starts jeering at me.

"Remember when you belonged to seven little theater movements at one time and the closest you could get to the stage was helping to build the sets? Remember when you sat outside a manager's office for five months and finally got an $8 a week walk-on? Remember when he would address you as 'The great Welsh actor from Santa Monica' and everyone would laugh? Remember when you would thumb a ride over to the studios in the valley, say at least fifty times, and nobody would even look at you? Remember when you stood close to a leaky steam pipe connection in New York on a cold winter night and opened up your thin topcoat so the warm air would float up around your body? Remember when. . . .?"

"Yes, I remember," I have to reply to myself. And I do.

Now let's go back for a moment to the star who was too busy to remember what he had been. I mean the star who was too important to bother about sending me an autographed picture. He doesn't know (he's not a star now, by the way), but I automatically found myself comparing him to many big men since that day and he always came out looking very small and unimportant.

There was the time I couldn't help comparing him with a certain man whose birthday I attended in Washington some years later because it was a national fund-raising event. By this time I was in pictures myself and part of a group of Hollywood stars who attended.

"I'm very happy you were able to come, Mr. Ford," he told me. "Is there anything I can do for you?"

I'm still a fan at heart so I couldn't help saying, "Nothing special, sir, but, perhaps, if you would autograph one of your pictures for me . . ."

"You shall have it," he assured me.

A week later when I was back in Hollywood and quite convinced that this gentleman, who was really a busy man, would never get around to sending the photograph, it came. Across it was written, "To Glenn Ford—with my very best wishes, Franklin D. Roosevelt."

I know now that the really big man is the really human man. That's why some of the biggest men I know today are not stars, but extras. And some of the smallest men I know are not just extras—but stars—in wisdom and quality.

That's my guide and philosophy.

My Home Town

by Mario Lanza

Mario is "horsey" to baby daughter Colleen, while his wife Betty, and Grandma give her pointers.

In the June issue of MODERN SCREEN there was a story about Mario Lanza which seemed to antagonize many citizens of Philadelphia. Disturbed by their reaction, Mr. Lanza asked permission to write his own version of his life and times in that city. We are pleased to present it here.—The Editors

■ I shouldn't be writing this at all. I'm a singer, an actor maybe, and putting a lot of words together on paper in a manner to make sense and express adequately what I have to say is hard for me. But, because of a situation brought about a few months ago in MODERN SCREEN when a story about me set many of the people of Philadelphia against me, I've got to try to write this. Actually, time heals the gravest wounds; and what was written a few months ago is probably forgotten. But it hasn't been forgotten by me because Philadelphia is my home town.

Home town. It has a great sound, doesn't it? You can lose a good friend, get fired from a good job, have your favorite girl chase you off her porch swing for keeps, but you can't lose your home town. It's like a birthmark, or a cowlick or six toes on each foot if you've got them—your home town stays with you as long as you're alive, and when you're dead, they mention it in your obituary. That's why you can't take any chances with alienating it from you. You belong to it, and if it ever abandons you, you're doomed to be a very lonely man for the rest of your life.

My neighborhood was South Philadelphia, a district sometimes referred to as the other side of the tracks. It's not quite that, however. It's not the Main Line. There are a lot of poor people there, minorities, working men, tired housewives and kids, lots of kids; but no matter where you figure the tracks, South Philadelphia is really on the right side.

No neighborhood in the United States is like South Philadelphia. Does that sound like maudlin pride?

Maybe it is. Maybe it's in the remembering. But South Philadelphia is the sort of merican neighborhood that the authors rite about when they say the big cities of his country are melting pots where the eople of the world come to live and be- ome Americans. It's the kind of neigh- orhood the song writers write about when ney get sentimental or patriotic. You can ve a life in that neighborhood, start as oor as a man can be and become great nd famous and live in the finest house. And ou never have to leave South Phila- elphia for a minute.

BARNEY SAMUEL did it. He wants to be called Barney, the same as they used o call him when he went to school in that eighborhood. The president of the United tates and some of the biggest people in ne country call him the Honorable Bernard amuel, Mayor of the City of Philadelphia, ut to South Philadelphia, he's Barney. He ever moved away, never for a day, and e's all a man could wish to be in the way f success and fame.

When the circus comes to Philadelphia, citizen of the city rounds up a couple f thousand orphans and treats them to ne best seats—and all the peanuts and pop ney can consume. His name is Frank alumbo, born, raised and became rich nd famous in South Philadelphia. He ill lives there. When an important per- on visits Philadelphia and ought to have parade, Palumbo arranges it and prob- bly pays for it. When the zoo needs an nimal it can't afford, Palumbo buys it nd gives it to the town.

There's Earl Denny. If you're not from hiladelphia you may never have heard bout Earl Denny. He used to live near ne on Mercy Street. My mother and ther, like most of the Italian-American eople in Mercy Street, opened the door ith a key when they moved into the ouse and then threw the key away. here was no further use for it, because was an open house from that minute on- ard. Earl Denny used to drop around all hours of the day and night, when- ver he felt like talking. We used to unge around the kitchen or living room nd talk about music. Any sort of success emed a long way off, and real recogni- on seemed unobtainable and as far away s the moon.

Earl liked to talk about his orchestra, aybe like Paul Whiteman, maybe like ne of the Dorseys, but anyway, he was oing to have a fine band and all of South hiladelphia was going to dance to his usic. Well, Earl is now the most popular ociety band leader in town. He makes a t of money—and he didn't have to leave hiladelphia to do it.

BUT if you do leave your town something can happen at almost any hour of the ay to put you back in that neighbor- ood. Like what happened to me when I ent back to Philadelphia not too long ago r the première of my first movie, That idnight Kiss.

I had left Philadelphia a nothing, off to y my luck at singing, and nobody but ny family saw me go. But here I was back gain a few years later riding in a parade own the main street with Kathryn Gray- on and Johnny Johnston. I was sitting up n top of the seat of a convertible and ead of my car a half dozen motorcycle olicemen cleared the way and kept cross reet traffic from halting our progress. My ame was a foot high on a banner tied to ne car. Suddenly a coal truck drove into ne street directly in front of the car and wo of the grimiest guys I've ever seen aped out of the front seat.

"Freddie!" they howled and we fell upon ne another in the street, pounding backs nd laughing while the parade came to a andstill. They were two fellows I went to school with who had gone into the coal business and were out on a delivery when they spotted me in the parade. I went on with the parade, but for a few minutes that day I was back fifteen years and my hands were black with coal dust to prove it.

MY HOME town was pretty much like your home town I suppose. There were the neighborhood celebrities like the Palumbos and Barney Samuel. There were the rough guys and the softies. And there were the friends who, without actually knowing what they were doing, helped me to become a singer.

Opera was sissy stuff to most of the kids in my neighborhood. However, we were predominantly Italian, with the native Italian feeling for opera. The other kids the Irish, English and such couldn't see it for sour apples. So, naturally, a group of the Italo-American kids got together to do some converting. Opera became a fighting word for us. There were Frank Guarerra, Vincent Bartolomeo and Eddie Lucente and others who were willing to stand with our backs against a wall of the school yard and spill blood (some of it ours) for dear old classical music. Frank is now a leading baritone with the Metropolitan Opera Company, Vince is a fine tenor, still studying in Philadelphia and Eddie is a doctor, specializing in pediatrics, with a growing practice in South Philadelphia.

I was a fanatic on the subject, and, as a matter of fact, considered, even at ten or eleven years of age, something of an authority. This earned me an edge in the war for opera, as one of my teachers, Mr. Maioriello, used to let me take his class for one period a week and drum some of the lore of the opera into my classmates' unwilling heads. They probably wanted to kill me for it, but the man or boy, with the long ruler at the head of the class was boss—so they listened to my childish prattlings.

One of my buddies in those days was Joe Siciliano. Joe and I were known as the laziest kids in the neighborhood. We used to sit on the curb and think about a thousand things we were going to do when we grew up. Joe loved music, too. I remember so well the times we'd go trottin off to Wildwood, New Jersey, take possession of a section of the boardwalk and with Joe playing a guitar, give an open-air concert for whatever profit our amused audiences deemed proper. When a man in a blue uniform approached, we'd take off like gazelles for another concert in a safer sector. It may have been illegal, but it didn't hurt anybody and the few brushes with the law we had were a very steadying influence on Joe. He grew up and became one of the best, and best-liked cops in Philadelphia.

My father's house in South Philadelphia was a gathering place for a lot of prominent people, prominent in the neighborhood, that is. But it never held a more inspiring visitor than Barney Samuels, the day of the parade. When we had passed through the main streets, Barney got in my car and asked me if he could go out and say hello to my folks with me. I was very pleased and, with a police escort, we drove to Mercy Street. The official occasion was over, so it became just a visit. Barney and I went inside the house and then the neighbors began piling in. Soon the living room and kitchen were full and the traffic through the front door was like a subway at rush hour.

I sat across the room and saw Barney greet my friends and it gave me a thrill I'll never forget. The Mayor of the third largest city in the land, lounging around our home and chatting with my friends

WE MADE another call that day, too, but it wasn't as cheering. There was a kid I used to play with who always seemed a little better at anything he tried than any of the rest of us. His name was Subby Ciani. He was very popular and quite an athlete. When I left the neighborhood, Subby went off to college and made a reputation for himself in sports at Villanova. Then the war came, interrupting his studies, and Subby went off with the army. He never came back. And it was with a heavy heart that I paid a visit to the Subby Ciani American Legion Post and looked at the citations of valor Subby had earned before he made the supreme sacrifice. Subby, I guess, made a bigger success than any of us.

There was another man from South Philadelphia who gave me an assist without actually knowing he was doing it. I was always interested in Italian. I wanted to know the language thoroughly in all its beauty. I met a man named Mario Pelizzon, a man born in Italy who had come here as an immigrant. He was, and is today, a scholar and has a splendid reputation as a good citizen in his adopted city. As a matter of fact, during the war when many foreign-born Italians were restricted by the government, Mr. Pelizzon was a member of the FBI.

When he found that I liked pure Italian, he took me under his wing and tutored me in the language until I became very proficient. Many of my Italian associates in operatic circles still insist I must have been born in the old country to have acquired such a true accent. Learning a language may not seem too important, but to a student of opera who plans to become a singer it is invaluable. Most students must go to Italy for this phase of their training, but I found it right at home in South Philly.

When I left South Philadelphia in 1942 to try my luck in the musical world, I went to the famous Berkshire Music Festival at Tanglewood, Massachusetts. It was a great opportunity for me, but it frightened me a lot. It was the first time I had been thrown among strangers and, coming from a neighborhood that is as clannish as the Yokums, I dreaded the thought of having to make new friends and acquaintances. But the first man I saw changed everything and dispelled all my fears. It was Al Cascarino, from home, and he was there for the same reason as me, to further his musical education. We had a fine summer and today Al is one of the most promising young composers in America.

In restrospect, a home town takes on a color that no other place on earth can have for a man. The summers seem gayer than they probably were. The winters longer. The springs more beautiful. And the friends warmer. There is no way to tell, really about any of these things but the friends. If they were closer than they are now, we must have been saccharin.

THE New Tangee LIPSTICK

But I've never been closer to any men than I was on the occasion of my first radio appearance in Philadelphia upon my return home after That Midnight Kiss.

I was being interviewed in one of the large broadcast rooms of WCAU, and reminiscing, trying to recall the faces and the nicknames of the kids I'd grown up with, and trying to find out what had happened to them all. Of course, they were a rag-tag bunch in my memory, reluctant to wash behind the ears as I was, dressed in the torn and rumpled uniform of the small boy. They paraded before my mind's eye one by one—and then the door to the broadcast room opened and a number of very fine gentlemen marched in. And in each of those men I saw a boy I used to know.

There were the Capones. Dick, now an eye specialist and rather formal in manner, his brother Eddie, very proper and handsome. The Graziano boys, now big business men, owners of the King Laundry. Vince Bartolomeo, Dr. Eddie Lucente, the kindly baby doctor, Tony Di Simone and a lot of others. One by one we shook hands, men now, all of us, and we grinned in memory of the pranks we played and the mischief we shared.

Each hand was warm with welcome and friendship, and no words have been more musical to my ears than the "Hello, Freddie" I got from each of them. Gone were the years between as we grinned at one another, a little self-consciously at first, and later during the bull session we indulged in and told each other everything that had happened to us since last we'd met. We finished up in South Philadelphia, treading the same streets we'd raced on many years ago.

No boyhood in this country is complete without sand lot baseball. We had ours, but because the city streets were a little too confining for our energetic type of playing, we used to go to Wildwood, New Jersey and carry on our contests on the beach. My chums were great ball players, but the champions of our little group were the young Graziano twins, Carmen and Tony.

They were whizzes, so good in fact that they were continually getting us into hock and hot water with their prowess as sluggers. The baseball story I remember most vividly is the one we played against another neighborhood team on the beach at Wildwood. The score, of course, was tied and, of course, there were two of our men on base and, of course, Carmen Graziano came to bat. Naturally, with two strikes against him, Carmen belted a ball into what seemed like the next county. It was hit so far that he didn't even start to run and with the rest of us he watched the beautiful flight of that ball. It curved into the sky beautifully, then began its drop, still going for distance. Suddenly our grins turned to panic as the ball headed for a nice old man sitting in the sun reading a paper. To our horror, it struck him right between the eyes, a lot of its power gone to be sure, but with still enough force to shatter his eyeglasses into a thousand pieces.

Well, we took off like frightened deer in every direction, finally meeting half a mile away where we were sure we could still hear the old man's angry roars. We held a council of war. Keep running, or go back and face the music. One of the lads pointed out that maybe the man was poor and couldn't buy another pair of glasses. That decided it. Back we went and stood like a row of saucy puppies taking a scolding while the man told us what he thought of us individually and collectively. He calmed down somewhat when he learned that we intended to pay for the damage we'd done. And, although the odd jobs we had to perform to earn the money practically ruined us as a ball-playing organization that summer, we bought the man the best pair of fancy eyeglasses his oculist could dig up.

It's the things like that, the team we were, the fraternity, the little lessons in life we learned together and the comradeship we developed that anchors a man's home town to his heart.

And, if a man's lucky, the good things that come to him in life will build up to one big moment in his home town, too. Acting in motion pictures brings a lot of personal adulation to a man, maybe more than he deserves. An entertainer eventually becomes rather used to being in the public eye and, while the honors that are bestowed on him never become boring, they do become somewhat commonplace.

But no matter what ever happens to me in my life, no matter if I ever do become a really good singer or a big star in motion pictures and people beat my door down to shake my hand, I will never have a bigger thrill than I got in my home town during the American Legion convention last year. I was not the guest of honor at the banquet at the Bellevue-Stratford Hotel, but I had been asked to attend and sing. The guest of honor was a big man, the biggest. I was excited and anxious to sing and impress everyone, particularly him. But something happened to the programming. The Guest of Honor was to make a nation-wide radio address, and the entertainment ran so long that it was soon obvious that I wasn't going to be called on to sing. Somewhere a technician signalled the guest he was to go on the air in a minute or so. He stood up and the whole room became quiet. He looked at me, saw, maybe, that I was disappointed, and spoke.

The President of the United States looked at me, now Mario Lanza, once Freddie Cocozza, and in my home town, before all my friends he said, "I want to apologize to Mario Lanza for asking him here and then not allowing enough time for him to sing."

That happened to me in Philadelphia. Maybe, as they say, South Philadelphia is on the wrong side of the tracks. But the President apologized to a kid from over there, so there can't be too much wrong with it. But no matter what, good, bad, great or unimportant, it's my neighborhood and my home town. I hope we love one another forever. THE END

I KNEW HIM WHEN . . .

During the summer of 1946 I went to a small co-ed camp in New Jersey. All the girls used to drool over a dramatic counselor there named Bernie Schwartz. Rumors went around the camp that he was going to Hollywood, but nobody thought it would happen. But when I saw Criss Cross in 1948, I thought I saw Bernie in a scene. He had such a small part that I couldn't tell for sure. Then, about a year later, I saw City Across the River. I was then positive it was he. His name now is Anthony Curtis.

A few years ago when the celebrated uthor James Cain interviewed Lana for a agazine, he got the surprise of his life. "The girl absolutely sparkles!" he said. Why—she used four syllable words and ll in the right places." He grinned sheepshly. "I must confess I was expecting a ad time of it—and I haven't had such an njoyable conversation in a long time!"

Mr. Cain didn't let it go at that. It was is opinion that Lana has great sensitivity nd talent. Because she was to star in he screen version of his book, "The Postman Rings Twice," he had been shown a creening at the studio of Ziegfeld Girl, ade in 1941. Lana was 21 at the time, nd in the picture gave perhaps the greatst dramatic performance of her life. A few years later she proved her talent t comedy, the stumbling block of many ctresses, when she gave an hilarious performance in Slightly Dangerous. As a atter of fact, it can truthfully be said hat she's never given a bad performance.

MUSIC rates high on the list of her many interests. All kinds of music. he is seen at the large majority of oncerts given in the Hollywood Bowl or nywhere else in Los Angeles, and Claude hornhill and Lenny Hayden will tell ou that they admire her not only as a erson, but as a girl who really knows usic. An etching of the composer and ianist Rachmaninoff hangs in the den of er home. Now this is nothing unusual. Millions of people enjoy good music, but o one suspects that Lana Turner does, too.

You might say, of course, that she's utting on an act, that she's pretending o be a highbrow. But Lana is too honest or that. Many stars who reach the top eel that an ersatz dignity is called for, nd they gradually develop deep throated Bostonain accents and begin to drop their s. Not Lana Turner. She speaks in the ame way she has all her life, and her oice retains that little girl quality.

She isn't afraid to state her likes and islikes. She'll tell you that she knows othing about flowers and doesn't enjoy ardening. "I'm happy they're there," she ays. "They're pretty and I like to look at hem, but that's all." Other people seem to hink it's necessary to pretend they love lowers, that it's coarse to be uninterested.

WHEN Bob Topping presented Lana with an original Rembrandt for their ew home, she didn't like it and said so. There is nothing in the world that compels person to like a certain painting; it's a atter of personal taste, but most people re afraid to admit it.

Lana is a kind person, and a generous ne. It is said that in her single days she as always broke, because she'd give the orld with a fence around it to anyone he loved and sometimes to people she idn't even know. She gave her standn a mink coat. The girl who was her ecretary for years was always beautiully dressed and admitted with candor hat her dress, her shoes, her suit, had een given her by Lana. Innumerable haritable organizations, and notably the Children's Hospital in Los Angeles, freuently received large and unsolicited mounts of money from Lana.

"It's a funny thing, but I hate to see a ickel go over the counter," she'll tell you, ut MGM's designer Helen Rose will tell ou different. Lana had been in Miss ose's office with a group of people who were talking about a certain starlet. It was such a shame, they said. The girl badly needed an operation but had no money to pay for it. Lana had never met the actress under discussion, but seemed interested and left after a few moments. When Helen Rose went back to her desk she found a check for several hundred dollars, signed by Lana, and a note beside it which read, "Would you do me a favor and see that this gets to Miss ——?"

ONE night during the war Lana was at the Mocambo. So was a young sailor who had just come home on leave from Central America. Spotting Lana, the boy told his friends that he'd give his right arm to do a rhumba with Lana Turner. Word of his wish got to the owner of the Mocambo who, knowing Lana's good nature, went to her table and told her about it. Now Lana didn't know the Seaman 2/c from a bag of beans. She didn't even know if he could dance. But she immediately sent word that she'd be delighted to dance with him. It turned out that the kid could rhumba better than anyone this side of Fred Astaire. The expression on the sailor's face, as he whirled Lana around the room, was something to write home about.

Lana is discriminating in her friendships. She has to be, for she gives so readily that she is often hurt and unable to understand why others will only take and never give. And she is loyal. While her business manager, George Cole, was in uniform, she managed her own affairs, and re-hired him on the spot when he was discharged. When Lana was dropped from the Warner roster years ago, her stand-in also came under the axe, but as soon as MGM saw the value of Miss Turner and handed her a contract, they were asked to employ her stand-in, too.

Lana's home is unlike others in Hollywood. Many of them look, literally, like model homes, as though no one lived in them. The cushions are plumped as though no one ever dared sit down and the books lining the shelves look unread and untouched. Lana's home has warmth and signs of gracious living. You're likely to find one of Cheryl's dolls sprawled on a window seat, the bookshelves have a cluttered look, and an album of Brahms may be lying on the floor in front of the radio. Lana lives in her home, and usually she wears slacks and moccasins there, although she can dress like a duchess when the occasion calls for it.

THE carpenters and grips and electricians love to work with Lana. She is regarded by them as one of the least temperamental stars in town, and certainly the least demanding. When she started A Life of Her Own, it was the first picture she had made in two years, and the crew on the set were delighted to have her back. They remembered, in fact, that she is fond of "Peg Of My Heart" and arranged for a group of musicians to play it as she came onto the set for the first time. Tributes such as this are rare in the industry, and it is said that Lana was misty-eyed when she heard the song.

James Cain wasn't wrong when he observed that Lana is a sensitive person. You have only to watch her face when her daughter Cheryl comes into the room. Any mother loves her children, certainly, but it is a particularly pleasant experience to watch Lana with her child. Seeing them together you know that there is a great bond between them.

Lana loves children, everyone's children. More than anything else in the world she wants more of her own, and has the courage to try. Courage is the word for two reasons. One is because Lana was told after Cheryl's birth that if she had any more babies, her life would be in considerable danger. Ignoring the warning she became pregnant in the first year of her marriage to Bob Topping, and the resultant miscarriage cost her more emotionally than she would ever admit. She is still undaunted. In fact, Lana is expecting another child in January. Fortunately, a new serum which helps to battle the Rh factor will help make it easier for her.

It is a fact that for three months before Cheryl was born, Lana was totally blind. No one knew it at the time, not even her studio, because despite the misery that Lana must have suffered, she preferred to keep the knowledge from others to save them worry. It is possible that Lana will be unhappy that this has appeared in print, but it is time that people should know it, because it proves better than anything else the magnificent pluck of the girl. And her kindness, her thoughtfulness, at a time when she must have been frightened to the core was a display of courage with a capital C.

HAVING been the victim for years of exaggerated press reports, Lana understandably tries to keep to herself the things that are closest to her. She has the type of sensational beauty that is associated with sensational news. In the days when she was publicized as the Nightclub queen, Lana said, "If I dated all the men I'm reported to have dated, I wouldn't have time to eat, sleep or make pictures."

Like other stars, she is defenseless against this type of journalism. Long ago, before they learned a lesson, the stars asked for a retraction in the paper of the following day. But they soon found this method worked only more harm, since millions of people who missed the original item read the retraction, and the gossip became more widely circulated.

The untrue words that have been printed about Lana Turner, if put end to end, would stretch from Nome to Nagasaki. The latest tempest in a teapot is the report of a few months ago that Lana and her husband had an argument. Many columnists took up the hue and cry, dreamily filling space about knock-down, drag-out fights between Lana and Bob. By now some may have definitely stated that there'll be a divorce. To this situation Lana responds, "I'm living a quiet life and there isn't anything to say about me, so they have to dream it up. Of course, it would be pretty silly to say that Bob and I never argue. It's a rare married couple that doesn't. But as for fights! Well, what can I do? We're grown people, and we settle our differences by discussing them quietly until we come to a satisfactory understanding."

This story is no attempt to paint Lana Turner as an angel. She is a human being, and undoubtedly has the faults that go along with being one. She may even have a bad temper, or a jealous nature. She may not. But the very least that can be said for Lana is that to have been a kid of 16 on a soda-fountain stool, and a famous actress and millionairess in the same life is quite a trick. Lana turned that trick and withal she has managed to remain a very real and warm and well-balanced person.

But somewhere in Betty Hutton there is a tremendous capacity for sanity. Somewhere inside of her there is a passion for staid living, in a home, with a man and children. It has been her most often expressed wish as long as Hollywood has known her. Unrequited love to her is like an open wound and can be just as deadly to a woman of her temperament.

THE FIRST time that Hollywood knew that Betty Hutton was really in love was shortly after Paramount had elevated her to stardom. The man worked at the studio, his office within peering distance of her dressing room. When Betty was certain that nothing would ever come of her love, the world tumbled in on that dressing room, and sadness and all its kin came there to live with her. For months, she sat by the window alone and tearful, her eyes never leaving the doorstep of her man's office, waiting for hours just to get a glimpse of him once or twice a day as he entered or left. She knew it was a fruitless vigil, but she had to keep it or die.

There were several bitter years for Betty after that. When she finally emerged from her melancholy she looked as bright as ever. Hoyden Hutton, she seemed. Go to a party every night and sing and dance like a murderer. If a fellow got two dates in a row, it was a mistake in her bookkeeping. But those gay lads in that mad circle are not the substantial type as a rule, and Betty found herself getting farther and farther away from the little white cottage with the red roses 'round the door.

"What I want in a man," Betty is reported to have confided to a friend one day, "is the feeling that he will be able to take care of me and the kids if anything happens."

It wasn't the money. Betty had that. But she wanted more than anything the self-respect that went with a marriage in which the head of the house paid the butcher. Ted Briskin was that kind of a fellow—and that, some of Betty's friends say, is why she married him.

Briskin didn't have a chance. Betty Hutton took one look at him, asked a couple of pertinent questions and then descended on him. When it came time to talk of marriage, she brought it up. When it came time to clarify their situation for their friends and the press, she announced the engagement. And there are those who swear that when they entered their home for the first time as Mr. and Mrs., she carried him over the threshold. Her friends can believe this, for it is certain she is capable of both getting the idea and heisting Mr. Briskin onto a sleek shoulder.

WHAT BROKE up this marriage is anybody's guess. There were all sorts of rumors of battles in the Briskin home, most of them no doubt true, because Betty has been fighting since she was born. There were reports that Betty had attacks of "nerves" and was too tired to play house when she finished work. That is hard to believe. In all her life, Betty Hutton has never been too tired to fell a hundred-foot tree with a dull ax before going to bed. She's been bored, but never tired. As for nerves, she just hasn't got the ordinary kind. Nothing ever stays bottled up inside her to the point of frustration.

Maybe Briskin was bored. Maybe he got tired. Maybe she slugged him. Anything but the pat excuses given to the press. At any rate, Betty Hutton didn't toss her marriage away on a sudden whim. She was obviously and sincerely, deeply

HOW CLOSE ARE YOU TO YOUR DAUGHTER ...CAN YOU TELL HER THESE Intimate Physical Facts?

Isn't it nice to live in this modern age where old bugaboos and false modesty can be tossed out the window and a mother can speak freely to her daughter about hygiene (internal cleanliness). A modern mother won't fail to tell her grown-up daughter it's just as important for her to put ZONITE in her fountain syringe for her health, charm, and after her periods, as it is for an older, married woman.

And a mother will certainly warn her daughter about a common odor—graver than bad breath or body odor—she herself may not detect but which is so apparent to others around her.

And isn't it reassuring for your daughter to know: no other type liquid antiseptic-germicide tested for this purpose is so powerfully effective yet safe to tissues as ZONITE.

A MODERN MIRACLE!

Doctors know that much unhappiness can be traced to women using dangerous products, overstrong solutions of which can gradually cause serious injury. On the other hand, what woman wants to rely on weak, homemade solutions—none of which have the remarkable deodorizing and germ-killing action of ZONITE.

Developed by a famous surgeon and scientist, the ZONITE principle was the first in the world that was powerful enough yet positively non-irritating, non-poisonous. You can use ZONITE as directed as often as you wish without the slightest risk of injury.

Gives BOTH Internal and External Hygienic Protection

ZONITE deodorizes not by just 'masking' as many products do. Instead, ZONITE actually dissolves and removes odor-causing waste substances. And ZONITE has such a soothing, refreshing effect. It promptly relieves any itching and irritation if present. ZONITE gives daily external protection, too. Available at any drug counter.

unhappy for a long time before their first separation. And when she agreed to try again, she really tried—and Hutton knows how to try to keep a guy happy.

Ted Briskin, to give the man his due, tried too. But eventually he was moved to say that he "couldn't stand a bossy woman." A mild description of his life with the bombastic Betty.

There is no doubt at all that Betty Hutton will make the greatest mother ever. Even without a man around the house, she'll manage to see that her kids have the best upbringing possible. She'll probably protect them with handcuffs and haymakers, as the occasion calls for, and then, when they are old enough to make it alone, give them boxing lessons and ten dollars and send them out into the world to take it from there.

Right now, despite all the recent happenings, Betty Hutton is at the peak of her career as both an actress and a woman. With Annie Get Your Gun she is back, professionally, where she always belonged and out of the cinematic doldrums several dull movies plunged her into. She is wiser, as a woman and as a screen star, than she has ever been. She has learned about scripts, directors and what people want to see and hear her do. She'll make no compromises with this knowledge in the future, not ever.

Socially, she is also once again the life of the party and no piano or man is safe with her if the mood to sing a song or chuck a lad under the chin comes upon her. A magazine editor asked her some time ago what she thought would happen to her love life now that her heart had been broken.

"Where are those guys?" she answered typically Hutton style. "Bring 'em on!"

SHE confessed that she was looking forward to her recent trip to New York, and that she fully intended to take the town apart and dance the rubber heels off any man who got within shagging distance. However, a small virus got hold of her somewhere on the trip east and, as she couldn't get at it with a skillet, the virus kept her off her nimble feet during her entire stay. New York missed a great deal.

Take a look at Betty Hutton almost any night now. At Mocambo, the new home of the Charleston, she will more than likely be at a ringside table, yaking it up with them that can take it, reviving steps the Castles used to stumble through and laughing louder than the guy who owns the joint. There'll be a fellow on hand somewhere, hoping that the moon will be out on the way home, and that he can hold out that long.

Or, on another night, she'll be sitting alone in the living room of her house with the lights turned low and a sad singer of slow songs active on the phonograph, indolent as a caterpillar, wishing the door would open and some kind of a Valentino would walk in and punch her in the nose and kiss her. Or that the doorbell would ring and a masterful type would walk in and take over the management of the place—flinging his check book at her so she can get off some of the bills while he goes in and whispers the babies to sleep.

Oh, that Hutton is an enigma all right. She'd send her right eye over in a tea cup if you were kind to her and she thought you could use it. She'll weep at the sight of a tear in anyone else's eye. She'll stand up and slug it out man to man with Joe Louis if he thinks he's tough. And she'll get so stubborn she'll hold her breath until the top of her head comes off if it will win an important point.

There is no way to figure it. She's just Betty Hutton. And the terrifying and beautiful part of it is that she probably always will be. You've got to love her, and if you know her, you'll always love her—and keep your eyes open and your pistol cocked.

And what does Hutton think of Hutton? Not so much.

She was at a night club one evening recently talking to a friend when a gorgeous star came into the room. Betty ogled her and sighed.

"She's so beautiful," she said. "Why can't I be that beautiful—everyone'd love me."

They sat on opposite sides of the room for an hour or more. Nobody stopped to say hello to "gorgeous"—but every man and woman who walked into that club stopped for a moment to say a word—any kind of a word—to Betty Hutton.

THE END

i discovered san francisco

(Continued from page 38) man with a box camera who'd set up business at 25c a shot. He looked a little disdainfully at Sprague and his fancy equipment and wherever Sprague told us to pose, the little man would say, "No, I think over there would be better, don't you?" Usually, Sprague didn't think so, but the little man was good-natured, and he took pains with us when we posed for him.

Then Betsy and I took a ride on the cable car, an old San Francisco institution. When we reached the end of the line the conductor got out. Then the motorman got out.

"Hey," Betsy said to me. "I think we're being deserted."

"Ah," I said. "Adventure, at last." Actually, I knew that this was the point where the car had to be turned around, and there was no one to turn it but the motorman and the conductor.

A visit to San Francisco isn't complete for me without a shopping spree in Ransohoff's department store. I still wear shoes that I bought there five years ago. I was trying on a pair when I heard someone say, "This pair won't do."

I looked up to see Mr. Ransohoff, himself. "Let me help," he volunteered.

Forty or fifty pairs and several conferences later, we decided on five. I couldn't begin to thank Mr. Ransohoff and I walked out knowing that several years later I'd most likely return wearing a pair of the shoes I'd bought that day!

Back in our hotel room, Betsy and I relaxed on the couch and talked. One thing was certain. No matter where anyone came from, after a few hours in San Francisco, one felt as though he had been admitted to automatic citizenship with the right to be utterly proud of the city.

THAT NIGHT, we had dinner with the Schwabachers. I'll confess that I'm not what folks call a "big eater." But the town always does something strange to my appetite. A stevedore couldn't pack away any more. After dinner, we took a tour of the clubs. There was Charlie Low's Forbidden City Cafe. And there was still another place I shall never forget. It wasn't much larger than a small living room—and the customers must have numbered 300. Al became engaged in a serious discussion with the head waiter. "It's Miss Wyman's only evening in town," he said desperately.

The waiter nodded. Then he led us to a tiny space on the floor. Another waiter appeared carrying orange crates. Empty, of course—and for us to sit on. We had a wonderful time; one we'll never forget.

Saturday morning, the Junior Press Club conference was held in the St. Francis Hotel. High school editors and the cub reporters took over the situation. I felt almost like a teacher, standing there. I couldn't help thinking, "There isn't anything they can ask me that I won't have an answer for . . . and if there is, I'd better get out of the picture business!"

A girl's hand went up.

"Yes?" I said and waited.

There was a pause. And then: "Miss Wyman, are you really a Lux girl?"

I was still smiling as we continued our lengthy sightseeing tour in Chinatown, where I did some shopping for Maureen and Mike. And even as we proceeded to Jacques'—a hundred-year-old restaurant where the tradition is as rich as the food.

Milt and Bill were waiting for us in front of Jacques'.

They seemed to be in a hurry. The sirens started going full blast, and we tore through the worst traffic in San Francisco. Betsy and I were in the front seat. My hair was flying but I knew nothing would save us—or stop us. Betsy was holding on to her large picture hat and looking very unruffled. I turned around. Al Schwabacher was in the back seat, very unconcerned. And Max Burkett, the Warners representative, was—of all things—reading a newspaper.

Barry McCarthy, who's West Coast public relations director for Ford and should know how much a car can take, laughed at my fears, but he didn't take his eyes off the road. I nodded toward our friends on the motorcycles. "What happens if they have to make a sudden stop?"

"Why, we pull back and fly right over," said the cheerful Mr. McCarthy.

Twelve minutes after leaving Jacques', we arrived at the race track. "My, but that was a quick trip," I said.

"Sure was!" replied Max. "At normal speed it takes forty-five minutes."

Perhaps that's the way to go to the races though. The results were fine. I came out with a thirty-dollar profit. And The Guardsmen? They raised something like $50,000—that's a lot of vacations.

Then we headed back into town.

It was hard saying goodbye to San Francisco. The people—the city, itself. The city where you can climb to the hills and look for hours at the harbor which is unsurpassed for beauty. Below, the mighty Golden Gate Bridge, Cliff House, Seal Rocks—and at your feet the 1,000-acre Golden Gate Park. Far in the distance is Muir National Monument, four hundred acres of forest in which the giant redwoods are as much as fifteen centuries old. And when night comes, you want to climb again to the heights. This time perhaps Twin Peaks . . . from there you can see a vast sweep of lights reflected in the Pacific Ocean.

But, too soon, we were aboard The Lark, still glowing with the warmth and graciousness spread around us by the people of San Francisco. And I, for one, think there ought to be a law. Sooner or later, everyone should have to visit this fabulous city. Everyone, I'm sure, would come away as I always do, sighing, "San Francisco. I love you!" The End

The blackmailer smiled, a wan smile of assent. He ambled back to his table and nodded at some of his boys. The gunmen came and joined him, just waiting for the big boss to give his word.

MITCHUM'S bodyguard knew full well what could happen. One of these thugs might walk up to Bob and without saying a word, slug him. Mitchum who is handy with his dukes, would strike back. Within a few minutes, the night club would become a shambles, and Bob Mitchum's name would be smeared again.

Niver thought quickly. He raced over to the pretty blonde employed by the night club to shoot photos of the customers. He squeezed a hundred-dollar bill into her palm. "See all those characters sitting around the ringside tables?" he asked. The girl said yes.

"Well, just as fast as you can," Niver ordered, "you start shooting pictures of them. And don't let them stop you, either."

The cute little blonde followed orders. She took her Speed Graphic and flash bulbs and began shooting. "Beat it, sister," one of the racketeers muttered. But the little girl wouldn't. Hundred-dollar bills didn't grow on trees. She kept her shutter clicking and her flash bulbs popping, and as she did, the gunmen began to turn away. Soon, the big boy himself got up and walked out. The lesser fry followed. Most of them had criminal records. If anything broke, those photographs could surely identify them.

When the last of the hoodlums had left, Niver got hold of Mitchum, and together they kissed Chicago farewell.

THE history of Hollywood is replete with blackmail and at the moment Bob is a set-up for any hoodlum thus inclined.

Mitchum can't breathe near trouble until January 1951. That's when his two years of probation expire. If he gets involved in the slightest jam, if his probation officer becomes convinced that he isn't living a respectable life—then Bob has to sit in jail for a year and nine months, the balance of his sentence.

That's an awful weight for a man to carry around. Few people realize the mental strain involved. Bob has always been a carefree character. These restraints—the inability to leave town without the probation officer's okay, the checking in every month, the being watched and followed—is doubly hard on a man of his temperament.

But he's taking it in stride. He gives the same flip, devil-may-care impression that he's always given. He asks everyone to call him Doll—his favorite name for himself and everyone else—but deep down inside, he knows that he's the man who's returned from Hell and will never go back.

THE truth of the matter is that Robert Mitchum needn't have gone to jail. If he had wanted to plead not guilty, if he had wanted to ask for a trial by jury—the chances are that he might have been acquitted.

The story Mitchum never told is the story of two girls, Vicki Evans and Lila Leeds, of how they were being shadowed by the police, and of how he had to drop in on them on the one night when the police had decided to pull a raid.

Many people would have you believe that Mitchum fell for a trap, that the trap was sprung by a girl in the employ of the police. It isn't so. What actually happened was this: back in 1948 when Bob was temporarily separated from his wife, Dorothy—he took up with a character of sorts, named Robin Ford. Supposedly a real estate agent, Ford was a nondescript fellow who hung around joints, making friendships with a strange variety of people.

Through Ford, Mitchum met Lila Leeds, a young, reckless actress who'd won a minimum of screen fame after starting out in life as a waitress.

What Mitchum never knew was that Lila Leeds was being tailed by the narcotics squad. She herself had no idea that she was being followed. Had she known of the "shadow" thrown on her movements, she certainly wouldn't have endangered Mitchum's welfare. She liked him too much.

AS things turned out, Lila's place was scheduled for a raid on August 31st, 1948. When Mitchum and Robin Ford walked in, the two narcotics agents waiting outside were absolutely amazed.

This is what Mitchum told the Los Angeles County Probation Officer about his affair with Lila: He and Ford were invited to see the new cottage she had rented in Laurel Canyon. "I reluctantly consented to stop in for a minute," Bob explained. "We were met at the door by Miss Leeds and another girl who was introduced as Vicki Evans. Miss Leeds handed me a cigarette and upon accepting it, I looked up and saw what I believed to be a face at the window.

"At that moment there was a loud crash, and two men burst into the room holding Miss Evans as a shield. Without bothering to drop the cigarette, I crouched to throw the small table before me at the men, thinking it was a holdup, but one of them shouted, 'Police officers.'

"Sergeant Barr retrieved the cigarette. I observed a package of cigarettes in a crumpled Philip Morris wrapper on the table . . . and Officer McKinnon attempted to thrust the package into my hands, and said, 'These are yours.'

"I replied that they were not. He said, 'Look, don't give me the business and we'll get along fine.'

"I did not have any marijuana when I entered the house, nor did I know or believe anyone else there would have any."

Mitchum was indicted on two counts, possession of marijuana and conspiracy to possess marijuana. Before the trial got under way, his attorney, Jerry Geisler, asked for a severance of counts, and the State agreed to try the actor on the second. He was found guilty and sentenced to two years in the state penitentiary, the sentence to be held in abeyance, upon Mitchum's serving ninety days in the county jail.

If Bob had wanted to, he could have taken the witness stand in front of a jury. He could have told the story of his life. It would have been a long, sad, tear-provoking autobiography. But Bob wouldn't tell his story to the public, although he did tell it, in private, to the probation officer.

Here is the official statement of Robert Charles Mitchum, born in Bridgeport, Connecticut, August 6th, 1917:

"My mother was born in Christiana, Norway, and arrived in this country with her mother, sister, and brother at age 9, to join her father, a steamer captain.

"My father, James Mitchum, a native South Carolinian, was killed in a railroad accident in Charleston, S. C. in 1919.

"In 1927, my mother remarried. Her husband was Hugh Cunningham-Morris, then feature editor of the Bridgeport Telegram . . .

"In 1928 my mother joined us on the Delaware farm where my half-sister was born, my step-father remaining at his desk.

"My sister applied for and received a permit to work, and at 14 deserted her junior term in high school for the stage, becoming source of family support.

"During my own fourteenth year, I spent the summer as deckhand on a salvage ship, the Sayomore out of Fall River, Mass. In 1931, the family moved to Philadelphia, and later that year to New York.

"These moves I supplemented with occasional excursions of my own, one of which in 1933, ended in the Chatham County Camp in Savannah, Georgia. Riding freight trains in the company of other boys, I was convicted of what I recall was a technical charge of vagrancy and released approximately a week later . . .

"Returning to Delaware, I learned that my mother had rented a house. But it appeared that our family was in most desperate circumstances.

"Accordingly, I left school and went to work as a garage mechanic, determined that my younger brother's education should be uninterrupted.

"That same autumn I met the girl I was later to marry, Dorothy Spence . . .

"Joining the CCC, I worked on the Tideland Reclamation Project until July 1934, when with what little money I had saved, I set out for California.

"Arriving with my brother in Long Beach, we were joined by the rest of the family . . . My brother was enrolled in Long Beach's Polytechnic High School and I began a series of odd jobs which included dish-washing, truck-loading, stevedoring and building-maintenance and repair.

"In September 1935, through the efforts of a friend, I was employed in Toledo, Ohio . . . The job over, I visited my girl in Delaware, and in May, 1936, returned to California . . .

"My sister having assumed an active interest in a civic theater project, I was urged by my mother to join an act which began one of the most enjoyable and satisfying encounters of my life.

"For the first time I was privileged to make the acquaintance of young people of my own age who shared my ideas and reflections, and though most of us were thread-bare poor, we forgot our fears of the future.

"Throughout that and the next year I acted, directed, and wrote children's plays with some local success . . .

"In 1938, approached by a friend to edit the lectures of an astrologer, Mr. Carroll

Righter, I was sufficiently intrigued by the novelty to accept, and began a tour of women's clubs and resort hotels which took us to New England in 1939 and in early 1940 to Palm Beach, Florida.

"Proximity hastened the season, for in March, I left Palm Beach for Philadelphia, stated a formal proposal, and in Dover, Delaware, for better or for worse, Dorothy Spence became Mrs. Robert Mitchum.

"RETURNING to California with my wife, I dissolved my agreement with Mr. Righter and returned to the haphazard pursuit of specialized writing until early 1941 when the prospects of parenthood suggested more reliable employment.

"In April, the Lockheed Aircraft Corporation accepted me for employment and a month later, my first son was born.

"Dorothy and I were living with my mother, my small earnings serving to partially support that household, an arrangement which became increasingly uncomfortable, in the light of my mother's and sister's accusative conviction that my wife was somehow responsible for what they regarded as 'my enforced labor.'

"Therefore, determined to re-establish direction, I expended my sleepless hours in little theater productions, which association brought me to the attention of one Paul Wilkins, an artist-manager, who suggested that should it be my intent to commercialize my talent, I first contact him.

"In April, my company's medical supervisor advised my severance in the best interest of health, and prescribed that I seek expression in the work I loved.

"MR. Wilkins, to whom I announced my plan, began to cart me around on interviews, while generous friends loaned me a presentable wardrobe. This resulted in my employment in May by producer Harry Sherman . . .

"Encouraged by my progress, Dorothy, Josh, and I moved from a $32.50 rental to a $50 rental, and in October, 1943, my second son was born. In March 1944, I accompanied a motion picture location company to Florida . . . Home again, I received notice to report for Army induction

"Upon reporting, I was excused until the next quota call, during which interim a regulation exempting fathers postponed my induction."

Bob was later drafted but when he got out of the Army, Bert Allenberg took him on as a client. In less than two years after that, Bob Mitchum was earning $3,000 a week.

The money went to his head. Why shouldn't it have? He had never known any wealth in his entire life. The reaction was completely normal. He and his wife began to quarrel, and eventually they agreed on a temporary separation. Dorothy and the two boys went back East, and Bob began playing around with Robin Ford and met Lila Leeds.

That's Bob Mitchum's whole story. As you read it over, as you look back on his shabby, pitiful youth, as you glean his fine Victorian literary style, his self-education, the relatively few moments of happiness he's enjoyed in life—can you believe that a jury, presented with all the facts, would have found him guilty?

BOB Mitchum took a bum rap . . . and yet, not once, has he ever complained.

He lives today with Dorothy and the two boys in a new, sprawling ranch house in Mandeville Canyon. Whatever spare time he has, he spends with his family.

There are those who still point to Mitchum as the personification of Hollywood's immorality. Mitchum, however, has shown himself to have more honor and fortitude of spirit than any of his detractors.

When it comes to the case study of this man, currently a moral credit to his community, no concluding statement is more apt than this quotation from the Bible:

"He that is without sin among you: let him cast the first stone." THE END

Lila Leeds, who was convicted last year with Bob Mitchum on a narcotics charge, is now a nightclub singer. She announced her engagement recently to Erwin Arvey, the son of a Chicago politico.

Joan Lansing

kin-Wyler combination that made up Liberty Films, Inc. He signed with them for much less than Twentieth's grandiose offer, and was really disappointed when their company dissolved.

He had another excellent reason for gloom when a peculiar South Pacific virus called mononucleosis belatedly attacked his insides and he had to quit right in the middle of his first independent film, The Other Love. Bob didn't get back in shape for work until 1948, when he played his first screen role in six years in Date with Judy. It was a light juvenile part, but it was, finally, a start.

Since then, Bob Stack has not exactly been setting the film world on fire. But now, with Torero, he is in a very real sense at the turning point of his career.

FOR this film he had to go down to Mexico and learn about bullfighting. He spent a lot of time at the Xajay bull farm, watching the amateurs of the neighborhood worry the "toritos" in the arena.

Actually a bull never sees a cape until the day he fights for his life in the ring. The "toritos" at the farm were young cows as deadly and as brave and as fierce as the bulls they breed.

"Look at that black one!" shouted the foreman on a day that Bob was there. "Already she fears nothing on two legs."

"She does look tough," said Bob. "Do you mind if I try one of the gentler ones?"

Before the foreman could protest, Bob had picked up a cape and walked out toward the center of the ring where a peaceful looking animal stood waiting.

"Be careful, señor," the foreman shouted. "She is little, but she is also very mean."

Bob discovered that for himself in just a second. The "torito" snorted, lowered her broad head, and charged. Bob barely had time to jump out of the way.

On the next charge Bob was prepared. He stood easily with his cape gracefully draped by his side, looking for all the world like an expert. But the "torito" wasn't impressed. She had the fixed idea of trampling Bob into the dust, and she almost did.

As a rule, people in their right minds do not enter a ring with 900 pounds of porterhouse on the hoof. It's like standing too close to a speeding freight train. But Bob wanted Torero to look authentic in every detail.

A few weeks later, he was back at the studio, practicing the intricate foot work and flowing cape movements of a torero. Because he's a natural athlete it came easy to him, and a Hollywood columnist who watched him practice wrote that he looked professional enough to do the actual fighting scenes in the film.

"Are you kidding?" Bob asked. "Me get in the ring with a big mad bull? Why, I'd rather go six rounds with Joe Louis!"

"What's the matter," the columnist joked, "losing your nerve?"

"Have you ever seen a bullfight?" Bob asked. "Those bulls play for keeps!"

"That wouldn't have stopped you a few years ago," the columnist said.

"A few years ago," Bob reminded him, "I was a lot younger. And even then, I never did anything as reckless as that."

"Oh, no?" the columnist queried. "What about the time you tried to make that speed boat fly up at Lake Merced?"

"That was an accident," Bob confessed, with a self-conscious smile. "And I'm not racing my boat anymore."

THE columnist was referring to the time Bob cracked up his high-powered speed boat, the Thunderbird, while leading the field in a big race at Lake Merced. He swung into a turn with the throttle wide open, hit a bad wave, and barrel-rolled the boat 15 feet into the air. Bob landed on his head fifty feet away, and woke up in the hospital six hours later.

"And what about that motorcycle spill you had just before the war?"

"I hit some loose gravel in the road," Bob admitted. "It shouldn't have happened. But I'm not riding motorcycles anymore, either." (That spill almost injured him permanently.)

"Ten years ago, I wouldn't have been at all surprised to hear that Bob had taken up bullfighting seriously," says one of his friends. "In those days, Bob would tackle anything new. And believe me, he wouldn't have stopped until he was one of the best bullfighters in the world—or flat on his back."

Happily, this time around, there's none of the "playboy" nonsense dogging his every step. Probably this is true because he's forsaken most of the madcap sports which made it possible for snap-judgers to pin that label on him. Also, Bob is a much wiser, more mature young man than he used to be.

Actors who have recently worked with him are genuine in their praise of his ability. But Bob is still a little wary of their exuberance.

"People will come up and say, 'Gee, Bob, you were terrific in that take' like they had expected me to have two heads and smell," Bob says. "But I believe that most of Hollywood is beginning to be convinced that I am serious about acting."

WHEN Bob's father, J. Langford Stack, died in 1929, he left a gross estate of nearly $5,000,000 in property to Bob, his mother, and his brother, Jim. It is a certainty that Bob will never be troubled by economic insecurity as long as he lives. It is only natural that this happy condition has created some unconscious resentment in Hollywood.

Movie actors wear dark glasses to funerals, to conceal the fact that their eyes are not red from weeping.—Nunnally Johnson

"It has never occurred to Bob that money is an advantage," a close friend of the Stack family says. "If anything, it provides a constant challenge for him to make good on his own."

Bob's tremendous admiration for his father has influenced everything he has ever done in his life. Jim Stack was a big, lusty man who began subjecting his two sons to outdoor life almost before they could talk. Bob was only 8 years old when his father first took him duck-hunting. When they got out in the blind, he handed Bob a 12-gauge shotgun to try. Bob shot it and it knocked him flat.

"I guess I'll have to get you a lighter gun," his father commented.

HE is so dead serious about acting that he has postponed all plans of marriage until he gets his career in full stride. He has been seeing a lot of Evelyn Keyes and Claudette Thornton. But neither one has wrung a proposal from him.

"I have the problem of being in love with my work," Bob says. "And until I have my profession under control, it wouldn't be fair to any woman to have a distraction like that in her life."

The past three years have been a period of restlessness and marking time for Bob Stack, waiting for that one part which would give him a chance to prove his real ability. It may be that Torero is it. But no matter how Torero turns out, Stack is on the way—and even a wild bull couldn't stop him. THE END

love me, love my house

(Continued from page 42) sports coats became enemies in the closet. There was no place for her records and his drafting boards. Finally she turned to John one evening and said, "What ever became of that stone and glass house in Mandeville Canyon?"

"It's still standing. Why?"

"Oh, nothing," she said casually. "Only, why don't we live in it?"

John was speechless for a moment. Then he grinned. "You mean you really want to live in a modern house?"

"If it's one of yours."

"It's one of mine," said John, "but maybe you won't like it. Maybe it's not your type. Maybe . . ."

"Maybe we ought to go look at it," she suggested.

So they went.

JOHN opened the heavy front door of the modern house, and he let Diana wander through it herself. He has a theory that you can't argue people into liking contemporary style architecture. You have to let them live in a contemporary home for a few weeks. If they don't like it after experiencing the freedom of uncluttered rooms and large expanses of sunlight, no eloquent flood of words will change them.

In a few minutes, Diana came looking for her husband. Her eyes were shining. "John, it's perfect for us! I think we should decorate our bedroom in rose-beige and chocolate brown and maybe have a splashy, figured wallpaper in one bathroom and something more masculine in the other. We can have red in the kitchen, and gray. And, of course, we'll eat by candlelight. Candlelight in the mountains . . . and all those windows. . . ."

Today, Diana is a confirmed modernist who specializes in giving dinner parties for ten or twelve friends, including one pair of house-hunting newlyweds. Just let anyone profess the smallest interest in her house, and she'll take them on a tour pointing out the wonderful conveniences which are hidden all over the place.

For example, there's a ventilator fan in the stall shower that draws all the steam and humidity out through a vent in the roof. Every room has a two-way speaker system which saves a lot of unnecessary walking in an otherwise narrow elongated house. All the light switches are located at convenient hip height instead of being at the old conventional shoulder level. This saves having to reach up every time you want to turn on a light. In addition, there is one black button on every light panel that ties into a master switch. A flip of this switch from anywhere in the house will turn on all the lights in the place. This simple gadget serves as a sure safety device. Should the Lindsays ever hear a prowler, they need only move a finger to flood their home with light.

IN THE Lindsay kitchen, you will find the greatest collection of up-to-the-minute conveniences for the housewife. There's a Westinghouse stove and refrigerator, a Frigidaire automatic laundry, and a Kitchenaid mixer that all operate on the low electric rate. The fireman-red counters and black splash are made of linoleum treated with a plastic bar varnish which won't stain or burn.

The house furnishings are equally as smart and economical, too. The floor to ceiling draperies throughout the entire residence are made of ordinary sailcloth. As a hanging fabric, sailcloth is wonderfully practical. It sheds dirt and doesn't need any lining to make it opaque. You can buy sailcloth at practically any department store.

The floors—and this, too, is a swell tip—are covered with Caliwool which is not a rug at all but a carpet liner. It costs $2.00 a square yard as compared to the cheapest broadloom at $8.00. Caliwool is wearable and comes in soft beautiful colors. It's ideal for the young home-maker. Someday, when the Lindsays' budget permits, they plan to lay wall to wall carpeting on top of their liner, but right now Caliwool is superb for their purposes.

The furniture in the Lindsay house is custom designed. A friend of John's, Newton Lichter, designed the pieces out of tough, inexpensive material. The two living room couches, for example, have wrought iron frames, while the cushions are ordinary bed mattresses and large bolsters, covered by a coarse green wool.

After Diana's friends make the grand tour of her house they usually tell her, "Dolly, you're so lucky being settled in a place designed especially for you."

Her reply is always the same. "When you're married to a car dealer," she says, "you run around in the latest model car. When you're married to an architect, you run around in the latest model house. With my John, it's a case of 'Love me, love my house!' . . . And believe me, I do!"

THE END

how sinful are movie stars?

Let's look at these "precocious children."

In general, the motion picture industry has attracted a motley, talented group of people from the most flamboyant segments of show business, and from the most varied avenues of life. Many of them, particularly the comedians, have been reared in poverty-stricken areas. Others, like Betty Hutton, Loretta Young, Lana Turner and Doris Day, have been raised without fathers. George Raft was a prize fighter. Frank Sinatra was a shipyard worker. Dorothy Lamour was an elevator operator.

To each of these, the word "sin" has a different meaning.

George Raft, for example, has frequently been singled out as an acquaintance of underworld characters. He has been seen and photographed with Frank Costello, Bugsy Siegel, and others with criminal records; but one must not forget that Raft was brought up on New York's tough East Side, that many of the children he played with as a boy later developed into well-known racketeers.

Whenever these men hit Hollywood, they drop in on Raft for old times' sake. He has never once snubbed any of them. In his moral code, such blatant snobbery would constitute a sin of the worst kind.

Frank Sinatra is another product of the slums. Some of the boys who attended school with him in Hoboken are currently serving time. In Sinatra's code, loyalty is paramount. Only a few years ago, he resigned from the swank Lakeside Country Club in North Hollywood because certain members didn't approve of his guests.

SIN has another meaning to actresses like Ginger Rogers, Joan Crawford, Greer Garson and Gloria Swanson, to name a few. They feel no guilt in having been married three or four times. For the most part, these are domineering women whose lives are meaningless without love. In many cases they have sacrificed husbands for careers, but they see no reason why this sacrifice should be perpetual. In their search for happiness, they are willing to take repeated risks with a free conscience.

Stories to the effect that Hollywood actresses and actors indulge periodically in orgiastic parties simply are not true. If anything there is probably less sexual activity among actors and actresses as a group than many others, for as the Kinsey Report revealed, there is infinitely more promiscuous sex activity among the unskilled, lower income occupational groups.

Screen stars aren't saints. Furthermore, they make no attempts to set themselves up as paragons of virtue. Most of them consider their work a livelihood and simply want to be left alone to enjoy their free time. Only after they've been in Hollywood for years do they realize how greatly they've sacrificed privacy for adulation.

Movie fans elevate actors to stardom. From time to time they will adopt a personality and deify him—as they did Van Johnson and Frank Sinatra. In return, fans demand that the stars lead their private lives in public, and woe to the star's career if the public disapproves.

Yet the lure of Hollywood never fails. For years it has attracted the talented, the poor but ambitious, because it rewards popularity with great wealth, and it places no premium on background. Its own background has not been a credit to its name.

In fact, it is Hollywood's past history which is most responsible for associating sin with stars in the public mind. Compared to the screen colony of the 1920's, Hollywood, today, is as pure as Eden before the snake walked in, and its actors and actresses are unfairly libeled by the immoral behavior of their predecessors.

To realize what relatively wholesome lives most screen stars currently lead, one has merely to refer to the front page of any leading 1920 newspaper.

IN that year, Olive Thomas, one of Flo Ziegfeld's most beautiful discoveries committed suicide in Paris. When the tragic news of her death reached New York, the lights all over Broadway were turned off as a mark of respect and love. Investigation by the French Surete General later revealed that cocaine had played more than a passing part in the actress' death.

A few months later, Wallace Reid, the handsome idol of millions, disappeared from Hollywood. His employers attributed his disappearance to "overwork," but everyone in the film colony knew otherwise. Wallace Reid was a morphine addict. In seven years, he had starred in 52 pictures, all of them box office successes. To maintain this killing schedule, he had succumbed to morphine.

For three long years, blackmailers bled him for loot. Reid had a wife and two children. He loved them deeply. He knew what the dope was doing to him, and he tried to rid himself of the habit. He succeeded for two whole months, but the enrced abstinence proved too great a rain. One day, he collapsed on the set. is wife took him to a mountain retreat here after a month of delirium, he died. His death set in motion a wave of ounting antagonism against Hollywood hich reached its peak on September 5, 921, when Fatty Arbuckle was accused f sexually violating a 23-year-old girl, nd thereby causing her death.

Arbuckle had first met Virginia Rappe t the old Keystone Studios and had taken n immediate liking to her. On one oc- asion he had even tried to "borrow" a ey to her dressing room from the night atchman, but with no success.

Years later, however, when Arbuckle as staying at the St. Francis Hotel in an Francisco, he learned that Virginia as in town and invited her over. She rrived with several of her friends. There as a good deal of drinking, and subse- uently Virginia and Fatty were paired off. resently, they strolled into an adjoining edroom where Arbuckle locked the door.

Twenty minutes later, Virginia's terri- ied screams reverberated throughout the uite. "I'm dying!" she cried. "I'm dying!" Her friends rushed to the bedroom door nd tried to kick it in. A very drunk Arbuckle opened the door.

Oddly enough, no one seemed to take he dying actress very seriously. The hotel hysician arrived and with the manager carried Virginia out of the suite, and the arty continued along its merry way.

Four days later, Virginia Rappe died in he hospital, and a coroner's jury found Roscoe Fatty Arbuckle guilty of causing her death. He was tried three times. Two trials ended in hung juries. On the third, Fatty won an acquittal, but by then, all his pictures had been banned from the screen, no one would hire him, and the anxious eyes of the nation were being focused on still another Hollywood scandal, the murder of William Desmond Taylor, one of the great directors at Lasky Studios.

TAYLOR, in his late fifties, had been shot in the back with a .32 calibre automatic while seated at his desk. Investigation of the murder revealed that the handsome director had been loved by two famous actresses, Mabel Normand and Mary Miles Minter. Since Miss Normand had been paying a narcotics gang approximately $2,000 a month for both drugs and blackmail, and Mary Miles Minter had written Taylor some exceedingly tempestuous love letters—Taylor's studio, according to one reporter, "did more to hamper the investigation of this murder than to help it."

As a result of it, however, the Hollywood producers were compelled to police the industry. For the job, they chose Will Hays, former Postmaster General in the cabinet of President Warren G. Harding.

Although Hays and his 1945 successor, Eric Johnston, still have many detractors, the fact is that under their supervision Hollywood movie stars have pretty much toed the moral line.

In the past 28 years, approximately 15,000 players have been under contract to the major studios. Less than ten of these have been involved in full-fledged scandals. No other industry dealing primarily in extrovertive, ego-ridden, publicity-hounded personalities can approach this record.

Today, Beverly Hills, where most of the screen stars reside, is one of the most law-abiding cities in the land. According to Chief Clinton Anderson, in charge of the local police, "We've had only two murders in this town, Pauly Gibbons and Bugsy Siegel, and in fifteen years, less than half a dozen prostitution cases. As a group, the movie colony consists of decent, law-abiding citizens. Once in a while, a young kid will be picked up for drunken driving, but that can happen in any community.

"Out here, we treat every resident alike. We show no partiality to movie stars. If they do anything wrong, we take them in. The fact that we haven't booked many of them is proof of their good behavior."

Stars are particularly sensitive to public opinion, and they will go to incredible lengths to prevent the circulation of unfavorable publicity. They know that they are constantly exposed to all sorts of sensational attacks.

IN 1943, a Mrs. Barbara Jean Thompson of Long Beach, California, accused Henry Fonda of fathering her child. At that time, Fonda was on duty with the U. S. Navy in the Pacific; when he heard the news, he quickly denied it, claiming that he had no recollection of the woman.

Mrs. Thompson, however, was insistent. She demanded several thousands for herhelf, her lawyer, her hospital bills.

Fonda's lawyers went to work. They quickly discovered that the plaintiff had previously been arrested in a Long Beach hotel on a morals charge. She had a police record, an extensive history of divorce and annulment, and had in addition employed many aliases. Fonda's attorney described her as "a very lewd and lascivious person." When the facts were made known, the case quietly evaporated, and Fonda emerged from the sordid mess with his reputation intact.

Ordinarily, this is not the result of most paternity suits. Regardless of the final decision, it is always the star who gets hurt. Certainly, this was true in paternity suits involving Wallace Beery, Charlie Chaplin, and the late William S. Hart, the Hopalong Cassidy of the 1920's. As a matter of fact, it was the paternity scandal of 1923 that ruined Hart's meteoric career.

In that year, Elizabeth MacCaullay, a Massachusetts school teacher, asserted that William S. Hart was the father of her 5-year-old boy. Hart denied it. Miss MacCaullay insisted the story was true.

When she took the witness stand, she gave her imagination full sweep. "Bill," she testified, "was so wonderful that I was blinded by my love for him. I succumbed to his wiles and whisperings. He may deny this all he pleases, but in his heart he will always remember the little woman from the East who gave all."

Unfortunately, the public didn't believe Hart, for too much scandalous activity had been going on in Hollywood. They stayed away from his pictures. His name on a theater marquee soon became poison. Eventually, the Massachusetts school teacher recanted her fanciful tale. By then William S. Hart's career was over.

THE same thing almost happened to Charlie Chaplin. Born in London in 1889, he's been the moral enfant terrible of the film industry for the past three decades. His father died when he was three years old, and his mother placed him in an almshouse. He never knew any kindness as a child, and when after three years in motion pictures, he began earning $10,000 a week, his conduct, his search for love, his attempts to buy happiness were typical manifestations of the rags-to-riches saga.

His first wife was Mildred Harris, a woman who described him as "an equal mixture of intellectual and sensualist." In 1924, favoring his sensual side, he married a 16-year-old actress named Lita Grey. She had two children by him and then sued for divorce demanding a cash settlement of a cool million dollars. She filed a petition which so graphically recounted Chaplin's many amours that copies were surreptitiously mimeographed and sold around Hollywood. The hue and cry were so great that for a short time it seemed very probable that Chaplin would follow Arbuckle and Hart into exile, but fortunately, he met most of his wife's demands, and the case was settled.

Years later, Chaplin was asked by movie mogul Joseph Schenck to take a trip on his yacht. Chaplin accepted and on the yacht he met an ex-chorus girl named Paulette Goddard. Chaplin cast her opposite him in Modern Times, married her in 1936, divorced her in 1942.

With Paulette gone, the middle-aged genius looked about for a new protegée. He found her in the form of Joan Barry, a beautiful teen-aged red-head. He placed her under contract.

One evening, eighteen months later, he suddenly cancelled her contract. He barred her from the premises. Joan refused to stay away. The police picked her up and jailed her. Chaplin finally gave her $100 and a railroad ticket to New York, and she was released from jail on her promise to leave the city. Instead, she called on a Hollywood columnist, one of Chaplin's known enemies. "I'm going to bear Charlie Chaplin's child," she announced.

Chaplin was indicted by a Federal grand jury on four separate counts. He was accused of violating the Mann Act, transporting a girl across the state lines for immoral purposes, and of having conspired to deny Joan Barry her civil rights. The Mann Act count was dismissed, and Chaplin was acquitted on the others.

Miss Barry then instituted a paternity suit. Blood tests conclusively established that Chaplin was not the father of her unborn child, but the court later compelled the comedian to pay a monthly allowance for the support of the baby. At a time when it looked very much as if he might be deported—Chaplin is not a U. S. citizen—when he was being smeared left and right, and the whole world was seemingly against him, he fell in love again, this time with Oona O'Neill, the daughter of playwright Eugene O'Neill. After his acquittal of the Federal charges, Chaplin married her. When Joan Barry was told the news, she supposedly burst into tears of rage.

There is no doubt that Chaplin's amorous adventures have reflected adversely on Hollywood moral standards. There is little doubt that several other stars have been tinted by the brush used to smear him.

Stars are always being accused of some crime or other. These charges always make the headlines, true or false. The cumulative effect upon the public is the mistaken belief that the natural state of actors and actresses is trouble. Many fans aren't aware of the number of crackpots who make trouble for celebrities.

Take Betty Grable. Ever since she achieved stardom she has been the target of countless extortionists. On January 5th, 1941, she received a threatening letter, demanding that she send $2,000 to a Betty Westlake of Washington. The letter was written by an 18-year-old fan.

Ninety days later, Betty, under the threat of death, received a letter demanding $8,500. The FBI picked up its author, James Thompson, in a Birmingham cafe and sent him to jail for a year and a day.

Last year, her life was again threatened "unless you leave $5,000 to the man who will be leaning against a wall on Gower between Melrose and Santa Monica." The FBI was called in again. This time a policewoman disguised as the actress was sent walking along Gower Street with a dummy package of bills. She dropped the package, and a young man picked it up. He was arrested and confessed that he wanted $5,000 "to tour Hollywood and see the film stars."

Another prominent female target for extortion was Clara Bow. In the early 1930's, Clara was earning $6,000 a week.

She was alternately described as the "It" girl, "the Brooklyn Bonfire," the "hottest dame this side of the Atlantic." She knew droves of men and she was supposedly, in a term of thirty months, engaged to Bela Lugosi, Harry Richman, Victor Fleming, Gilbert Roland, and Gary Cooper.

She lived the kind of life most people think Hollywood actresses live, wild, reckless, man-filled. She spent her money so lavishly that gambling croupiers below the border called her "Clara Dough-Blow."

Unfortunately, she had a penchant for saving love letters. Her private secretary, Daisy De Voe, stole "the hottest" of these and threatened to turn them over to the newspapers unless Clara gave her $125,000.

Clara refused. Daisy was arrested and sent to the women's penitentiary, but the scandal she had engendered finished Clara Bow as a screen attraction. Clara married Rex Bell and retired from the screen.

For years the publicity mills have been grinding out truckloads of material on the private lives of the stars. In Hollywood, no man and woman ever go out for simple fun. It is always passion that spins the plot. Sometimes, as in the Hayworth and Bergman instances, the publicity boys are right in their assumption that something is "cooking." Frequently, however, they're wrong, in fact so wrong, that Dore Schary, chief of production at MGM recently said: "Hollywood is a good example of how misunderstood a place can get.

"The mental picture of Hollywood is that it is the capital of screwballism, full of actors either chasing other actors' wives or divorcing their own, of maniac directors and writers surveying their swimming pools and muttering about Art.

"Though the picture is wrong, it is partly Hollywood's own fault that it exists. In the beginning, many years ago, we made it exist because we thought it was good showmanship. We displayed the roaring tigers and the girl with three heads on Main Street, just as the small circus does today. It sold tickets."

Nowadays, sin still sells tickets. If anything, it tends to temporarily enhance a star's fame and box office popularity, but few stars will traffic with it, because vice, debauchery, and drunkenness leave telltale lines about the face.

Ambition, common sense, business acumen, and the searching light of publicity keep actors in line. These factors combine to make them less sinful, on the whole, than the general public.

If you doubt this, look at Hollywood's record in recent years, and then take an honest look into the police files or into the form and number of immoral actions in any city of our land. THE END

Are you as lovely as you can be?

Bob's face sobered down. "You're absolutely right, Hedda," he agreed. "And I promise you—I'll go back and get her."

Three days later I read the headlines. Three days later the police had Bob Mitchum in jail and in trouble.

THERE'S nothing unique about trouble, Heaven knows. It's about as exclusive as the measles. I have troubles every day—so, I'll bet, do you. Trouble is living and life, as the smartie said, "is just one damn thing after another." But the Good Lord gave most of us the natural caution to dodge as much public trouble as we can and the good sense to realize that our reputations are the best assets we'll ever have. Yet, in a spotlighted town where good names are money in the bank and where, you'd think, the stars would do everything in their powers to keep them white as the snow—what do we see?

Rita Hayworth wants to marry a prince. Well, that's fine. But does she have to travel over half the world with him first in a flagrant flouting of all accepted conventions, knowing that her fame will make every step public property? If Ingrid Bergman wants to change husbands and start another family, okay—that seems to be done in the best of circles. But can't she pick a more discreet setting for her romance than a ballyhooed picture location and can't she ring out the old before she rings in the new—like everybody else?

"Every time I begin to emote, I look up and there is a horse—stealing my scene."—Maria Montez

Sometimes it seems the stars go out of their way to court headlines via disaster. Sometimes it seems that Hollywood is indeed a school for scandal. But it's not. Only recently a government investigator sent out from Washington to uncover the wicked goings on of Horrible Hollywood went right back and with an empty briefcase. Hollywood, by and large, he discovered, is just as respectable as any other city you can name. What then, cooks up all this trouble you read about?

A quick answer is: Through too much fame, too much flattery, too much money, too much concentrated work with too much empty leisure in between. "Idle hands are the devil's playthings," they used to tell me back in Altoona, Pa., and I still believe it. And, as another wise man once observed, "Stars can stand anything but success." But what's missing in that answer is the human element. Stars are people, believe it or not. They're all different, from different backgrounds, and they each react very differently when bowled over by the whirlwinds of fame.

TAKE Frankie Sinatra—and America certainly did. Maybe that was the trouble. They took Frankie to their hearts too fast and he thought he was somebody out of this world, with no obligations whatever. For a kid from across the tracks his great good fortune was to be grabbed greedily and the result was a spoiled, swell-headed young man. Frank's trail up and down the ladder is spotted with ingratitudes. His greatest ingratitude, of course, has been to Nancy, who anchored him, gave him the home he'd never known as a kid, wonderful children and her loyal love. Everybody loved Frankie—but he didn't love back. And that's the root of his trouble tree, and always will be until he learns that love is a two-way word.

On the other hand, have a look at Bob Mitchum, a big irresponsible guy who loves everybody and the world in general, not wisely but too well. And that amiable weakness is as dangerous for Bob as Frankie's selfishness is for him.

Victor Mature is another one of the most ingratiating fellows I know. But thrice married Vic is a born bachelor at heart. He still can't see why he isn't free as the air though married. A while back I ran across Vic and Dorothy in Las Vegas, huddled in a gaming club. It was very late and dead-tired Dorothy forced a wan smile. "I came up here for a rest," she said, "and look! We haven't been to bed before five o'clock for three straight nights." She didn't say it happily either and Vic's troubles brew because he still never knows, or cares, what time it is.

I WATCH stars every day, men and women both, going on being the light hearted, self-indulgent kids they once were. 'way back when they started on this rosy Hollywood road to success, so pleasant and nice, as long as you keep it straight and narrow. It always amazes me, though, as the years go by, that they never learn the simple fact that they can't do just as they please, that they've got to grow up, that the sides of that road are glass and that people are going to look, and too often find them wanting in one way or another.

One day, before he sailed away to find Princess Ghica, I drove up to Errol Flynn's house for an interview. He had to ask a blonde to please leave before we could get down to business.

It didn't surprise me because I know Errol. I know he is a man who—in all truth—women just won't leave alone. But I also know that Errol doesn't particularly want them to. It's perfectly okay with me for Errol to keep an accent on youth, and if he can stay fatally fascinating to the ladies in his mid-years and get by with it—power to him. All the world loves a lover—even a fortyish lover—until he shows up in a jam.

Trouble with Errol is, he's about as discreet as a pussycat. He never learned to pay for his fun until it was too late, when he paid plenty. I've always thought that five dollars' worth of roses to Nora Eddington at the right time would have saved Errol a lot of trouble and some important money, too. But I don't expect him ever to learn.

Nor do I expect to see the day when another perpetual Peter Pan named Sonny Tufts snaps out of adolescence and acts his years. Sonny was a legend in his college campus cutup days—and I suppose it was cute then. He was the life of every party when he first came to Hollywood. But what used to earn him cheers just brings him hangover headaches today, the real kind and the career kind, too.

Are the miseries of movieland all just a case of grown-ups still wearing rompers on their psyches? Not exactly. On the contrary, growing up too fast under the million-dollar pressure of a precocious career has wreaked even more havoc.

Since she was thirteen Judy Garland has made thirty-odd full length pictures for MGM. She never was a little girl. She never had time to be. She was a grown up star—and a wife and mother, too—before she could call herself a woman. She paid the price of ignoring that delicate transition period in snapped nerves, a physical breakdown, and trouble which may haunt her for a long time to come.

You can trace the beginnings of too many adult star troubles to the high gear growing up which is the price of concentrated kiddie careers. Who was more talented, beautiful and blooming than Deanna Durbin—and who turned into a more trouble-tormented disappointment? Betty Hutton has worked practically since the day she was born, worked hard, to the limit of her terrific talent. Learning the rugged ropes of show business in her growing years, how did Betty have a chance to learn the true values of living at the time every girl and boy must?

When Betty called me one day last year to say she was leaving her husband, Ted Briskin, I gasped, "Betty, how can you? You'll never find another man as sweet as that. Think it over."

Well, Betty did and she went back to Ted. But the next time she didn't call me—the time she filed for divorce. I wish she had, although I'm not sure it would have done any permanent good. Betty is still giving her heart and soul to making pictures and those pictures are making her a bigger and bigger star. But will she ever know what she really wants? Won't the theme song of show business—off-with-the-old-and-on-with-the-new be the same for Betty's real life? Those are the wrong values for happiness.

I CAN sympathize with Betty Hutton, but it's very hard indeed for me to squeeze out crocodile tears for Ava Gardner, another girl who picked up wrong values—and I do mean wrong—right here in Hollywood. As a result, Ava is flouting conventions right and left and heading for trouble as sure as shooting. She may think—as I suspect she does—that working up an international scandal is hot stuff for her screen siren reputation. But she's playing with fire. How she's changed!

When I first saw Ava Gardner she was a pretty little girl from North Carolina, innocent and sweet as a peach. I remember an MGM publicity man took her on a studio tour when she first arrived, led her onto a Mickey Rooney set. "I hope you're satisfied," he said. "You've actually met Mickey Rooney now!" That plunged Ava into tears because she was mortified that anyone should think she'd be that ga-ga over a movie star. Today, Ava out-movie stars most movie stars herself. In fact, some scandal more sensational than her toreador trouble was about to trap Ava in very unsavory Hollywood headlines if she hadn't sailed off to Spain when she did. Maybe she makes a better siren off the screen than she does on, anyway—and that's another reason why you'll find some of our best stars sticking their custom-shod feet regularly in muddle puddles: They get to believe the parts they play.

"The trouble with you, Bogie," I heard Prince Mike Romanoff say once, "is that you think you're Humphrey Bogart." Mike had noted the uncounted instances when Bogie, in Romanoff's and elsewhere, needled people menacingly as he does before a camera. The important difference is: it works before a camera—nowhere else.

Bette Davis is another night and day star who's played a supercharged neurotic so long, that she's one herself. She's dominated everyone opposite her on the screen so long that now she has to dominate everybody in sight—in the studio and out—or she's miserable.

I don't know which is worse, frankly—to be wrapped up in your roles like that or to be unhappily scornful of the parts you play, as was Ingrid Bergman. A lot of Ingrid's miseries sprang from her phony, untouchable legend and from her unconsidered impulsiveness, too. An impulsive telephone call to Leo McCarey that I suggested, got her that wonderful nun role in The Bells of St. Mary's but a letter to Roberto Rossellini, which was definitely her own idea, got her Stromboli, and everything that came after. But the well-spring of her woes lay in her conviction that Hollywood wasn't doing right by her.

LAST summer in Rome, in the drab hidden little apartment where I interviewed her, Ingrid replied when I asked how she ever wrote that fatal letter anyway, "I had to get away. I couldn't play any more of those run-of-the-mill parts."

"Was the nun in The Bells of St. Mary's a run-of-the-mill part?" I asked her. "Was Joan of Arc one, too?"

"You don't understand," said Ingrid. Well, maybe I don't. There are a lot of things I don't understand about other people's troubles and what they'll lead to.

I've given advice until my tongue sagged, because I'm still sucker enough to try to help people who can't or won't help themselves. Sometimes I have the satisfaction of seeing it heeded. I called Lana Turner once, for instance, and got results. She was back in Connecticut with Bob Topping defying MGM's plea to come home and make a picture. I'd heard top echelon talk and I knew she was set to be MGM's whipping girl if she acted up.

"They're going to lower the boom on you, Lana," I warned. "If you still want your job, you'd better make that picture."

"But it's a lousy part," she argued.

"I don't care if it's the lousiest part ever written." I said, "Get out here." Most of Lana Turner's multiple troubles have stemmed from her trusting habit of taking the last advice given her—and usually that's been bad. Luckily, I was the last one she talked to before she boarded a plane west, and mine was good. She did Three Musketeers and saved her career.

HOLLYWOOD stars live by being unreal. Yet this world's a very real place which they seem to forget. When they make movies, if they're any good, they give everything. They're squeezed dry. There's nothing left for a husband, a child, a home, or even a problem, half the time. The other half of the time—boom—suddenly they're pacing around with nothing to do. No wonder they act, too often, like puppies let out of a pen—racing around foolishly making noise and winding up with yowls.

I know a star who deliberately leaves Hollywood after every movie he finishes.

"OH DAD, and just the right kind, too!"

aturally, Janie's happy! Like most en-age girls, she has pretty definite references in stockings. She knows at to get the kind she prefers, she has look at the label and see the brand ame. (That's the name the manufacrer gives the clothing he makes so at folks can tell it from others.)

Asking by brand name is the only ay to buy anything—from clothes to lf balls. It's the only way to get the act product you want.

Brand names mean protection. They ake the manufacturer responsible for e quality of products that bear his and name. Any manufacturer knows at only if you find his products good, u will buy them.

Brand names mean progress...each anufacturer works to improve his oduct and to make his brand name and for even better quality.

Always ask for products by brand me—get quality, protection and... actly what you want. Incidentally, in is magazine, notice the ads for some America's most famous brand names.

He goes to some little town where nobody knows him, locks himself in a hotel room and has a quiet one-man relaxing spree. I know another who checks into a hospital. And I know one who sometimes just gets in his car and drives and drives. Once he drove clear to Texas before he thought to call home. His name was Dan Dailey, and that drive got him in trouble.

But who's to say what is one star's meat or another's poison? Who's to play nursemaid? When you're all grown up, free and past twenty-one, you're supposed to stand on your own two feet, aren't you? There are certain standards and conventions we all must learn and live by, in Hollywood, California, or Iuka, Illinois. There's good taste and there's bad. And when you break the rules you pay. That's what plenty of free-wheeling stars are doing in Hollywood today, whether they know it or not.

What always makes me shake my wooly head in awe is that so few of them do know it, even when it's written in headlines. Which reminds me of the funniest piece of advice a star ever sought from me.

She was warm-hearted and impulsive, to put it mildly, and one summer she gaily toured all over Europe with her boy friend, another big star.

Coming back home to Hollywood she called me up. "Hedda," she asked me, "do you think I ought to marry him?"

"Honey," I told her, "if you don't know the answer to that by now, I guess you never will!"

That's more or less the way I'm beginning to feel about these Hollywood naughty boy beautifuls and girls gorgeous, who get caught in the jam pot of some trouble or another. If they don't know how to behave themselves by now, what makes anyone think they ever will? THE END

ME: Can you hear me all right?

FRANK: (desperately eyeing door) Yes, Mrs. Powell.

ME: Thank you, Frank. You've made me very happy. By the way, would you please see that we get two copies of the morning paper from now on?

FRANK: (light dawning in his eyes) Of course, Mrs. Powell.

Scene II: Next morning. Me at breakfast table, reading newspaper. Enter Richard.

RICHARD: 'Morning, doll.

ME: You say you're here already? Tell you what I'm gonna do. I'm gonna let you have the paper. (I hand it to him.)

RICHARD: Holy Cow! It'll take me twenty minutes to sort this thing!

ME: (I giggle, walk around the table, kiss the top of his head, get reaction.)

RICHARD: A nice gesture, wife. Why don't you do it more often?

ME: (restraining me) I had a wonderful golf game yesterday.

RICHARD: (sorting paper) You did? I didn't know you were going to play golf. Who'd you play with?

ME: Helen.

RICHARD: Helen? Why didn't you tell me you were going to see her? I wanted to talk to her about a show.

ME: (airily) I thought of mentioning it but I just didn't want to disturb you. (Enter Frank, bearing fruit juice and morning paper.) I'll take that second paper, please, Frank.

RICHARD: (still sorting his copy, looks up in surprise) What goes on here?

ME: Just a small idea I had. It'll keep us married for at least another five years.

RICHARD: (leans over and kisses me on the nose) You're a wicked woman, but I love you. (Frank exits hurriedly.)

ACT II: The Nursery. (This is where Olie spins tales of her childhood for Pamela and me, a childhood that must have been wonderful. She had seven brothers and sisters and they lived in a big house in Vancouver and there was a cherry tree outside her bedroom window. This is the kind of childhood I want Pamela to have. Olie is a genius at disciplining Pamela—as this scene will show.) Pam and I are alone in the nursery and Pam has just taken a picture from a table.

ME: Put it back, darling.

PAM: (smiles coyly and grasps the picture tighter) Love you, mama.

ME: I love you, too, but you must put the picture back on the table.

PAM: (remains motionless) Love you six.

ME: (disregarding charm) Pamela, the picture is not yours, and you must put it back. (Enter Olie.)

OLIE: Put that picture back, small fry.

PAM: Yes, yes. Hurry, hurry. (Runs to table and replaces picture.)

Act III: Doctor's office. (This requires a little explanation . . . Olie can never understand why I complain about going on trips. She even gets delirious about a trip to our mailbox, and so it is that I usually invite her to come with me on my shopping trips and visits to doctors. The latter have had disastrous results for Olie. In this scene we are in the office of a doctor who is to remove a small mole from my neck.)

ME: (suddenly struck with a thought) Olie, don't you have a mole on your arm?

OLIE: Well, yes, but it doesn't matter.

ME: Let the doctor look at it.

(Olie surrenders and the doctor examines it carefully.)

DOCTOR: (straightening up) Miss Olson, I'd advise that you have this removed at once. There's a possibility of it becoming malignant.

Scene II: Another doctor's office. This time Olie accompanies me to an eye, nose and throat specialist, who is going to check my sinus condition, which is very slight.

ME: Hey, Olie!

OLIE: No you don't. (Makes movement toward door.)

ME: Oh, just let him look. You don't have any sinus condition, but maybe he should check you.

OLIE: (resignedly sitting in chair) This is silly.

DOCTOR: (after examination) Miss Olson, you have two polyps in your nostrils. They're large and should be removed.

OLIE: (wide-eyed) Honest?

DOCTOR: I don't know how you've been breathing with these obstructions.

ME: (gleefully) See? I told you so.

Scene III: The Nursery. Olie is recovering from surgery.

ME: I'm going out. Want to come along?

OLIE: Where to?

ME: I'm going to see my obstetrician.

OLIE: NO!

INTERMISSION: Even before I knew I was going to have a baby my family worried because I wouldn't eat. Now they are practically frantic. So I'm just going to omit all the scenes where Richard keeps phoning from his office to ask if I've had my lunch. Olie insists I drink some concoction that tastes like pulverized motorman's gloves, and Marian gets into arguments with the vegetable man because he doesn't have the food she thinks I should eat. Frank is responsible for my iron, calcium, and etcetera pills intake. The pill battles go on all day. I don't mind them, it's just that Frank can never find me.

Pat Grenier, my secretary, also cannot locate me. Every time she mentions letter-writing I think of tennis. Anyway, she calls about business, I always t I'm busy. Then she calls Olie. Ol her to come over. Of course, Pat com we get down to work and then I'm g

MR. EGGART: I put in some gloxin anemone, and some salpiglossis.

ME: You don't say. How are the coming along? (I know what a ros rose is a rose.)

MR. EGGART: Just fine, Mrs. Po mulched them yesterday. What abo gypsophila?

ME: (cornered) I guess the nort would be nice.

MR. EGGART: All right. Did you s cistus cuttings I planted? They're the cherimoya tree. And we're go have ceanothus over the front wall.

out from under her coat.) Ha-ha.

Act. VII: Richard and Pam and I are driving home from Palm Springs, and it is approaching Pam's dinner hour.

PAM: Pam hungry.

ME: All right, dear, we'll stop soon.

RICHARD: From what I remember of this road, Junie, it's going to be some time before we reach a place where we can have dinner. You'd better humor her.

ME: What do you want for dinner, Pam?

PAM: Pears. And meat.

ME: That's fine. Pears and meat.

PAM: Cus-nerd.

ME: And Custard. All right, you just wait a while and we'll have that fine dinner. (Almost an hour passes, during which Pam is completely quiet. Suddenly she breaks the silence with a low moan.)

ME: What's the trouble, darling?

PAM: Oh, Oh, Pears—all gone. Meat—all gone. Cus-nerd—a-a-all go-o-ne. Oh, Oh.

ACT VIII: Sightseeing time. (Explanation: It sometimes happens that sightseers wander into our grounds, and when Marian first came to us she wanted to invite everyone in and serve them tea and cake. This would be all right with Richard and me, if it didn't get too busy and we didn't turn into a tea shop, but Olie who is major-domo, would have none of it.)

"You'll have to cut this short," she told Marian, "or everybody and his uncle who's visiting California will be stopping in to see the Powells."

"But what can I tell these people?" Marian asked.

"Oh, tell 'em they're out. Tell them they're out of town and won't be back for two weeks. Be polite, but firm."

And the next day when a group of strangers wandered up the driveway, they were met in a loving fashion by Pat, the poodle, the birdbrain—the only time he barks is when Richard and I come home from a trip and then he's determined not to allow us into the house.

STRANGERS: Is anybody home?

MARIAN: Well, I'm home, but Mr. and Mrs. Powell aren't.

STRANGERS: When will they be back?

MARIAN: (with an effort) Oh, I'd say in about two weeks. They've gone to Hawaii.

ME: (dressed in blue jeans and barging around a corner of the house) Hey, Marian, where's the hose?

MARIAN (blanches) Won't you all come in for a cup of tea?

Scene II: More sightseers. I am in the garden, inspecting the oleanders, and am dressed in my perennial blue jeans. Marian is nearby, clipping some herbs for the kitchen. Suddenly, not ten feet away, the bus which carries tourists on trips to the stars' homes screeches to a stop.

DRIVER: (in clarion tones) On your right is the residence of Dick Powell and June Allyson. (Twenty heads crane out of the windows and I feel trapped.)

PASSENGER: (pointing at me) Who's she?

DRIVER: Search me. Must be the maid.

MARIAN: (rigid with rage) Well! I never! (I go into hysterics, forcibly restraining Marian from punching the bus driver.)

Curtain speech:

If my baby is a girl, I want to name her Patricia, but I'm getting a lot of resistance from my family. You see, there's Pat the secretary, and Pat Wright, our relief nurse, and Pat the poodle, and then there's Pam, too, and I guess everybody figures we have enough confusion around here already. Maybe we do, but I bet I name my daughter Pat, anyway. It'll mean more confusion, certainly, but then I figure the more the merrier. And the new baby will be a welcome addition to the lovable cast of characters around here—I do mean characters, I do mean lovable, too. THE END future perfect

Larry, himself, arranged to make only one picture a year at Columbia. This year it's That Bedside Manner, but after that, no more paychecks until 1951.

No money for mink coats, no money for swimming pools—for a while. "You're crazy!" say the people in the hand-painted ties. They don't know the Parks, they don't know the way they like to live.

They like to pitch in and have plain fun with their friends. Recently when Lloyd Bridges (he's in The White Tower now) and his wife Dorothy built a beach house, the Parks were up to their knees in sand and cement, helping.

The Bridges had bought four walls from a housebreaker and the rest was in anybody's hands. Larry and Lloyd put more nails through their fingers than in the house, but it was built.

Then, when it was all finished, Lloyd invited the gang over to dinner—the Lewis Milestones, the Jeff Coreys, the Phil Browns. . . . There was a grunion run that week (grunions are tiny fish peculiar to the Pacific Coast who come onto the beach in waves, burrow in the sand to spawn and then are washed out to sea again).

The gang caught 500 grunions, and after the last grunion had been cleaned, the argument started.

"Let's cook them in grease," said Larry, "to preserve their tender, natural, delectable flavor."

"Grease!" shouted Lloyd. "You clod. Grease is for peasants! Let's dip them in butter, let's wash them in sherry."

"I say grease," said Larry. "Who says grease?"

No one said anything. So they drew a line down the barbecue, and blindfolded the guests. Lloyd used sherry, Larry used grease, and the guests used forks. The 500 grunion were consumed, and a couple of weeks later, Lloyd shook Larry's hand. "You've saved me $50 in butter, old soak, you're a gentleman and a scholar."

LLOYD also built a barbecue. Larry saved him almost four hundred dollars. It was simple. Larry made a rule. "Anytime anyone goes near the ocean he has to bring back a rock." By the time they were ready to build the barbecue, there were enough rocks for another house. The labor was free, the cement was $1.50. An ordinary barbecue usually costs from $350 to $400.

Betty likes to save money, too. When she and Larry got ready for their personal

Who's On First

Occasionally, even to admirers of Mike Curtiz's offbeat diction, he is almost incomprehensible. "I want," he said during a visit to Canada, "to see quintaloupes."

"Where is that?" asked his friend.

"Not a where—a what," replied Mike testily.

"All right, what what?"

"Quintaloupes."

His friend said, "I don't get you, Mike."

"You know, those five twins," he replied patiently.

appearance tour in London's Palladium, and in Glasgow, Betty didn't call up Hattie Carnegie and order from a list. She went to her closet and hauled out the clothes—her favorite quilted skirts were shortened, and new blouses and petticoats were made.

"I guess you think you saved a million," said Larry, looking at the dressmaker's bill.

"Well, maybe I didn't save much, but think how clever I was. Anyway, look at how much I saved on these knitted dresses. Four knitted dresses for forty dollars!"

"How much did you save?" asked Larry.

Betty waved her arms. "Untold amounts. If I'd bought them somewhere else, it might have cost a hundred dollars."

"That means you saved sixty."

"Exactly."

"Give me the sixty," said Larry, laughing. She playfully gave him the back of her hand.

Betty saves on turkeys, though. Her market gives merchandising stamps as premiums, and she keeps them. Every Thanksgiving and Christmas she walks into the market, hands over her stamps, and gets a twenty-pound turkey.

"Little genius," says Larry.

"Big turkey," says Betty—and he eats her words.

Their plans for going to Europe were fun. It was like a holiday—the first they've had with each other in a long time. Friends were always calling to wish them well, friends were always coming over for lunch, for talk, or to play with the baby.

Garry's bassinet, quilted in yellow, would be wheeled out into the wide archway between the living and dining room, and Garry would lie there cooing.

"Honey," Betty said one day. "I don't want to go."

"But you have to go," said Larry. "You promised. Besides, you're going."

"I don't want to leave the baby. What will Paris be like without the baby?"

"My mother's going to take care of the baby," said Larry, "and there'll be Mrs. Currie, and look at that baby, he's fast asleep. What would he do in Paris?"

So they're leaving the baby home, but the Parks will spend only one week in Paris. Garry weighs 15 pounds now, and they want to be back by the time he weighs 20.

They want to be back to make more plans together—for a play to take to Broadway, for a television show, for anything that sounds too good to let go by.

A couple of weeks ago, the two of them cut a platter over at MGM. They'd made some novelty hits together—like "Go To Sleep, Go To Sleep," and "Can I Come In For a Second?" But this time the record was different. It was slow and sentimental. It was "Side By Side."

They don't have a theme song, they don't need one. But if they ever do, "Side By Side" would come pretty close to home.

can june haver love again?

When she was 15 the man with the smile was Jimmy Zito. He was 17, he led a band, and no matter what the music was it came out I love you. He had dark wavy hair and a small moustache and every time she looked at him she got a little dizzy.

Careers interrupted their romance. Time passed between them, but the memory of a first love is a sweet and funny thing. It grows with age and takes on a meaning that it never really had. When Jimmy and June met again, the memory seemed too beautiful to destroy, so they got married—and it destroyed itself.

The marriage was a nightmare, but when June awoke from it the world seemed clearer. It was as if she had stepped out of a thick fog into the sunshine, and waiting there to lead her by the hand was Dr. John Duzik.

He'd been waiting a long time. He'd watched June in her confusion; he'd let her marry someone else, and now he let her come back to him. He was older than June, but he was young, unknowing, softer than he might have been toward her. Now that she needed him, he was grateful.

Gradually he healed the hurt in June—with music and literature and quiet talk they kept to themselves. Instead of going out to meet the world together, they let the world come close, but no closer. And in a way they built a wall around themselves, a wall that collapsed when John Duzik died.

FRIENDS worried then about June. How many tragedies could a young girl take, especially a girl whose thoughts always turned inward? She had no shoulders to weep on but her own, and her own were small. For months she kept to herself, and it was an incongruous and pathetic sight to see this petite, lovely blonde withdrawing from the young, pleasure-filled existence that should have been hers.

Sy Bartlett arrived at the moment he was needed. In all of her 24 years June had not yet found a man who had the strength for which she'd always yearned. Even at a superficial glance he is a man of the world—writer, producer, Air Force colonel, polo player, friend of President and cab driver—there is little outside the realm of his experience.

He and June were attracted to each other even before they were introduced. Later, with typical directness he set about bringing June out of herself. Intensely alive and sure of himself, she could not resist sharing his enthusiasm for life.

Her vitality came back, her smiles became frequent, the lilt returned to her voice. More and more she fell under the spell of his charm.

Where Jimmy Zito was jealous, Sy was generous. He liked to show her off to other people. He gave a dinner party shortly after they started dating. He had invited from his vast collection of friends only a chosen few he wanted June to meet. Most of the guests had gathered on the terrace overlooking Los Angeles when June arrived. The pride in his voice when he introduced her was apparent, but even he was amazed at the rapidity with which June won the admiration of the group. He knew they would like her, but he was unprepared for the poise she displayed, not knowing that he was in part responsible for her self-assurance.

During this early period they were seen together in the gay, crowded places. They'd dance all night at Mocambo, and they'd exchange long glances at a corner table. Everybody began to talk about their budding romance but they were too wrapped up in each other to notice.

Two of June's close friends were lunching together at Romanoff's one afternoon when she walked in with Sy.

"Hey," one said. "Is that June?"

"It sure is," the other replied. "But she isn't the same girl we played Canasta with a few weeks ago."

It certainly wasn't. June hadn't been spending many afternoons with the girls since Sy came along. There she stood, poised and impeccable, from the chic perfection of blue velvet Toni cloche and taffeta suit, to the tip of her shell sandals.

When she sat down, June waved a gay greeting to her friends. For the rest of their luncheon they sat and wondered at the change in her. The June Haver they'd come to know was shy and restrained, given to wearing flat shoes and cotton dresses. What they didn't stop to figure out was that the trials in June's life were no incentive to preening her feathers. Now there was a reason to make the effort—and Sy was a most appreciative audience.

She found in him a thoughtfulness that is so often lacking in younger men. Experience has taught him that real happiness lies in doing things for others, and it delights him to be able to help June with any of her problems, great or small.

She called him one day in tears to tell him that she had just received a telegram that her grandmother, to whom she was very close, was seriously ill and had been taken to the hospital. Her grandmother was in Las Vegas, but this was no problem to Sy Bartlett. He reassured her, told her he would take care of everything and within five minutes he had arranged for a plane to fly her and her sister to Las Vegas. Just to make doubly sure that everything went right, he cancelled whatever appointments he had and accompanied them. When they arrived he took over the business of checking them into the hotel while they went immediately to the hospital.

Later that evening, while they were having their after-dinner coffee in the dining room of the Flamingo Hotel, a columnist approached their table. Sy was very careful to explain that they were there to visit June's grandmother, and asked him not to say anything about their being in Las Vegas together. For June's sake he didn't want the news to get into the papers because it was bound to set off a great chain reaction of rumors about impending marriage.

Nothing was printed. The Bartlett charm had again carried the day. And the light in June's eyes gave mute testimony of her growing affection for this man.

The role of "protector," on the other hand, appeals mightily to the dominant Sy. His former wife, Ellen Drew, is a very self-reliant young woman who demands order in her life. She would prepare dinner for two, and more than likely Sy would choose that night to invite six guys home with him. Regimentation is not for Sy. He refuses to have his life run on a timetable. When Ellen discovered she could not put him on a "schedule" they parted.

It is possible that neither June nor Sy were aware of the reason for their strong attraction. When romance blossoms one doesn't stop to analyze the why and wherefore. The warmth of companionship and mutual satisfaction needs no analysis. Their romance was moving along faster than either of them realized.

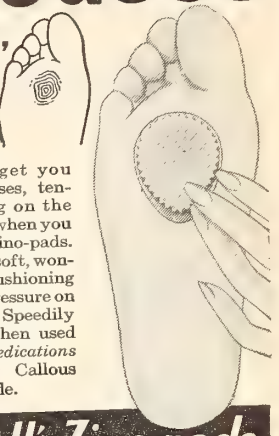
If they weren't in love they were giving a great imitation. Neither one stopped to consider the obstacles which had existed from the first. However, in every relationship there comes a time when the problems must be faced and mastered, or the dream of love must cease to exist. June and Sy have at last arrived at that point.

The religious angle is a high hurdle. June is deeply devoted to her faith, and though it would not be the first time love has moved mountains, it would be presumptuous to assume that she could give up the "faith of her fathers" without pondering the decision at length.

When June was taken to the hospital for observation a few weeks ago, Sy was there day and night. They were drawn even closer together, and when he bought her an exquisite pearl necklace it looked as though they would announce their engagement as soon as she was well enough to be taken home. So it came as a distinct shock when a commentator announced over the radio that June Haver and Sy Bartlett had decided not to see each other any more. A spat? A lovers' quarrel? No. There was cold reasoning behind the decision. They were faced with the alternative of either getting married or breaking up. Their feeling for each other had become too serious to continue as a light romance.

The Sunday night that June was taken home from the hospital was her birthday, but there was no feeling of elation for June. Sy was not there. The birthday, coming home . . . this should have been a gay occasion. The tears in June's eyes contrasted strangely with the glow that had been there only a short while ago when they sat by Sy's pool planning a celebration. She had said, "Darling, I'm happier than I've ever been in my life," and she didn't care who heard it.

And where was Sy that Sunday? Up in Las Vegas, at a table in the Flamingo dining room, the same table where he had sat with June. But he was alone this time; listening to the music to which they had danced, wondering if she was as unhappy as he was.



What will happen when these two come face to face again, as eventually they must? Will that same attraction be there? Will they be able to stick by the decision they have made? It is doubtful. Love goes where it is sent, and simply deciding to shut it out of your life doesn't destroy it. Others have tried it—unsuccessfully—and June and Sy will discover this before long.

It is their friends' prediction and their friends' hope that these two will find each other again, and soon. For now at last, it is June Haver's turn to be happy.

Jany and Joey Pope of Los Angeles. "I used to envy girls with naturally-curly hair," says the Toni Twin, "but now I have all the joys of naturally-curly hair. My Toni is as soft as silk, yet it has the spring that takes and holds a set." Which is the Toni Twin? Answer below.

Hair styles in this picture by Don Rito, famous Hollywood hair stylist

Which Twin has the Toni?

Toni looks as lovely as a $20 permanent —feels as soft as naturally curly hair*

The twins show you the lovely proof! When you choose Toni—for only one dollar you are getting the very finest permanent there is. A wave that's caressably soft like naturally-curly hair . . . and guaranteed to look just as lovely—last just as long as a permanent costing $20. (*Including shampoo and set).

What is Toni's Secret? It's the lotion. Toni waving lotion is an exclusive creme formula—especially created to give you a wave that's free of harsh frizziness—a wave that feels and behaves like naturally-curly hair. But remember, only Toni has this superb waving lotion.

Wonderful results—again and again! What better proof of Toni quality! Only Toni has given over 93 million lovely, long-lasting permanents. Some women have used Toni ten times or more and say their waves are always soft, natural-looking, easy to manage. Letters of praise come from women with every type of hair—even gray, bleached and baby-fine hair. So whether you are buying your first Toni or your tenth, you can be sure of getting a wave that has that natural look. Jany, the twin on the left, has the Toni.

P. S. For a lovelier you—get Toni Creme Shampoo and Toni Creme Rinse, too.

Miss Alice Kiesewetter, a teacher in Evanston, Ill., adds this: "A Toni is simply wonderful for career women. It's so convenient to give, so easy to set—and it lasts for months. Best of all, a Toni wave always looks beautifully natural!"

COLGATE DENTAL CREAM STOPS TOOTH DECAY BEST

Better Than Any Other Way of Preventing Tooth Decay According to Published Reports!

Reader's Digest for July reports on one of the most extensive experiments in dental history! And remember these additional facts: The toothpaste used exclusively in this research was Colgate Dental Cream. Two years' research showed brushing teeth right after eating with Colgate Dental Cream stopped tooth decay best! Better than any other home method of oral hygiene! The Colgate way stopped more decay for more people than ever reported in all dentifrice history!

No Other Toothpaste or Powder Ammoniated or Not Offers Proof of Such Results!

Even more important, there were no new cavities whatever for more than 1 out of 3 who used Colgate Dental Cream correctly! Think of it! Not even one new cavity in two full years! No other dentifrice has proof of such results! No dentifrice can stop all tooth decay, or help cavities already started. But the Colgate way is the most effective way yet known to help your dentist prevent decay.

*YOU SHOULD KNOW! Colgate Dental Cream, while not mentioned by name, was used exclusively in the research reported in Reader's Digest.

THE INSIDE STORY

Here's the truth about the stars—as you asked for it. Want to spike more rumors? Want more facts? Write to THE INSIDE STORY, Modern Screen, 1046 N. Carol Drive, Hollywood, Cal.

Q. There is a rumor that the Narcotics Bureau of the U. S. Treasury Department was called in to investigate Judy Garland's suicide attempt a few months ago. True or false?
—F. F., Los Angeles, Cal.

A. False. No Government or police officers of any sort were called in on the case. Two days after she jabbed her throat with a piece of glass, Judy removed the bandaid which covered the entire wound. It was healed completely.

Q. Is Frank Sinatra more popular than ever because of his love affair with Ava Gardner?
—R. T., Thomasville, N. C.

A. Certainly not in Hollywood. Frank, however, boasts an extremely loyal group of followers who will be happy to learn that their hero's future, at least for the next three years, is financially assured. Frank has signed a 3-year contract with CBS for radio and video shows that will pay him $250,000 per year.

Q. How come there has been no news of Robert Walker out of Hollywood lately?
—L. Y., Salt Lake City

A. Walker has been living quietly and has done nothing "newsworthy."

Q. Which Hollywood stars are permitted to appear on television?
—N. Y., Montgomery, Ala.

A. All stars not under contract to a studio are permitted to appear on television, also such contract players as Doris Day, Bing Crosby, Milton Berle, Bob Hope, and Jimmy Durante. The list is increasing daily.

Q. Is it true that there is a lot of intermarriage in Hollywood between the white and colored races?
—R. L., Pawtucket, R. I.

A. The only intermarriage on record is the one between Lena Horne, the beautiful Negro singer, and Lennie Hayton, her musical arranger. The marriage took place in Paris three years ago. It was the second marriage for both and revealed only because Lena is expecting a child

Q. What is the marriage status of Richard Greene these days?
—T. U., Miami, Fla.

A. He is in the process of being divorced from Patricia Medina and is currently going around with Nancy Oakes De Marigny whose first husband was acquitted on the charge of murdering her very wealthy father.

Q. Who is the hottest young actor in Hollywood today?
—R. M., Detroit, Mich.

A. It is generally agreed that David Wayne is the newest personality headed for stardom. Since his arrival in Hollywood a year ago, Wayne has starred in Adam's Rib, The Reformer and the Redhead, My Blue Heaven, Stella and M. He is constantly in demand by all the major studios.

Q. Why is Joseph Cotten keeping secret the fact that he is a grandfather? How old is he, anyway?
—D. D., Danvers, Mass.

A. Mr. Cotten is not keeping the fact a secret. He became a grandpa on June 19th, 1950, when his daughter, Mrs. James Young, gave birth to a child in Santa Monica. He is 45 and not an avid publicity seeker which is why his private life is not particularly well-known to the public.

Q. I've been told that Bing Crosby when he was young spent some time in jail. Is this true or another one of those vicious rumors?
—L. G., Chicago, Ill.

A. Bing was once jailed for a traffic violation, the kind of accident that could happen to anyone. Throughout his entire life, however, he has never been guilty of the slightest off-color action.

LOUELLA PARSONS'

Good news

Mickey Rooney congratulates Vic Damone on his new MGM contract. Scene's the Mocambo where Joe Pasternack (center) threw a party in Vic's honor. Later Vic treated several patiently-waiting fans to Cokes.

Diamonds aren't Ann Sheridan's best friend—but she knows how to wear them. Ann, now starring in 20th Century-Fox's Stella, and her escort, sat in on the Mocambo festivities welcoming Damone to MGM stardom.

MR. SOUTH PACIFIC (THAT'S EZIO) COMES TO MY PARTY . . . DID YOU KNOW THAT VIC DAMONE CAN COOK, TOO? . . . THE TRUTH

BROTHER AND SISTER—was Bette Davis sizzling when she heard that her ex, William Grant Sherry, was marrying 23-year-old Marion Richards, nurse to their little daughter, Barbara!

Bette felt it was a personal insult because she had taken the pretty nurse into her home, befriended her, and sent her with Barbara to see Sherry. Even before the Sherrys were separated, Marion was caring for the child and never once did Bette suspect there was a romance in full bloom between the nurse and her "ex". In fact, Bette thought Marion was on her side.

La Davis couldn't take it, and three days after Sherry came out and spoke of the beautiful, spiritual relationship he and Marion had found, and how happy they expected to be, Bette took off for the New England coast.

The thing that burned her up most was that the newlyweds intend to make their home in the Laguna Beach house which Bette gave her artist husband as part of their property settlement.

As amusing as this mix-up may be to outsiders—Bette doesn't consider it at all funny!

I guess it does take quite a sense of humor for a woman to think it's a howl when her ex-husband marries her child's nurse and they settle down in a home she bought!

Of course, Bette has a new husband of her own now—Gary Merrill.

But before they were married Gary told me that Bette was so upset over all the publicity about Sherry's new love that she left town as quickly as possible. And was I surprised when she ended up in Juarez, Mexico, saying "I do." Gary's from New England, by the way. That's Bette's home. Well, I certainly hope Bette has better luck this time.

"WHO is trying to fool who about Maria Elena Marques (the girl who got the lead with Clark Gable) being an 'unknown'?" asks a snippy letter writer from Mexico. "She has played opposite some of our most prominent stars in Mexican pictures. This is what makes us real amateurs mad about these so-called contests to find new talent."

Well, true or false, Maria Elena is brand new to American fans and to Hollywood. And she turns up with a wonderful sense of humor.

Ever since she arrived in town, before taking off with the Across The Wide Missouri company on location, she's been busy boning up on Indian sign language—all she uses in the movie.

Now, for the laughs, she won't talk any other way! You should see the wolves trying to get her telephone number and getting it back in sign language!

The Geary Steffens and the Marshall Thompsons join a square dance at the Catalina Guest Ranch. They came to the island on C. B. Hilton's yacht (Nicky's brother). See page 52 for more Catalina activities.

Onlookers claimed that Jane Powell's and her husband Geary's square-dancing looked professional. Jane's sporting a new short hair-do for her role in Royal Wedding—a role that insiders say will bring her new fame.

First thing Marshall Thompson did when he landed in Catalina was to grab his paddle-board and make for the surf. Here, the athletic Thompsons play badminton on the grounds of the Catalina Guest Ranch.

Determined to play till they drop, Marsh and his wife try their skill at baseball. Barbara strikes out—but Marsh doesn't care. He's catcher for the opposing team. Anyway, Barbara trimmed him at badminton!

BEHIND LINDA DARNELL'S DIVORCE . . . IS NICKY HILTON SCREEN-STRUCK? . . . WANDA HENDRIX IS A TORCH-BEARER NOW . . .

She has an unusual face. When she isn't smiling, she has a wistful, almost spiritual expression. But when she laughs, she looks like a pixie. Plumb fascinatin'.

Saw June Allyson in Beverly Hills the other day getting fitted for two "cocktail" maternity gowns. "Good heavens," I said. "I didn't know they made them so fancy."

One was beige lace with a cute stiff taffeta coat. The other was bronze net and both are made so June can just "relax" the waist band and wear them after the birth of the baby.

"If you think these are something," Junie laughed, "you should see my sports maternity outfits for golf." These young mothers-to-be—aren't they something? (For more on mother-to-be Allyson turn to page 34.—Ed.)

I gave a garden party for some friends from Ireland, Mr. and Mrs. Louis Elliman—and if I do say so myself, practically every star in town came to meet my guests, making their eyes gleam with excitement and making me very happy.

It was the first party the Ezio Pinzas attended in Hollywood and they seemed just as eager to meet the movie stars as the stars were to meet them.

One of the first to arrive was Shirley Temple, looking very chic and tailored in a suit and close fitting hat. When I asked her why she did not bring a boy friend, she said, "The only boy friend I go with is not here yet. He's flying down from San Francisco tonight and I'm going to the airport to meet him." Of course, she meant Charles Black—the one and only.

I had invited both Olivia De Havilland and Joan Fontaine—but luck must have been on my side. Both showed up—but at different times. Joan blew out—just as Olivia blew in with Marcus Goodrich. Livvy goes to so few parties, it was such a pleasure to have her. She wore a chartreuse green dress and a small matching hat.

Betty Hutton wore the largest white hat of the season—and Ginger Rogers the smallest black one.

When Pinza saw Betty, he tapped my arm and said, "Who is the girl in the big white hat?"

"Betty Hutton," I replied.

"Oh, yas!" he said, "Onnie Get Your Gun!"

He was embarrassed that he also failed to recognize lovely Marion Davies, Jane Wyman, Lauren Bacall or Mary Pickford.

"The faces on the screen," he explained, "are different from the faces face-to-face. Face-to-face they are lovelier," he added gallantly.

One of these Twins has a Toni, the other has a $20 permanent. Can you tell—*

WHICH TWIN HAS THE TONI?

Hair styles by Don Rito

Look closely! Compare the shining softness . . . the live, long-lasting "spring" . . . the lovely natural look of both permanents. Which is which? You can't tell! Not even experts can find any difference between the $1 Toni and the beauty shop wave. Because a Toni looks as natural, feels as soft—is actually guaranteed to be as beautiful and last as long – as a $20 wave (*including shampoo and set.) Your Toni has that natural look from the first day. There's no frizz! Even if your hair is baby-fine, bleached or tinted, Toni's gentle Creme Waving Lotion leaves your wave as satin-soft and easy to set as Nancy Fletcher's (at left.) You can be sure of this – for only Toni has given over 93 million natural-looking waves to all types of hair. Try a Toni—you'll love it!

Toni alone, of all home permanents—
looks so natural, feels so soft!
That's why more women choose Toni than all other home permanents combined.

Here's the reason! Toni contains an exclusive blend of the very same waving ingredients used in most expensive beauty shop lotions. Yet Toni costs . . . only $1

with SPIN curlers $2.29

Toni HOME PERMANENT

In a surprise elopement on July 28, Bette Davis wed actor Gary Merrill (left) in Juarez, Mexico. Judge Raul Orozco (right) performed the rites.

Gregory Peck and his pretty Greta were very happy to be back in Hollywood again after three months in London while Greg was making Captain Horatio Hornblower. Greg is one of the nicest men in this business.

Kirk Douglas brought Irene Wrightsman, natch. She told me that when she was in Florida—she was very jealous reading about Kirk and me doing the Charleston together at the Mocambo! I bet she was!

LETTER FROM ROME: "We've been working for the past five weeks with a thermometer that plays between 105 and 115°," writes Mervyn Le Roy, who is directing Quo Vadis.

"In spite of the Italian food we eat, Bob Taylor has lost eight pounds and Deborah Kerr almost as much.

"But the other day—Bob got a break. He was supposed to be splashing around in a Roman bath—so Bob had big chunks of ice put in the bath—and had the time of his life splashing around in ice water!

"Everybody is getting a little homesick—but that will change when Barbara Stanwyck gets here to visit Bob and Tony Bartley joins Deborah."

THE "inside" on the Linda Darnell-Pev Marley rift isn't anything sensational. It's just what it has been from the start of their marriage seven years ago—too much difference in their ages.

Pev is 21 years older than Linda and, except in rare cases, this is too much difference. Their marriage has been straining at the matrimonial seams for years, so it was no surprise to Hollywood.

They have quarreled and parted a half dozen times—once coming to a definite break about three years ago. But each time they made up. Their close friends say Linda had sort of a "father complex" about Pev and he always treated her more like a spoiled daughter than as a wife.

Two years ago they tried to solidify their marriage by adopting a baby girl, Charlotte Mildred, and for awhile they were so happy with her everyone thought Linda and Pev had reached firm footing at last. They even talked about adopting another child.

But it is no go—again. And this time, the Marleys will reach the divorce court—or so Linda says.

"We never really had any organized home life," she explains. "Pev is such a good cameraman—he is always working, usually on location trips. (Continued on page 10)

New to Hollywood, but already part of the scenery, Ezio Pinza (of Mr. Imperium) and his wife attend Vic Damone's party at the Mocambo.

will be with her and Spencer Tracy in Father's Little Dividend (sequel to Father of the Bride). Nicky's turning actor is a lot of nonsense.

He is going to be too busy managing the Bel Air Hotel in which he bought the controlling interest before their marriage. Besides, Nicky has no yen to act.

START practicing up on your tango, kids. After you see Anthony Curtis and Eleanor Parker do the Valentino Tango in The Valentino Story, that s-e-x-y dance is coming back hotter than the Charleston revival—or so they say.

Of course, you don't have to do it as torridly as do Eleanor and Tony. Their version starts with Tony brushing his lips against Eleanor's temple and winds up with a kiss on her shoulder.

Wanda Hendrix still carries the torch for young Audie Murphy. She was heartsick when he announced from Texas that he would go back in the service just as soon as Uncle Sam said he needed him.

Although their marriage is all over, Wanda cried and cried. She had always felt that the break-up between them was caused by Audie's war nerves and the restlessness which has driven our most decorated hero ever since he got out of the service after World War II.

Cathy Downs was modeling some butcher boy pajamas for a fashion magazine. The photographer took one look at her and said, "My dear, the pajamas are supposed to be loose-fitting. You will have to . . . to . . . uh . . . remove some of your chest."

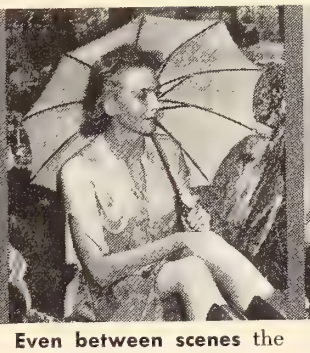
"That," said Cathy, blushing beet red, "will require a major operation!"

ONE enchanted evening, Clifton Webb gave a dinner party honoring that wonderful guy, Ezio Pinza, of course—and his charming wife. I sat at a table for four with Pinza, Cole Porter and Virginia Zanuck.

Pinza was terribly perturbed by the news that Mary Martin was ill in the hospital in New York. He said, "If you'll telephone me, I'll let you know just how she is feeling after I talk with her." He did just that. He's a most considerate person.

There is apparently a very strong bond between Pinza and his co-star of South Pacific. He spoke of her many times during our conversation.

Ezio, who continues to be Hollywood's most exciting new star, had a wonderful time at the party. He admired all the lovely women—and they surrounded him—but he



"I did a slow burn for 180 days!"

We trekked 6 months in Africa for "King Solomon's Mines." Sizzling heat parched me to the bone . . . made my skin unbearably dry!

Acting thirsty took no talent. Even my skin was thirsty!

Even between scenes the African sun seared me.

But Jergens kept my hands soft for romantic scenes.

Being a liquid, Jergens is absorbed by thirsty skin.

CAN YOUR LOTION OR HAND CREAM PASS THIS FILM TEST?

To soften, a lotion or cream should be absorbed by the upper layers of the skin. Water won't "bead" on hand smoothed with Jergens Lotion (left hand). It contains quickly-absorbed ingredients doctors recommend, no heavy oils that merely coat skin with oily film (right hand).

Prove it with this simple test described above . . .

Dumb is the Word for Dora

Away now to some Secluded Spot for a big, Romantic Evening with her new-found Romeo. That's what she Thinks!

Instead, She's going to be Dumped back on her own Doorstep in no time Flat. Two hours with her in the movies have Cooled this Casanova off for Keeps! She's off his List forever . . . and she won't know Why.

Dumb certainly is the word for Dora . . . and for thousands of other Women who take their Breath for Granted. Don't Be One of Them.

Nothing puts you in a worse light with a man than halitosis (bad breath). Unfortunately, you yourself, may not know when you have it, so why take chances of offending . . . ever?

It's so easy to put your breath on the agreeable side with Listerine Antiseptic . . . not for seconds . . . not for minutes . . . but for hours, usually.

Before any date where you want to be at your best, never omit this extra-careful, wholly delightful precaution against offending.

It's almost your passport to popularity.

While some cases of halitosis are of systemic origin, most cases, say some authorities, are due to the bacterial fermentation of tiny food particles clinging to mouth surfaces. Listerine Antiseptic quickly halts such fermentation, then overcomes the odors fermentation causes.

LOUELLA PARSONS' good news

never neglects his lovely wife, Doris, who has become just as popular as Mr. South Pacific.

Valentina Cortesa and Alida Vali greeted him in their native Italian.

I have never seen Lauren Bacall look so well. She said Bogey (Humphrey Bogart) was out boating. Since the arrival of their baby, she doesn't go yachting with him every weekend. She looked stunning in a white evening gown.

The two Joans were very attractive in their filmy frocks—Joan Bennett in black and white and Joan Fontaine in pale yellow.

Clifton Webb and his mother are such wonderful hosts, I hated to tear myself away so early—but with the radio show next day—my Cinderella slippers always fall off at 11:30 Saturday night.

OVER THE BACK FENCE: Hear Ginger Rogers and Joan Davis have been politely feuding—or should I say, impolitely—ever since they started work in Illegal Bride. . . . I wish Jane Wyman would let her very short hair cut grow just a little. She is such a pretty girl—but I just don't think these near "crew" cuts for ladies, making the most glamorous of them look like young sailors, is becoming. . . The rumbles are that the next big Hollywood divorce will break from Europe—a famous star and his wife, currently on the continent, are straining at the matrimonial seams. . . . The Johnston Office won't let them use the title, Undercover Girl—too suggestive. But haven't we had Undercover Agent and Undercover Man and Undercover about Everything Else? . . . Wish Audrey Totter would go back to her blonde hair. Hardly recognize her as a brunette. . . . Scott Brady and Dorothy Malone are very much in love. But Dorothy says she will never formally announce another "engagement" after calling off her marriage to Dr. Philip Montgomery, in Dallas, practically within sound of the Wedding March. Dorothy had had three "showers" and her bridesmaids' dinner when she suddenly decided to call everything off. Now she's superstitious about "announcing." . . . By the way I've just finished writing a magazine about the romances of these glamorous gals and guys of Hollywood. It's called "Louella Parsons' Hollywood Romances" and it'll be on your newsstands any day now. It has stories about sweethearts (like Frank and Ava), brides and grooms of this year, bachelors, torch bearers, gay divorcees—it even includes a marriage chart covering 50-100 married stars. Well, how's that for self-advertising? But buy it, and I hope you like it!

I'M on my vacation down at Del Mar, and writing this GOOD NEWS for you kids this month is all the work I'm going to do.

I think more of our stars relax and have fun at this small resort spot than anywhere.

I'll tell you who I have seen so far, both at the track and around La Jola and Laguna:

Kirk Douglas and Irene Wrightsman McEvoy were guests at a houseparty at Laguna—and when they weren't at the races, they rode bicycles around the beautiful hill streets. I bet you a fat fortune these two will be married just as soon as Kirk's divorce is final.

Ezio Pinza came down one weekend to visit his press agent, Margaret Ettinger and her husband. Ezio brought along his bicycle. Did you know that early in his career, he was a professional bicycle racer?

Rosalind Russell and Freddie Brisson come down as often as they can (she is doing the news part of my show).

Mickey Rooney is another steady and I've seen Tony Martin several times.

YOUR LETTER BOX: Farley Granger is back as head man in your interest with June Allyson (still) topping the gals.

Lots of excitement over June Allyson's and Dick Powell's expected heir or heiress.

The very young kids ask questions about Johnny Sands' new pictures.

Well, guess that's all this month. See you next month.

Picture of the Month

Hoodlum Richard Widmark is brought to County Hospital with his brother after they've been shot in a holdup. Widmark's brother dies. Widmark accuses Dr. Sidney Poitier of murder, swears to get revenge.

To prove his innocence, Poitier wants an autopsy on Widmark's brother. With Dr. Stephen McNally, he visits widow Darnell. She refuses them.

In his attempts to get even, Widmark instigates a race riot and sets a trap for Poitier. Just as he's about to kill Poitier, Linda Darnell enters.

Linda turns off the lights, Widmark's shot goes wild. His former wound begins to bleed. "Don't cry, white boy," says Poitier. "You'll live."

NO WAY OUT

■ Everything Darryl Zanuck failed to do in Pinky—and I persist in thinking that that wasn't a very effective picture—he's made up for in No Way Out. Here is a film so brave, and uncompromising, and emotionally racking, they'll say it isn't "entertainment." According to one of the more romantic poets, "truth is beauty," but life isn't poetry, and sometimes truth stinks, and Mr. Zanuck has faced that fact squarely, and still told the truth. The story of No Way Out concerns a rabid young man (Richard Widmark), a small-time hoodlum, who's brought into a hospital after a holdup. He and his brother are supposed to be treated by a young colored doctor, but Widmark, who could give the Klan lessons in Negro-baiting, starts torturing the doctor (Sidney Poitier), and when his brother dies, Widmark blames the doctor, and swears to get even with him. There are many other characters involved. The white doctor (Stephen McNally) who's the colored boy's friend. The white girl (Linda Darnell) who once loved Widmark, and was married to his brother, and who's spent her whole life trying to get out of the slums. In part, the picture's a study of poverty, and the hatreds that spring from the bitter soil of poverty, and ignorance and fear. Its characters are living, breathing, three-dimensional people. Widmark is mean, vicious, contemptible, and yet, in the scene where he's wounded, and reliving his painful childhood, and he screams out about the colored doctor, "Why should I love him—who ever loved me?" you feel a terrible surge of pity for him because he is, after all, so tragically human. Technically, the picture's superb. There's a scene in a junk yard, for instance, of a gang of whites getting ready for a race riot, milling around, banging pieces of metal, stumbling and scrambling in the darkness, when suddenly the Negroes, who've found out about the oncoming attack, throw up a flare. For a couple of seconds, there's blinding light, and absolute silence. The scene has impact that many a pure suspense film could envy. There's so much to say about No Way Out. The flawless acting of the huge cast—Widmark's performance comes very close to sheer genius—the refusal of director and producer to pull punches. All the vile words are there—nigger, sambo, coon, boogie, and the ending isn't full of sweetness and light, either. It isn't even melodramatic. The colored doctor patches up Widmark, the mad dog who's tried to kill him, and all he says is, "Don't worry, white boy, you'll live." This is a picture which understands men and needs to be understood by them. This is a picture which hates nothing but hate. Frederick O'Neal, head of The American Negro Theatre, has said of it: "No Way Out should provide the greatest step forward in the fight against racial prejudice since the Civil War. It touches the heart. It reflects the conscience of the American people."

KISS TOMORROW GOODBYE

Little old Jimmy Cagney escapes from the state penal farm, and friends, is he nutty! He bumps off the boy who's escaping with him, and then jazzes on into town and starts making love to this same boy's sister. Sis is no rock of Gibraltar, either. She's killed a guard, trying to help her brother escape, but she still persists in regarding herself as Little Red Riding Hood. So innocent, so confused. If Jimmy's paranoic, Lady Jane is schizoid. She alternates tender, "You're all I've got now," with screeches of, "I told you you'd get us all killed, ruined, wrecked, bumped off," etc. Just can't stay on one side of the fence. Jimmy finds himself two crooked policemen, blackmails them with the help of a shady lawyer (Luther Adler), marries an heiress (another lady screwball—this one likes to drive 1,000 miles an hour, and she's crazy for masterful men) and meets his end in a spray of bullets. Two bullets, to be specific. Not quite a spray, more like a sprinkle. If this isn't a parody of a Jimmy Cagney picture, it will certainly do until one comes along. Still, it's fun to watch Luther Adler work, even if it's only for money.
Cast: James Cagney, Barbara Payton, Helena Carter, Ward Bond, Luther Adler.—Warners.

MY BLUE HEAVEN

Here I've been thinking "television" was a dirty word, out in Hollywood, and now Fox makes a picture about television entertainers. Honest to Pete. Betty Grable and Dan Dailey are the TV stars—they sing, they dance, and, most byootiful of all, they're married lovers. They want a baby. That's what the theme of My Blue Heaven is. First Dan and Betty lose their own unborn baby, then they lose an adopted baby, then they have a more or less casually adopted baby kidnapped from them, and, by the end of the movie, Betty herself is pregnant again, and the mother of a couple of other children. David Wayne and Jane Wyatt, who play our stars' script writers, have a family of six, and run around being generally witty—you know how writers act—and a girl named Mitzi Gaynor (Grable's

RIGHT CROSS

Ricardo Montalban, a champion prizefighter, is owned by old, ailing, has-been promoter Lionel Barrymore, and is in love with Lionel's daughter, June Allyson. Ricardo's got a chip on his shoulder, though. Since he's Mexican, he keeps accusing June of thinking she's too good for him, and he finds insults in nearly everything said to him by nearly everybody. Slightly a persecution complex. He believes he's got to be rich, and stay champ, or he'll lose June, so he double-crosses her pop, and signs with a richer man. Of course he's wrong. June loves him for himself. Dick Powell also loves June, alas, in vain, but he is a newspaperman, so he handles his grief in a dashing manner. You get boxing scenes, a smattering of a racial problem, quite a bit of good, humorous dialogue, and some nice acting in this one.

Cast: June Allyson, Dick Powell, Ricardo Montalban.—MGM.

FANCY PANTS

Back in the days when the West was young —well, anyway, younger—the minute a family got rich, it started hating itself for its lack of culture. Here Lucille Ball's ma trots Lucy out of her levis, and into some ostrich plumes, and off to Europe they go. An impoverished English earl who wants to marry Lucille's millions hires a bunch of actors to help him impress the American visitors, and mama visitor is so impressed she hires the butler (Bob Hope) and hauls him right back to the states with her. Little does she know he's really an out-of-work ham. Lucille hates him for his lah-de-dah ways, her father hates him because he (Bob) is supposed to bathe him (the father), and Bruce Cabot hates him because Bruce Cabot's a cowboy in love with Lucy. News gets around the little Western town that Bob is an earl, to make matters worse. It's not the funniest picture I've ever seen, but there are a couple of priceless moments, mostly centering around Eric Blore, as somebody named Sir Wimbley. Every time he opens his mouth, the most outrageous sounds pour forth, but you can't make words out of any of them; they're more like lava eruptions. And Bob is always cute, and Lucy simply flames in Technicolor.

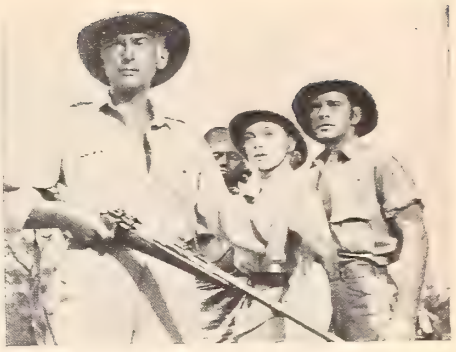
Cast: Bob Hope, Lucille Ball, Bruce Cabot, Jack Kirkwood.—Paramount.



OUTRAGE

Ida Lupino, who likes to produce controversial pictures (she did one about unmarried mothers) has gone and went and dared to deal with rape. Unfortunately, daring isn't enough. This is a pretty awful picture, and after the horror which is built up during the promising first few minutes—as a madman tracks down a young girl in the dark of night—dissipates itself, you find yourself more bored than enraged. Hollywood has already proved you can make movies with a message—if you mix your message with entertainment. You want to make the public conscious of some social evil or danger, in the hope that education will breed progress? Well, help yourself. Home of the Brave did it, and Gentlemen's Agreement, and All The King's Men. But they were good movies, and Outrage is not. Even though the subject of degenerates roaming our streets may cry out for public attention, you can't hold an audience if you bore it to death. Miss Lupino presents two attractive new actors here—Mala Powers, as the assaulted girl, and Tod Andrews as the clergyman who helps her rebuild her life—but the movie's uninteresting. And when they're charging admission, that's a terrible fault.
Cast: Mala Powers, Tod Andrews, Robert Clarke.—RKO.

KING SOLOMON'S MINES

The story of King Solomon's Mines is just a feeble excuse; the picture's real thrill is in its fabulous photography. MGM has shot Africa in Technicolor, and you never saw anything like it before. Natives, animals, desert, all rare, gorgeous, spectacular. This splendor is draped from a plot concerning Deborah Kerr, who wants to go into unexplored African country, in search of her missing husband. She hires a guide, Stewart Granger, and he and she and her brother take to the trail. She and Stewart hate each other, so love can't be far behind. They finally come face to face with Deborah's hubby's skeleton, which clears the way for a legal romance, but it's the wonders they see en route to that pile of bones that make you gasp. Eggs that hatch into crocodiles, tarantulas as big as king crabs, native tribes with the features of ancient Egyptians, and natives whose faces are covered with brilliant, bizarre paint, and native dances which are primitive and exciting. It's kind of a travelogue, but it's an exceptionally fine one.
Cast: Stewart Granger, Deborah Kerr, Richard Carlson.—MGM.

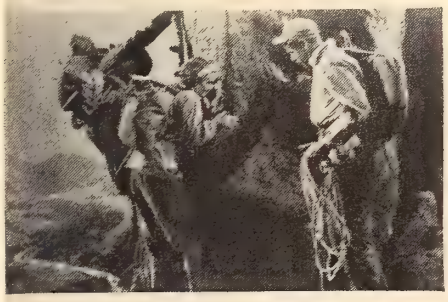
covery we've been reading about for the last several years. She goes through the 84 minutes of Where Danger Lives with sweat on her face, so it's hard to tell if she's as gorgeous as Hughes' other protege, Jane Russell, but she's the same dark-haired, stormy-eyed type. Why she's got sweat on her face? Hmm. She's crazy. Doctor Robert Mitchum doesn't discover this until she's led him entirely astray. Because of her, he murders—or thinks he murders—her elderly husband (Claude Rains) and then he and she run off to Mexico. Bob's got a concussion in the confusion, and he explains, en route, what dire symptoms may ensue, so that the little lady won't be alarmed, but little lady's so looney a concussion symptom more or less won't unnerve her. You can bet ole Bob wishes he'd stayed home in the hospital with Nurse Maureen O'Sullivan, who loves him (and whose husband, John Farrow, directed the picture). Kind of draggy, for an adventure movie.

Cast: Robert Mitchum, Faith Domerque, Claude Rains, Maureen O'Sullivan.—RKO.

CRISIS



This is a study of an imaginary South American country, and its dictator (Jose Ferrer). Dictator's sick with a brain tumor, but his people hate him so much he doesn't dare leave his palace to go to a good hospital, so he has famous American surgeon Cary Grant, and Grant's wife, kidnapped by soldiers and brought to him. While Cary decides whether or not to operate, he and the dictator have philosophical arguments. The dictator claims his people have to be ruled by force, they're children, they wouldn't know how to govern themselves. "I know your country," he tells Grant. "If there's a sign in the street, no spitting, the people don't spit. Here they spit on the sign." Cary gets into even deeper trouble when the anti-government forces kidnap his wife and threaten to murder her if Cary saves the dictator's life. Crisis isn't great, but it occasionally captures the lunatic flavor of the world today, and the end is particularly effective. Cary saves the dictator who's killed later anyhow, and then the head of the anti-government forces instead of freeing his countrymen becomes dictator himself, and is himself shot. Dying, in the middle of a street which has been the scene of carnage, he calls to Grant, "Save me, Doctor." "The age-old cry," Grant says. "Save me, doctor." Then he shakes his head and mutters, "Save me, anybody." Acting's all fine, and Signe Hasso, as Mrs. Dictator, is exceptionally beautiful.

Cast: Cary Grant, Jose Ferrer, Paula Raymond, Signe Hasso.—MGM.

UNION STATION

William Holden is the detective chief of a certain big city's Union Station. When a kidnap-and-possible-murder case suddenly starts developing in the middle of his beat, it upsets him. Case concerns the abduction of a young blind girl (Allene Roberts), daughter of a millionaire. An employee (Nancy Olson) of the millionaire sees two men with guns leaving a train, and that's Holden's first warning of trouble. The trouble mounts. Lyle Bettger, who plays the abductor, likes to smack the little blind girl till she hollers, and when his mistress—or moll, I guess—is shot trying to warn him about the cops, he shoves her out of his car onto the street, and drives away. In case you're worrying, he meets a bad end. And there's plenty of tension before that end, too.
Cast: William Holden, Nancy Olson, Barry Fitzgerald.—Paramount.

THE WHITE TOWER

Based on the best-selling novel, The White Tower concerns a whole group of people who want to get to the top of a man-killing mountain in Switzerland, each for reasons of his own. Climbers include Valli, whose father was killed climbing the very same mountain, Glenn Ford, who's an amiable American just going along for the ride, Oscar Homolka, a guide, Claude Rains, a Frenchman "weary of the world," Sir Cedric Hardwicke, a botanist, and Lloyd Bridges, an ex-Nazi who still doesn't smell too sweet. The climb is the most fearful thing you ever witnessed, and the scenery some of the most awe-inspiring. Poor Claude Rains is given lines so hammy you cringe for him, Homolka gives a most delightful performance, a couple of people are killed, and love comes to live with Glenn and Valli. What more can you demand in one picture? Don't ask me did anybody get to the top. I'm not telling.
Cast: Glenn Ford, Valli, Claude Rains, Oscar Homolka.—RKO.

UNHAPPY ENDING

This is about a beautiful girl who married for love—but failed to find it. This is the story of Linda Darnell, who fought a losing battle.

BY LESLIE SNYDER

Friends claimed the big difference in their ages would be the downfall of Linda's marriage to Pev.

■ "Actress Linda Darnell to divorce Pev Marley!"

The words jumped out from morning paper headlines. All Hollywood knew that this marriage had been shaky almost from the start, but there was a disheartening finality about the announcement. All who are close to Linda hoped she and Pev would work out a solution to their difficulties. Now it was obvious that no such solution had been found.

There it was in black and white, Linda's statement that she'd done everything she could to hold the marriage together, but was finally faced with the fact that it would never work out.

"This time I mean it. We're through."

It's never easy to admit defeat. It was especially difficult for Linda Darnell to admit that her marriage was a failure. In the small community of Oak Cliff, Texas, where she grew up, people who got married stayed married. It was an "until death do us part" proposition. Linda always took a dim view of divorce. Marriage has always meant a partnership to her—a give-and-take arrangement founded on love and mutual respect.

During her seven years of marriage to Pev Marley, Linda had analyzed and re-analyzed their apparent incompatibility. This is not snap decision. What finally caused the break? Little things started it.

Big problems can be brought out into the open, discussed, and eventually solved. But petty annoyances wear on the nerves. Mention of a small grievance seems like manufacturing a fight, so nothing is said and the restlessness grows, and the breech is widened.

This is the case with Linda and Pev. They want to be together, but differences in temperament are constantly working to keep them apart.

Pev is high strung, sensitive—completely wrapped up in his job as a cameraman. He's a fine technician and an outstanding artist in his field. He expected too much of a 20-year-old girl who never had much of a chance to make up her own mind about things.

Friends could tell you about the night Linda came home from the studio dog-tired. (Continued on page 22)

(Continued from page 20) She showered, slipped into a slack suit and moccasins and curled up on the living-room couch to wait for Pev. He arrived an hour later, gave her a quick peck on the cheek and said: "Honey, why aren't you dressed?"

"Dressed?" Linda was surprised. "I am dressed. We aren't going anywhere, and I'm bushed."

"You know we finished the picture today," Pev said, "and I've invited some of the bunch over after dinner."

KNOWING that the finish of a picture calls for a celebration, aware that her gregarious husband loved a crowd around, Linda trotted upstairs to change. Tired as she was, she was making the sacrifice to please him. Nevertheless, demands of this sort were eating away at the heart of their marriage.

Why should it upset Linda to get dressed up and spend an evening with friends? It seems like a small thing to ask, but it depends on the manner of the asking. If she hadn't been so tired, and Pev had been more considerate, it probably wouldn't have amounted to a thing.

But both of them were out of sorts all evening. Linda felt she was being imposed upon, and Pev thought she was only doing what was expected of her.

This is only one example of the trivialities that can destroy a marriage. They both found a number of little things getting under their skin. For instance, Linda's inclined to spill powder on the dressing table and leave her nylons draped over the chaise longue. It annoyed Pev. And his habit of leaving the washcloth in a damp wad on the basin annoyed her. When she found him one day practicing putting in the living room, using one of her Steuben vases as the hole, she blew a fuse.

It isn't that a few small grievances were too much for them. They didn't simply throw up their hands and surrender. They've both tried—perhaps too hard—to cling to the dream of happiness they shared at the beginning.

Pev is 21 years older than Linda. At the outset a number of well-meaning friends pointed out this vast difference in their ages, with warnings that it would be their undoing. Linda, however, set out to prove to the doubtful few that age was no barrier. And this was probably the least of their difficulties.

Linda's always been mature beyond her years in many ways, and her marriage to Pev Marley enlarged her understanding of people, and developed in her a sense of responsibility that's rare in one who attained tremendous success so early in life. And Pev has learned a sense of comradeship from Linda.

It's her eagerness to be friendly with everyone that impresses people most when they first meet Linda.

DURING the war, she made it a practice to visit various War Department offices and factories and talk with civilian workers. She did it without benefit of press agents or studio fanfare. She felt that these workers were doing a tremendous job, so she dropped in to spread a little cheer whenever she had a chance.

There's no pretense about Linda. She's real and down to earth. This sincerity has been the driving force behind her efforts to salvage her marriage.

When Linda and Pev first separated four years ago, a close friend ran into them one evening in a small, out-of-the-way Hollywood club. They'd gone there to talk and to avoid the usual crowds.

Linda was crying. Waiting long enough for her to dry her eyes, the friend approached the table.

"Darling," Linda bubbled, "you're just in time to hear the news. Pev and I are back together again and we are going to adopt a baby!"

There was no mistaking the genuine happiness shining from her eyes, and Pev looked as though he'd start passing out cigars any moment.

They had just gone through a trying period. Pev was under contract to Warners, and Linda was at Twentieth Century. By an unkind quirk of fate every time Linda finished a picture Pev was just starting one. It reached the point where they were two strangers, living in the same house and only occasionally passing each other in the hall or sharing a hurried meal. So they'd separated.

They were more miserable apart than together. Neither had any outside romantic interest, and when they dated, it was with each other. So the night Linda announced that they'd made up their differences and were going to adopt a child, all their friends hoped that this would give them a common enough interest to cement the marriage. It did—for a while. But as soon as the excitement of a new baby wore off, the bickering started again.

WHEN Linda left for New York alone last February, everyone immediately leaped to the conclusion that this was the final split. The truth is, Linda simply wanted to get away for a while. She was making a last effort to solve the greatest problem in her life—a marriage that was slowly disintegrating.

She took a drawing room on the train and kept to herself. She didn't check in at a hotel, but stayed with friends to avoid the confusion that accompanies a star's visit to Manhattan. She made no dates until the night of the Twelve O'Clock High première. That was a command performance. The studio asked her to attend with Mr. Skouras' party. Linda accepted, being the most co-operative person who ever drew breath.

On the surface Linda was at her best that night. She charmed everyone there with her gaiety and good nature. Later in the evening, however, when she was alone for a brief moment, her face looked tense and unhappy.

BACK to the Coast she went after that—and moved into a new Bel Air house with her daughter Lola. There was a nurse for little Lola, but both the little girl and her mother must have felt that something was lacking.

Where was Pev?

He was at the Pacific Palisades home, where he and Linda had lived for almost seven years. What went on there before they reached an agreement no one will ever know. But when the divorce proceedings start, there'll be no lurid publicity. Pev and Linda have nothing to hide.

There's no other romance in either of their lives. They are simply incompatible.

Linda missed most of the normal gaiety that goes with growing up. Before she had an opportunity to make up for this lack, she was married, facing the demanding routine of marriage combined with a career. This combination has been too much for more mature women than Linda. She's to be commended for her struggle to overcome all obstacles.

Linda's a more mature woman now. The heartache of the last few years will soon be a memory of the past. She's beautiful and intelligent. She has a brilliant future. And she's still young enough to enjoy the happiness that will ultimately be hers.

Audie Murphy becomes a captain of infantry in the Texas National Guard.

■ Unless the war in Korea should suddenly be called off, a lot of Hollywood actors, both young and not so young, may be wearing the uniforms of Uncle Sam by the time you read this, or very shortly after.

Tony Curtis, Rock Hudson, Dick Long, Bob Patten, Johnny Sands, Vic Damone, Carleton Carpenter, all the unmarrieds under the age of 26 are sure to be headed for the various training camps. They're 1A. Audie Murphy has already been sworn in as a captain of infantry in the Texas National Guard.

Nor will these boys mentioned be the first. Chances are that members of the various service Reserves of which Hollywood boasts plenty may get there before them.

Macdonald Carey, for example, who was a Marine Corps flyer for four-and-a-half years in World War II, received his standby notice in August.

So, too, did Robert Taylor, Gene Kelly, Kirk Douglas, Glenn Ford, Tyrone Power, and Gordon MacRae.

These men did yeoman service for the Navy and Marines in the last war, and their outfits would like to have them back for this one. Ditto Victor Mature of the Coast Guard Reserve.

The Army Air Forces have already notified Gene Autry and Bill Holden to keep in touch, and Dan Dailey as this article went to press, was telling people in the 20th Century-Fox commissary, "Next month this time, and I'll be driving a tank. I'm in the Army Reserves."

Jane Powell's husband, Geary Steffen is in the same position. Geary is a member of an Armored Division and will undoubtedly be training troops as you read this very line.

Married or not, most young men under 30 are almost certain to be drafted, regardless of previous military duty.

Nicky Hilton, 23, Elizabeth Taylor's young husband, may be called up even though he served in the Navy once before.

Montgomery Clift, 29, declared 4F because of a tropical disease he picked up in Mexico, will in all probability be no 4F this time.

John Derek who served with the airborne troops in the Pacific five years ago, is not yet 25, and if the war goes on for any length of time, he, too, is liable to be called even though he's the father of a baby.

Howard Duff is hitting 35 and even though he's single will probably remain at Universal rather than an Army camp for some time to come.

John Agar, legally single in another month and now in his late twenties, is another potential bit of draft bait.

The Selective Service rules change almost every few weeks as the war progresses, and it is virtually impossible to determine exactly who will be taken by the services and when.

Certainly all single Hollywood stars under the age of thirty will be called. (Continued on page 96)

the Champ's in love

■ Sometime early in 1950, Kirk Douglas dropped into a Hollywood florist shop and purchased ninety orchids which, properly carded, he ordered sent to ninety dames—the entire contingent of the Hollywood Women's Press Club. It created quite a sensation, even in this town where extravagant wackiness is as common as blue grass in Kentucky.

And then, a few days later, facing the dolls at a luncheon they gave him, he answered a question they put to him in a truly honest manner. "What about love?" they asked him. "Now that you are practically a single man, what are your plans on marriage and a mate?" Kirk Douglas just hung his head and grinned that shy, meaning grin and the dimples in his cheeks deepened and the cleft in his chin squirmed in a tantalizing manner—and all of the girls understood. Kirk Douglas was having himself a time, and (Continued on page 81)

Sweet William is turning into Big Bad Bill—which may be news to you, but not to Holden who wants to be a bigger and better heel.

■ William Holden sat across the small dressing room in a newly-upholstered chair, a cigarette burning dangerously close to his pointing finger.

"So this actor," he snorted, "this guy about four years younger than me comes up to me at a guild meeting and says 'how do you do, Mister Holden?' That did it! Mister Holden! I should have punched him on the nose!"

William Holden ground the butt of his cigarette in the closest ash tray.

"I was still mad the next morning, so I banged into the studio head's office and told him I was through playing substantial characters. It's ruining me, I told him. I'm too young to be a Mister. So the next thing you know, I'm working in Sunset Boulevard, playing the biggest heel since the housekeeper in Rebecca. It was wonderful." He grinned in happy recollection.

That was the turning of the worm. The reclamation of a personality that had rusted. The end of a substantial career playing bookkeepers who loved their wives and couldn't quite raise the money for a baby. Probably the introduction to movie fans of a Bill Holden very far removed from the one they know so well in pictures, but truer to life, as his friends know him.

Let's get one thing straight. In person, Bill Holden is no heel. But he is certainly not a namby-pamby character who frequents malt shops or pushes baby buggies or reads "Treasure Island" to the neighborhood kids every night after dinner. He is a young, virile, thoroughly normal married man with three kids. He rides a horse like Hopalong Cassidy, shoots a pistol like Roy Rogers, can hit a deer in the left nostril at any distance the rifle sights will work, can take a hot rod car apart and put it together without any parts left over, and he has the guts to (Continued on page 89)

SEX OR BABIES:

Which do the stars want?

■ It's an old story about Hollywood stars. No matter how subdued, serious or benevolent they seem, the public won't believe it. To them the stars are sexy; they're gorgeous animals running around in a frenzy because they can't find enough people to love. They may have a whole flock of kids (all their own) in the nursery, and they can stay up half the night fixing formulas, but the public insists it's just a front. The stars don't like babies; the stars are reckless and irresponsible.

Only a few weeks ago, John Wayne was taking a rare vacation in Mexico City. He was sitting out on the hotel patio, sipping a coke, when an attractive local belle minced up to him. "Oh, for the life of a movie star!" she exclaimed.

"What do you mean?" asked dashing Duke Wayne.

"Oh, Duke," the lady sighed. "How I envy you! You can do anything you want, go anywhere you like. No worries, no cares . . ."

"You must be kidding," said Duke. "Or else, you have me mixed up with some other guy."

The girl smiled. "You can't fool me," she said, with a gleam in her eye.

"Honey," Duke laughed," I wish I could! But I have to disillusion you. I'm the father of four kids."

Maybe this news came as a shock to the senorita. Hollywood children have a way of not being seen—or heard. But they're there, all right, with all the demands that children anywhere make on their hard-working parents.

Take the case of Don Ameche. This past summer, he was substituting for Don MacNeil on The Breakfast Club, one of radio's oldest morning programs.

"Why do you want to emcee a radio show like that?" one of his younger fans wrote him. "You're a famous movie star. Wait until Hollywood offers you a big picture."

"I'm very sorry," Don wrote back. "I can wait, but my six children can't."

These are only two examples of fathers who happen to be actors, and who live in a community that is more family-minded than any other community in America. Actually, there are fewer childless couples in Hollywood than in any other comparable town—but the fans don't want to believe it.

ALIDA VALLI had a husband and son when she came to Hollywood, but publicity men kept it a big secret.

GINGER ROGERS (here with Greg Bautzer) regrets being one of the childless stars.

June Allyson:

She feels so good, so happy—so important! And what girl doesn't, when she's having her first baby?

■ In years gone by, if you wanted to get June Allyson dewy-eyed, all you had to do was strike up a conversation about babies. Now that she's going to have one of her own, you haven't a chance at any conversation, because she does all the talking.

June is consumed by wonder, excitement, and most of all, curiosity. Her friends who have babies are called to the phone daily. "Hello, June," they say, as soon as they lift the receiver.

"How'd you know it was June?" the husbands want to know.

The wives smile. "It's always June. She has a new question every day."

"Why? You're not her doctor."

And the wives smile tolerantly. "I'm something better than that, in a way. I'm a woman who has had a baby, and to another woman, I'm an encyclopedia on the subject."

Small wonder that June is excited. For five years she and Dick have wanted this to happen. Every time a friend had a baby, June spilled over with enthusiasm, solicitude, and eventually envy, for it gave her the feeling of being incomplete. Occasionally she would see a picture in a newspaper of a man and wife and a parcel of children, and she would sigh as she put down the paper and stared off into space. Why couldn't it ever happen to her?

Susan Hayward:

"Life means nothing without my children, for through them, each day Jess and I discover new wonders . . ."

■ After I had my twins, Gregory and Timothy, friends would ask, "Well, don't you feel different now?" I didn't. I sensed what they meant, that when a girl becomes a mother a whole change is supposed to take place in her. But it hadn't for me. Soon I was back working at the studio, and when I came home each night things were the same except that we had two babies. There was a nurse who would bring them in to me. I would get a full report on their day. I would hold and cuddle them. Then they would be carried back to the nursery and I would sit back knowing that something was wrong.

Something was missing but I didn't know what. I tried my best to figure it out and couldn't. One night I almost got it. I was sitting with Jess after dinner. The babies had been in and were gone again, and that same feeling was on me. Only this time it was worse. Suddenly, without expecting to, I burst into tears.

"I'm not their mother!" I cried. "I'm no good around here!"

It was quite a little demonstration and after it was over we analyzed the outbreak very scientifically, and incorrectly. We concluded it was just a belated emotional effect of a pregnancy that had been rather an easy one. You know, things have to balance up one way or another; I was experiencing some of the

When it did happen, it came as a complete surprise. She had undergone a minor operation, and instead of recuperating as expected, she continued to feel tired and squeamish. Finally, she sat down and phoned her doctor.

"You're sure I'm all right? I mean—don't you think I should be feeling better than this? It's really a very strange feeling."

She flew back to Arkansas with Dick to publicize The Reformer and The Redhead, and she was violently ill on the plane.

"I'm sorry," she told Dick. "I thought I was getting over my fear of flying."

Five busy days were spent in Arkansas, and they were pure and simple murder for June, because the feeling she'd had on the plane stayed with her the entire time. When they returned home to Hollywood, she put down her share of luggage, tore to the phone and dialed her doctor's number.

"I'm home," she reported, "and you come right over and do something. I feel awful."

It was then that dawn broke over the doctor's head.

"Come down and see me this afternoon," he said, and nothing more.

The next day he phoned June at home. "My girl," he said, "you are going to become a mother."

unpleasant mental upsets that should have hit me before the babies were born.

What else could it be? The babies were here. Everything was fine. We were both working. And what was more, the babies were good babies. Such good babies they never even woke us nights. Only, I didn't feel any better after all this rationalizing, and, as I pointed out to Jess, how could the boys wake us? They were in a different part of the house with a nurse right by to attend their wants the moment they piped up.

A few evenings later, still dissatisfied, I got a daring idea, or so it seemed. I told Jess I was going to give the nurse the night off, and I wanted the babies' cribs to be moved into our bedroom for the remainder of the night.

The moment this was done, I felt a touch of something long overdue. I got ready for bed in a sort of glow; there we were, the whole family all together. The old empty feeling was disappearing and was being replaced by something that, well—the "something" I knew my friends meant when they asked me if I didn't feel "different."

There was my answer, of course. Having children does not make you a mother; only mothering does. I had been missing the infancy of my boys. I hadn't been living with them. (Continued on page 95)

When Nora Eddington divorced Errol Flynn and married Dick Haymes, she received custody of little Deirdre and Rory Flynn. With care and gentleness Nora helped her two daughters to avoid the fear or confusion that might have resulted from her marital mix-up.

Some of them are divorcées, others adopted their babies, but if you think this makes them poor parents, you don't know Hollywood mothers. They weep when their kids have the measles, they save their baby's first tooth—and their children grow up in a secure little world of devotion.

June Allyson and Dick Powell waited almost four years before they adopted Pamela. Now they know she's brought them more happiness than they ever had without her. They planned to adopt another baby but postponed doing so when they discovered that June will soon have one herself.

■They were standing together in their hotel suite at the Claridge, looking happy and wistful. Every once in a while, Liz would turn to Nicky and smile. He'd wink at her, just a little, so that no one else would notice.

The room was full of reporters, and if this was a bridal suite you couldn't tell it from the noise and the smoke and the casual way these reporters had taken over the place when they walked into it.

They asked the usual things—"How do you like London? Where have you visited? What are your plans for the next eight years?" Then, suddenly, there was a collective pause for breath. A silence. And a question was fired at these two kids which almost knocked them over.

"When are you going to have a baby?"

"Well," spluttered Elizabeth, blushing furiously, "Well . . ." She reached for Nicky's hand, and grabbed it.

Nicky took a deep breath. "Well," he said, and laughed self-consciously. "Well. Naturally we don't want to wait too long. I mean, my younger brother has two children with another on the way. I can't let him get too far ahead of me, you know. I mean— Can I" . . . his voice drifted off . . .

But he'd said enough.

Ever since that afternoon Liz has been denying that she expects a baby in February or even April, but no one listens. It seems so right for a beautiful girl like Liz to have a beautiful baby that the sooner the better, everyone says, and she can't tell them different.

And what a beautiful baby it would be—with dark, curly hair, and tremendous blue eyes and a complexion as white and softly tinged with pink as only an artist like Renoir could paint, and only a daughter of Liz could possess. At least, that's the way I picture her.

I don't know any better than you if Elizabeth is expecting a baby now, but I do know that Liz is unpredictable. She's made definite statements before, and then turned right around and done the opposite. Take the time she was so vehement about never being engaged again.

"Next time I'll just get married," she told me after her romantic friendship with Glenn Davis, and her slightly longer engagement with diamond ring to Bill Pauley, Jr. "And, furthermore," she added, "I'm not going to get married until I'm twenty-one."

So what happened? Six months later, Liz and her very charming mother announce her engagement to hotel heir, Nicky Hilton, and three months after her eighteenth birthday, Liz is saying, "I do," in a very wonderful marriage ceremony to the twenty-three-year-old Nicky.

Linda Christian: She lost two babies, but prays that the future will be kinder to her.

by Helen Walsh

■ Ask Ty Power about the two babies that Linda has lost in the past two years, and he quickly shifts the conversation or ends it right there and walks away.

More than anything else in life, he has wanted children, at least a son to carry on his name, one of the great names in the American theater. Three times he's been bitterly disappointed.

The first time was with sophisticated Suzanne Georgette Charpentier Sorre Murat, the French actress better known as Annabella. Ty's married life with her was childless. She had a daughter, now 20, whom he still supports, but she isn't his.

Perhaps the Fates knew that a divorce between them was their destiny.

Perhaps the marriage dissolved because there were no babies to make the marriage worthwhile.

Whatever happened, Ty Power, by the time he was 34 and free in 1948, was a man who desperately wanted a family.

He had been through a war, had seen death, had known the hollowness of fame, and he had come to realize that the only important thing in life was to produce more life.

When he met a girl, a great and good friend of Mexico's President Miguel Aleman, a girl named Blanca Rosa Welter, he quickly married her. She, too, felt as strongly about this concept as he. Linda Christian was willing to give up her career, small as it was, to become Mrs. Tyrone Power, and the mother of his children.

Perhaps Ty had given up Lana Turner because she would never give up her career, and he knew that (Continued on page 84)

■ The out-of-towners in the sight-seeing bus leaned forward expectantly. "Ladies and gentlemen," their guide was saying, "the next house on the right, the one with the red door and the bank of geraniums, belongs to that famous dancer, Gene Kelly, and his family."

"I don't believe it," whispered the Shriner's wife from Shreveport, La. "Why, it's no bigger than our own place back home."

Her husband grinned. "Half of what this guy says is baloney," he stated flatly.

Actually, the house did belong to Gene Kelly, and the busload of tourists were obviously disappointed at this "excuse" for a movie-star's home.

From the outside, the Kelly's two-story house is like that of many middle-class American families, living in good residential districts. It's within walking distance of the public schools, not too far from the movies, and only three blocks from a marketing center. The nearest swimming pool is a couple of houses away, and the car in the garage is a 1941 Ford.

There are two things, though, which distinguish this house from the others on the block. First, there are usually six to twelve cars parked in front of it. These cars belong to the friends who drop in regularly for talk and movies, and on Saturday nights, for charades. Sundays, the volleyball net strung across the back yard gets good use, and a path is beaten from there to the Kelvinator refrigerator in the den where cold drinks are stored.

No one ever rings the bell or knocks on the Kelly door.

The Kelly house is near the market center, and Betsy does the shopping in her 1941 Ford. Her movie name is Betsy Blair. She's the dramatic Kelly—leaves all dancing to Gene.

The backyard boasts no formal gardens, not even a tennis court. There's plenty of space for the dog to romp in, and on Sunday afternoons the Kellys play volleyball with true professional zeal.

Kerry and her daddy go to church hand-in-hand every Sunday morning. Unlike many Hollywood children, she attends a public school, plays with the neighborhood kids.

People just walk right in. A butler would either be laughed out of the household or converted into a volleyball star.

A few weeks after she'd supposedly attempted suicide, Judy Garland dropped by and sang for three hours. "She was never prettier, never in better voice," says Betsy. A little while after Judy arrived, Leslie Caron, the French ballet dancer who'll star with Gene in An American in Paris, drove up and asked for a coke. She, in turn, was followed by Vera-Ellen, two writers, Vincente Minnelli and Katharine Hepburn.

The second distinguishing factor about the Kelly house is the telephone. It never stops ringing. In one fifteen minute period there are often as many as eight calls. Actors phone Gene for advice about little theater groups. The Veterans' Hospital asks Betsy to work an extra day. Little Kerry's friends invite her over for dinner. Press agents try to convince Gene that he needs a public relations man. The Kellys always answer the phone themselves and they never say, "Wrong number."

Superficially, Gene and Betsy appear to be an average young couple. Actually, they're too talented to be average. Yet they prefer a simple house in an unpretentious street. They have sound reasons for this choice.

While Gene was in the Navy, and stationed at a submarine base in New London, Conn., Betsy was searching California for a place he could come home to. She didn't have anything particular in mind, but she was sure of one (Continued on page 92)

Decorators say blue's too cold for a bedroom, but the Kellys find it restful, a relief from the heat outside.

Gene hired a carpenter to build this tall, shallow magazine stand. Betsy and Lois, Gene's secretary, keep current magazines up-to-date for him. The kitten's Kerry's.

Fondly known as the "Sports Palace," this back hall closet holds equipment for the Kellys' athletic friends, who seem to go for every sport—especially volleyball.

ANN BLYTH is lovely and loveless, sweet as sugar candy, and almost unbelievably above reproach by anyone.

SHELLEY WINTERS is on a temperamental, "I don't care", kick again; recently caused designer Orry Kelly to resign.

■ She was a pretty little thing—wide-eyed, innocent, and as steamed up as a plum pudding. She tripped into my office clutching a brand new studio contract and asking advice.

"Before I give you any of that," I told her, "I'd like to know something. What are you planning to do with that contract—use it as a ticket to night clubs, parties, and playboys, or make it a work slip for success and a worthwhile life?"

"Oh," she answered, "I'm not going near night clubs or parties, and playboys don't interest me now. I'm going to make a name for myself. You'll be seeing me in the newspapers soon," she promised. So I sat her down and warned her in no uncertain terms about what she'd be up against hunting real success in this town called Hollywood. I was only wasting my breath.

In three short weeks the studio, disgusted with her escapades, dropped her. A few weeks more and I saw her picture in the papers all right, but not quite as she had dreamed. The police had her. She was in bad company and she was in trouble.

That sad, silly little girl was steeped in all the wrong ideas about Hollywood and tragically unprepared—mentally, emotionaly, and morally, for the so-called "lucky break" which dropped her down in the toughest town a girl can tackle.

She was the victim of a most murderous myth—the Hollywood Cinderella fable. She never got to be a star, of course, and she never will. But even if she had, her cockeyed conception of a happy-ever-after life in Hollywood would have put the skids on her fame pronto. Hollywood is no bed of roses for a girl. On the contrary, it's a bed of booby traps. On every side of the red carpet you read about, are wicked rocks, just waiting to smash glass slippers to bits.

"Only one girl in a million makes it," Billy Grady, MGM's casting director, once told me, "and that's usually an accident." Bill was talking about movie success stories. I can say the same thing about life stories even when they're stars' lives.

I've watched more unhappy endings in my Hollywood days than ever a camera dared record. I've seen the pitfalls of Hollywood gather their toll. I've seen careers and happy lives wrecked at all stages of the game by the very things that bring girls here in the first place—ambition, and by the things they find when they get here—pressure, flattery, bad company, bad advice, false values, falser vows. I've watched girls make more mistakes than a raw rookie in the Hollywood circus parade.

I've seen them start the ticklish tightrope walk, ignorant and unprepared, with freak starts, and I've seen them step on the Hollywood highwire, trained and ready, only to stumble and fall. The late Lupe Velez got her start because a horse in a Doug Fairbanks picture stepped on her foot, and in a Latin rage she turned and bit that horse on the leg. Doug recognized the fire when he first saw it and made this "extra" his leading lady. She became a star, but she wound up a suicide.

THE HEAT'S ON AT FINLANDIA, THE ONLY PLACE WHERE A MAN'S PUT ON THE SHELF—AND LIKES IT!

by Jim Burton

■ Women have the monopoly on beauty treatments. Men generally take the faces that God gave them and do the best they can. Mud packs, permanent waves, facials—they're for the girls. Probably the biggest disadvantage of all this is that there are no beauty parlors where men can get together and gossip.

Imagine the male delight when 13 years ago a fellow name of Sam Amundsen opened a Finnish bathhouse—for men only. Here at last was a place where the boys could let off steam, and improve their physiques at the same time. It was a natural. Before long every Hollywood he-man worth his weight had made a habit of Finlandia, which is located in the basement of the Bing Crosby building. The Crosby brothers, Kirk Douglas, Humphrey Bogart, Cornel Wilde, Zachary Scott, Paul Douglas—they all drop in for the treatment, and the talk.

On this particular afternoon, MODERN SCREEN got a call from Scott Brady.

"How about joining us for a quick bake?" he said. Since it was only 90 degrees in the shade, photographers Bert Parry, Bob Beerman, and I were only too happy to go somewhere nice and warm. We hustled over to Finlandia and there found Scott, John Bromfield, Rock Hudson, Tony Curtis and Hugh O'Brian in various stages of undress.

The body-building equipment at Finlandia consists first of a hot room (temperature between 120 and 170 degrees). You go into the room, climb on a shelf, and let your pores relax. The higher the shelf, the higher the temperature, and the more relaxed you become. Sit there twenty minutes and you're so relaxed you can pass out. Finnish bathing, though, is not without a purpose. It's supposed to rid the body of poisons through perspiration. We all grabbed towels and took the bodies into the steam room.

"Well," said Scott, "I've had enough."

"You've only been here two minutes," said John Bromfield.

"Clock-watcher," sneered Scott, and sank back.

Bromfield looked very happy up there on the shelf. Every once in a while he'd yank a cord which dropped water on some steaming rocks in the corner. Every yank raised the heat 20 degrees. (Continued on next page)

"You should be in the gambling racket, son," Scott tells Tony, who is beating him soundly at gin rummy. Hugh kibitzes while Rock gets a salt rubdown in the next room, so he can go back to the steam room and sweat some more.

Chowtime at Finlandia is a special privilege. Sam Amundsen, owner of the Finnish baths, provides such a spread only for men who make a party of coming down to his establishment. The hungry mob wastes no times digging in.

"Ah, this is wonderful!" sighs Hugh, as masseur Kaarlo gives him a vigorous alcohol rub, to close up his pores. John and Scott watch skeptically.

Scott shivers as Richard Wolfs, head masseur at Finlandia, dries him off after his alcohol rub by fanning him with a sheet. This helps the pore-closing process, but it's a shock right after a 170-degree bath.

Tony's getting an icy shower, whether he likes it or not. "Good for you," says Scott, holding him there—Brady's way of making up for the gin game.

Weighing-in time proves interesting—and slightly disconcerting. The boys are supposed to have lost weight after their steam baths, but Hugh claims he's gained! He doesn't see Scott's hand on the scales.

"Hey, cut that out!" said Tony Curtis, after the second yank.

"Can't take it, uh?" said John.

"Me? I love it," said Tony. "But the other guys—they're evaporating."

"It's not the heat," groaned Rock Hudson. "It's the humidity."

"I think I got rid of enough poison," said Scott, getting up. "The Red Cross could use me now—as a bandage."

Everyone followed Scott out of the room—except John. "He-men!" he laughed, and energetically yanked the cord.

"Listen, character," said Scott. "I hope you melt."

As he left the room, Tony jammed the door with a wet towel, and blithely stepped into a cold shower. Two minutes later, Bromfield was banging on the door. "Let me out of here!" he yelled. "For Pete's sake, boys, let me out!"

the faith my mother taught me

Because her, I fought pain, and found new strength in prayer . . . by Ann Blyth

■ Dusk had descended suddenly as it so often does in southern California. One moment the room in which I had been resting was filled with light; the next moment the shadows of twilight had fallen.

My mother, who had been working in the kitchen preparing dinner for us, came into the room, and turned on the lights. As she did so, my spirits soared. It was not merely because there was light in a room where before there had been darkness. It was mostly because there was something about my mother's very presence that always cheered me up.

I often think of that room, and of how it seemed to change when she walked into it. I think of how impatient I was when I was younger, and of how stunned I was at first, when my back was seriously injured in a tobogganing accident. We didn't realize at first how seriously I had been injured. The thought did come to me, as the doctors went about (Continued on page 71) gun—and also came back alive!

■ "Let's go hunting," Guy suggested one night at dinner.

"Rabbit?" (We'd been eating rabbit for a week as the result of another expedition.)

"Nope," my husband said mysteriously. The grin on his face could have stretched clear across the room if his ears hadn't been in the way.

I put my feet down. Firmly. The ducks we keep in the backyard were going to find the hole in the fence any day. "Guy, we can't go tomorrow. We have to mend the fence," I told him. And I meant it.

So we went hunting. We went to Catalina —a trip Guy has been planning since the last time he was there shortly before our marriage. "Catalina," he'd say periodically. "That's the place. Why there are hunting spots on that island that a lot of people don't even know exist!"

I held my breath as we walked into the elegance of the Catalina Guest Ranch. "Just what are we going to shoot?" I wanted to know. "Mink?"

"None of that," grinned our host, Julian King. "Your permit includes only goat and boar, and only bows and arrows."

The Ranch is the former and fabulous Toyon Bay resort, which was known for its grandeur. But there've been some changes made since Julian and Lucille King took over. Now, if you don't own a pair of levis and can't stow away a Texas-size chuck wagon lunch, you might as well stay home. Informality's the keynote. And before we'd been there five minutes we were sure that the Kings must have invented the word hospitality.

We'd barely unpacked our suitcase when Mr. King called. "Let's start at dusk," he suggested. "I'll have the truck waiting."

That gave us the rest of the afternoon to lounge around. We lounged by the pool for about five minutes before Guy spotted the paddleboards. Then we headed for the surf. Next came a game of volleyball. And after that, baseball with some of the other guests. "Ever been on such a hunting trip?" my husband asked happily.

When we'd finished dinner, we climbed into the truck and went in search of wild boar. Our bows and arrows were ready— but that night the boar seemed to be avoiding us. We were avoided until 2 a.m. when we decided to return to the ranch.

We were ready to go again at 5 a.m. This time we were going after wild goat. Tec, our guide, had our horses ready, and "You always been a cowpoke?" Guy asks Tec at the Ranch. Tec says he's a movie stunt man!

That's my husband in the saddle. We hunted with bows and arrows only.

We went after wild goat each morning at five and stayed up till two a.m. tracking down boar.

My horse reared right after this picture was taken—and I went flying.

Guy wanted me to change horses after my fall, but I wouldn't leave this scared fellow.

Ready, aim—fire! This not only looks good on Guy—but it got fine results.

We left Catalina before we could really enjoy Guy's haul. There was a barbecue that night.

This baby goat walked into my arms. Too bad I couldn't take him home.

Waiting on a Catalina Island pier for the boat that will take us on a lobster "hunt," Guy and I chuckle over plans for his afternoon diving.

he led us up a steep mountain trail. "Guess you must have been a cowboy all your life," Guy told him admiringly.

Tec smiled at that. "I'm a Hollywood stunt man!" he said.

A few hours later, I was wishing I could make the same claim. We were reaching the summit and one of our party handed me a quiver. My horse shied. Then he reared. Arrows went flying. So did I. Next thing I knew I was on the ground. I glanced over a few feet at the canyon below. Fortunately I'd gone the other way. "I'm glad he knows not to throw people into canyons," I shuddered.

"You'd better change horses—in case he doesn't," Guy insisted.

I refused. The poor horse was standing there, looking as though he'd lost his last friend. And I think my pride hurt most. So I patted his nozzle and climbed back into the saddle.

We claimed one other casualty that day. An hour or two later, Guy saw a goat and went after it on foot. The chase led all the way down the mountainside. We waited. Pretty soon Guy reappeared. He had the goat. "I should have tamed him instead of shooting him," he said wearily. "Then we could've taken turns carrying each other back up."

However, my husband wasn't too tired to go diving for lobster in the afternoon. I haven't mastered the sport yet, so I looked on from the deck of the boat. He'd bring one up—introduce us—then return it to the bottom. Guy was thoughtful as we left the lobster and headed for shore. "Wish I'd had my spear fishing equipment," he said.

"Why?" I asked. "The lobster kept you busy."

He's no
Cinderella-boy, no overnight sensation.
Greg's a man who starved to be an actor, who built his own future.

BY KATHY O'SHEA

A little over ten years ago, when Warners bought the screen rights to Captain Horatio Hornblower, Gregory Peck was reading the book in a rooming house, wondering whom they'd pick to play that part. Not him. He had less than a nickel to his name, and his name wasn't worth much more—at least, not to the casting offices, not to the sharp-eyed talent scouts who don't pick a winner until the race is over.

The year was 1939, and on that particular night Gregory Peck was sharing his dinner with a couple of runaway schoolgirls who lived upstairs, and didn't even have enough money to walk home.

Pretty soon, Warners shelved Horatio for want of a star to play him, and Gregory found himself a job at the New York World's Fair. He was a barker, or a talker, or whatever you call a guy who stands up in front of the auto-ride and pulls the people in with his magnetic charm. A few weeks of barking and he sounded like Gravel Gertie on a foggy day, so he quit. He went over to Radio City, where the guides don't speak much above a whisper. In and out of the Music Hall lobby he marched, up and down the elevators, round and about that miniature city, a flock of tourists trailing him with their heads up, looking for a movie star they could write home about.

Ten years ago, it could have been a hundred. . . .

He went down to the Neighborhood Playhouse and won a scholarship—tuition and two five-dollar bills a week thrown in. He gave Radio City back to the tourists, gave six dollars to the landlady every Monday night, had four dollars left to starve on, to become an actor on.

He got around; he saw the Broadway plays —easy if you know how to do it. You polish your shoes, press the pleat in your trousers with your thumb and forefinger, saunter down to Shubert's Alley and wait for the audience to come out at intermission. Then you mingle with them, smile vacantly at someone's back, follow that back into the theater and ignore the ushers. Find an empty seat, relax, enjoy yourself.

Greg's memories of lean days in New York induced him to establish La Jolla Playhouse with Mel Ferrer, where veteran stars work with young actors.

He saw a movie that way, too. Gone With The Wind. Ten years later, David Selznick gave a party in his honor, screened Gone With The Wind, and it was the first time Greg saw the whole thing from start to finish.

Laugh? He thought he'd die. . . . What's it like being an actor without an Equity card? Walking the streets of New York, Times Square, the Bowery, the crowds not making room for him. . . .

One day he saw a man sprawled on a subway landing, looking dead. People stepped over him, rushing home with the bacon. "Looks dead," Greg said to a police officer. "Him?" said the officer. "Probably drunk. Let's see." They went over to see. "Yeah," said the policeman. "He's dead all right."

All right . . . there's more to the city. Children grow up in it, play hopscotch on the pavement, go to college, build a dream. There was work you could do, important work. And down at the Neighborhood Playhouse there were Irene Lewisohn, Martha Graham, Rita Morgenthau, Sanford Meisner to teach him, to cheer him, to have faith in him. For two years he lived on tuition and ten dollars a week, and then he won another scholarship to the Barter Theater in Virginia. People use vegetables for tickets at the Barter Theater, and there, Greg lived on spinach.

In Hollywood, they'd taken Horatio off the shelf, and dusted him. They let Aeneas MacKenzie put him into script form, and then they shelved him again, because there was a shortage of materials, and they couldn't build the set or the costumes that Horatio required.

Greg was on a road tour with Katharine Cornell. Greta Rice, a member of Miss Cornell's company was along, too. He married Greta, took her to Broadway. New York seemed different with her beside him. Failure was for bachelors. Even so, all the plays he acted in flopped. Critics singled Greg out, though. "Watch him," they said.

Ten years to watch the making of a star . . .

Toumanova was to work with him in Days of Glory. Every morning he'd leave the Hollywood auto court that was his home, and go over to the studio. Someone would put a lawn mower in his hands; someone would toss him an egg and tell him to make an omelette; someone would give him a dustcloth and lead him to a car. Publicity pictures. How do you become famous without publicity pictures?

"How phony can we get?" he'd say.

They'd laugh. "Okay. Hold it! Hold that smile."

After the movie was finished they didn't have to tell him to smile. He bought a house on a hill. The mountains spread out for fifty miles around him, and swimming pools caught the sun in the valleys.

They put him in Keys of the Kingdom, and then sent him to New York for the première. He got off the train at 125th Street and wandered around Columbia University. He'd had a room near there once, wanting to be close to the college where he could make some friends. He walked down along the Hudson River, and he could have been anywhere the way his thoughts were, he could have been in Heaven. . . .

Up at the Waldorf Towers everyone was waiting—the newspapermen, the photographers, the studio people. They'd been waiting at Grand Central where he hadn't got off the train and when he came in they didn't ask him where he'd been, but he told them. And then, after they'd all gone, he and Greta stood at (Continued on page 86)

A home in Minneapolis with organdy curtains on your bedroom window, 97 dolls sitting in a row, and the sun always shining for you, even if it rained outside. An only child, pampered by a mother and a father who had the time and the money and the heart . . . but inside of you, a little hurt growing because your father loved to hunt and fish and didn't have a son to take with him. "Wouldn't you rather have a son, Father?" And his looking down at you with a gentle smile on his face, "I wouldn't trade you for three of them!" Lucky Dahl. . . .

"You could take her home in a shoe box," the nurse laughed, as Idelle E. Dahl reached out for her daughter, almost hidden in the pink fluff of her finery.

"She'll grow," said Mrs. Dahl fondly. "Her grandfather's six-feet-four."

She grew, and her mother tied her red-gold curls in velvet ribbons, bought her a deep blue coat trimmed with ermine, and a pair of snow-white leggings.

"Sing us a song, Arlene," she'd say, and she'd sing "Alice Blue Gown," her clear voice trembling on the high notes.

She sang for the family, for 1,500 Dahls gathered in Minnehaha Park on a family outing. She sang at church, at the ladies clubs. (Continued on page 87)

It comes

■ They took their vacations at the same time, and strangely enough, in the same place. It was Honolulu. They sat under the beach umbrella with mutual friends, and they made eyes at each other. The friends weren't surprised. They'd drawn their conclusions several months before. "If this isn't love," these friends had concluded, "then tell us a better word."

Funny thing about gossips. They knock themselves out trying to manufacture a romance, but you hand a real one to them and they turn up their noses. "Oh, that," they say, disdainfully. "That won't take."

Anyway, they had Howard figured out. "Listen," they said. "The torch he's carrying for Ava is so big they don't need lights on Sunset Boulevard. Invite that guy to a party and the only woman he can get himself to bring is his mother."

And Ida? They had her pegged. Ida was too busy being a business tycoon—producing movies with one hand, discovering new talent with the other—to get dewey-eyed over him. Besides, her first marriage to Louis Hayward had blown up in her face, and her second marriage to Collier Young was more like the merger of 20th Century and Fox. She'd watch her step the next time—if there'd be a next time.

Ida was brought up in show business, she's been in the movies since she was 15, and now it's a part of her. Whenever she walks into a room you think it's the first act. Howard's like the calm after a storm. He'll sit down without pushing a lamp off the table and he'll try to engage you in quiet conversation.

The gossips crossed them off their lists and said it wouldn't take. They turned to other matters—while Duff and Lupino turned to each other.

up love

"So that's what we mean," the gossips say. "The only thing these two have in common is Hollywood. Go build a marriage on that." Actually, Lupino and Duff can start with a better foundation.

When Howard was in the Navy, the closest friend he had was a movie producer.

"Why don't you come out to Hollywood when this is over?" the producer asked him.

"What for?" said Howard.

"I'll get you a part in a movie," the producer said. "And if that's not enough, I'll get you a date with the prettiest star I know."

That did it. First move Howard made after he checked his bags in Union Station was to call up his friend.

"Okay," he said. "Get out the script, and put that lady on the phone."

"Well, catch your breath, chum," the producer said. "I'll have to do a little thinking. About that date . . ."

"Yeah, the date," said Howard. "You know, all the way in from San Francisco, I've been dreaming about Ida Lupino. Crazy, isn't it? How about Ida Lupino?"

"That's too bad," said the producer. "I don't know Ida Lupino. How about Ava Gardner?"

"Ava Gardner?" Howard thought it over for all of one second. "Tell her I'll be around at eight."

Ava Gardner sailed in on Howard Duff the way the moon sails over Miami. It was inevitable—and Miami would be lost without that moon. For three years, Ida Lupino was forgotten, and Shelley (Continued on page 94)

Marta has the chiseled features of a Swedish beauty . . . she found the U.S.A. friendly from the start . . . American slang really puzzled her . . .

you don't have to know the language

by Jane Wilkie

■ The first fan letter Marta Toren ever got read like this:

"Dear Marta, Your sex appeal drives men mad. You hit the jackpot, baby."

"Baby?" she puzzled. "I am not a baby. And what, please, is a jackpot? What is this I have hit?"

It was the first of thousands of fan letters, all of them pretty much the same. Sweden seems to have an uncanny ability to turn out ravishing beauties, and is kind enough to donate them to the United States. Garbo was the first, then came Ingrid. There have been others—Viveca Lindfors, Signe Hasso—knockouts, each one.

Marta Toren is the latest, and perhaps the fairest, with her wide, lovely eyes, her tall yet curvesome figure, her high cheek bones and chiseled features. But Marta has something that even Garbo never had; a delicious sense of humor and a zest for living that will never let her become a haloed recluse.

It's often difficult for foreigners to understand the informality and brashness of Americans, but when Marta arrived three years ago, a shy and homesick girl, she summed up the whole continent as friendly, and she wanted to become American in every way.

It hasn't been easy. Two months after her arrival she was starred in Casbah, with Tony Martin. The extent of her English was confined to what she had been taught in Swedish schools, by Swedish teachers, so her lines for the film were learned by memorizing the sounds. One day, the whole set was quivering with high-strung people, notably the director and producer who had disagreed on a point of production. Tony Martin wandered over to Marta's dressing room.

"It would be nice," he said, "if you went to the director and said something to ease the situation. You know—something to let him know you are sorry that things are not going well."

"Ya," said Marta. "What is it I am to say?"

Martin wrote a few words on a scrap of paper and handed it to her. Marta read the message and looked up with a puzzled expression.

"I am not stupid," she said. "These words—they do not sound quite right."

"Don't worry," Martin told her. "It's American slang—means you're sorry. Go ahead. It'll be all right." And as Marta walked toward the director, Martin winked at him behind her back.

Once more she consulted the note in her hand, then looked at the director sympathetically. "Drop dead, you dumb jerk," she said, sweetly.

"Thank you, Marta," said the director. "That's very kind of you."

It was the joke of the afternoon and accomplished its purpose of breaking tension nice to get back to fall clothes

by connie bartel, fashion editor

■ We think that of all the changing seasons the switch from summer to fall is the most fun. It's always a kick to wear new clothes, of course, but after a long summer of barelegs and sunbacks, there's a special lift to your first fall costume. It feels so good to wear real clothes again—suits and dresses, complete with hats and bags and stuff.

To get you ready for the first cool snap, in this issue we have assembled a wardrobe which makes the most of the something's-going-to-happen feeling of the most exciting season of them all.

Opposite, Ruth Roman wears a suit—with mink tails yet!—and how could you possibly have a dull autumn wearing a suit like that?

On pages 66 and 67, cute Joan Evans shows off a date dress at an unbelievable price—and a convertible four-piece suit that has us dizzy trying to count the ways it can be mixed or matched. On pages 68 and 69 we come up with two of those must-have dresses—both with brand new 1950 touches. And, on page 70, we wind up with a good-good girdle and some magic-making bras—because of course what's under your new fall fashions does a lot for them and for you.

Smell those burning leaves?

Ruth Roman wears a suit with a mink tail bib

■ Ruth Roman, currently starring in Warner Brothers' Three Secrets, wears a super swank suit with honest-to-goodness mink tails. It's long-lined, triangle-pocketed, and crowned with a detachable capelet. Mink comes off separately to leave capelet; or take off capelet—and behold!— you have a smartly simple tailleur.

It's rayon gabardine in green, grey, brown or wine. Sizes 9-15. By Debby Drake—$24.75.

Bag by Mutterperl. Gloves by Wear-Right

This suit and all the other MODERN SCREEN fashions shown in this issue can be bought in person or ordered by mail from Strawbridge & Clothier's Budget Store, Market & 8th Sts., Philadelphia 5, Pa.

Joan is all ready for a date in a gleaming checked taffeta with a rustle all its own, belted and pocket-cuffed in velvet. Short sleeves (very important this fall), softly draped bodice, nice full dancey skirt. Rayon taffeta in gold, red, green with black. Sizes 19-15.

ıe faith my mother taught me

(Continued from page 51) their work of sting my legs to see if I still had the use them, that I might be paralyzed for life, lt it came fleetingly. I tried to think nat I would do if I could never walk ain, but I just couldn't think.

Then I prayed. I prayed that I wouldn't paralyzed. I prayed for strength to derstand why I had been hurt. And if vere to be kept in bed or out of pictures r a long time, I prayed for strength to ar that.

After four days of tests, the doctors told e that some day I could walk again. eanwhile, there were weeks and months pain. I was in a cast for three months, a steel brace for ten months. I kept on aying. My mother prayed with me and me.

After I had been in the steel brace for months, the doctors advised me to to swim again, and I did. How wonrful that first swim was, and how terly difficult! Never before had I appreted the wonderful gift God had given e in giving me the power to walk, to im! Knowing how easily that gift ght have been taken away from me by accident made me all the more grate- to be able to walk across a room ain. When I had to put on my steel ace again, I didn't mind the prison of at brace nearly as much.

'HEN suddenly, while I was still weak and incapacitated, my mother fell seriisly ill and had to be taken away to a spital. If it had not been for the faith e taught me, I do not know how I would ve been able to bear the blow. All her e she had worked hard so that I might ain a certain position that I wanted. st at the time when she could have joyed seeing the fruits of her labors, e became ill. At first I was bewildered d confused. I asked, as so many people roughout the world have asked when ose close to them were hit by tragedy, Why does this have to be? Why does a man who has been so wonderful all her e have to suffer pain?"

Her faith in God never lessened. She d, as she had always said, "Whatever ppens is for the best."

I found the answer to my own questions d fears through faith and prayer. I ayed to be able to understand why this d to be.

I know that she's far happier now. She's ppy in heaven, and maybe—who knows? she's seeing me do my work. I try my st to live and work in a way that uld make her proud of me.

Ever since I was a little girl I have en brought up in the Roman Catholic igion. It was my mother who first ught me about the faith that meant so ch to her. She was a tiny woman with l auburn hair and dancing hazel eyes. e taught me to believe in God.

My conception of heaven is as St. Paul scribed it, "Eye hath not seen, nor ear ard, neither have entered into the heart man, the things which God hath prered for them that love him." So heaven ust be pretty wonderful. I suppose eryone has his own picture of heaven. hink of hearing only the most beautiful usic, maybe because I love music so ch.

I believe that if something is good for u and to your advantage, it will happen. metimes when illness or tragedy strikes, s hard to understand how that can posly turn out for the best. That is where th in prayer will help to see you rough.

been so badly injured in the tobogganning accident, just after I had achieved some measure of success in my first real dramatic role in Mildred Pierce.

BUT God has His own plan for things. Perhaps I was too impatient. At 15 or 16, I sometimes grew impatient over trifles. When I tried to get a job in radio or modeling and found I had missed it by just half an hour, I would be downright impatient and fret over it. My mother used to tell me that when the things you have set your heart on don't happen, it is usually for the best, but at first that was hard to believe.

Perhaps my year of being forced to remain away from pictures was a test. I know that as a result of it, I learned to be more patient, more understanding of people in every respect. I gained a great appreciation of many things.

If everything ran along smoothly for us, if there weren't a few bumps along the way, we wouldn't grow.

That year was not lost. I know it was marked on God's calendar. I made up my mind that even though I had to remain at home, I would continue with my high school studies, and I did. Of course it was more difficult to study at home with only the aid of my teacher, Mrs. Hoene, and my mother than it might have been in a classroom full of happy schoolmates, but the trials and tribulations of that year did help me mature. I was lucky enough to be able to join my classmates at their graduation exercises. Because I had been confined to my apartment for so long, that event meant far more to me than it would have otherwise.

Before I injured my back, the chance to go out for an afternoon and play golf would have been something I would have taken for granted. But when the doctor first told me, months after my accident, that I would eventually be able to play golf, my heart sang with happiness.

THROUGHOUT the world, there are people who wonder, as I did, when I was injured and when my mother became ill, "Why do these things have to be?" When tragedy strikes—whether in the form of illness or the loss of a loved one or in the form of a disaster of some kind—you ask, "Why should a merciful God permit this?"

I believe God created the world to be a happy place. He didn't want it to be filled with destruction and war. He gave us the limitless mountains, the fruits of the earth. He made man a little lower than the angels.

There is a line which Ethel Barrymore speaks in the picture, The Red Danube. She says, "God has not failed man. Man has failed God." When people are so adverse to God and everything He taught us, as patient and understanding as He is, He has to show us by some sign of His displeasure. It may be by an earthquake, the eruption of a volcano, a devastating flood, a great plague. These things are in His power.

Essentially, though, human beings are responsible for war. It is we who destroy each other and ourselves by turning away from His teachings. The only way the world can ever be at complete peace is if that world is at peace with God.

However, I believe that one great thing in the world is our progress toward good. Even out of evil, some good comes. There hasn't been a war out of which something good has not come. Out of the last war came great advances in medicine. The terrible sufferings of men wounded on battlefields forced humanity to take protective steps, and brought such wonder drugs as penicillin, streptomycin and others into the world. We were pushed into finding these protective drugs by the so-called evil that prevails.

IT is my belief that in the long run good is more powerful than evil. Sometimes it takes a long time for good to triumph, and sometimes it triumphs in strange ways, but I think it eventually does triumph.

Remember how there were times during the last war when people felt that the armies of Hitler and his allies were unconquerable? And remember how in the end S. S. troopers were surrendering by the thousands, and the armies that had once been so proud were defeated and humiliated? Those who had dared to abandon God and worship Hitler as a god learned their mistake.

On a smaller scale, in everyday life, we see good prevailing over evil many, many times. I remember a story that Father Keller told me. He knew of a young woman who, when she first began teaching school, was an inspired teacher. As time went on, she began to grow dissatisfied with her position. She came to believe that her job, which was so poorly paid, was also unimportant, and she decided to resign.

Before resigning, she talked to Father Keller. He reminded her that for a long time subversive elements have been trying to work their way into jobs where they can influence public opinion, particularly that of young people. Naturally, when they can get them, they welcome jobs in the teaching profession. If she left her job, Father Keller pointed out, someone might be appointed who might tear down everything she had been building up, spiritually and in other ways.

After she had listened to him for some time, she said, her face radiant, "I can see now that my job is not unimportant after all." Thus reassured, she went back to inspired teaching.

In this case the conflict between good and evil is not melodramatic, yet it exists. In various parts of our country there are some who are filled with hatred for our institutions. They are adverse to God and therefore ruthless and cunning.

But dangerous though they are, I am sure they will never triumph. For in the long run, good will always overcome evil.

As Tennyson once wrote:

"Oh yet we trust that somehow good Will be the final goal of ill."

a girl can't be too careful!

(Continued from page 47) Lila Leeds who sought success in Hollywood but found marijuana and jail instead, or the Peg Entwhistles diving to their deaths off 50-foot HOLLYWOODLAND signs who find the going too tough to take. It isn't only the hundreds of sordid items which crowd the news columns with a Hollywood dateline that I'm telling about. They don't tell the whole story.

There are trip-ups just as tragic in proportion, and maybe more so, when you consider the living hearts they bruise and the happiness they frustrate. Sometimes it's nobody's fault but a girl's own. Sometimes it's not. Sometimes the fog she gets lost in is just a poisonous by-product of the frantic factory of Hollywood fame, and practically impossible to escape.

SEVERAL years ago, a beautiful girl from Oklahoma drove out to Hollywood with her young husband hunting work. She had no money or fame, but she had something far more precious—love. When she got a job in westerns, he sat outside her sound stage, adoringly, all day while she worked. "I didn't ever go inside—that might disturb Phil," he once told me. "I just wanted her to know I was there always with her." Next time they came out, they had a family—two darling boys—also, success on Broadway back of them. Both hit the Hollywood big time, but the girl won an Academy Award in her first picture. She changed—from Phyllis Walker to Jennifer Jones. She changed in other ways, too. She sacrificed the rare adoration she possessed and her perfect family picture. Now she's married to the man who renamed her, her producer. That's a top set-up in Hollywood, to be Mrs. David O. Selznick. But, considering the trail of woe that followed—Robert Walker's break-up, her puzzled children growing up with split parents—is it success?

When Jane Wyman was pouring every shred of herself into making her determined bid for an Academy Award, she sacrificed—to Hollywood's amazement—one of its happiest homes, an ideal husband. At that time when I called Ronnie Reagan, he told me bitterly, "If there is a divorce, I'll name Johnny Belinda as co-respondent." Jane got her Oscar for Johnny Belinda—but lost something a thousand times more dear, which she'll probably never find again.

A GIRL can't be too careful. Even if she walks the chalk and minds her P's and Q's, she's in constant danger in this lions' cage called Hollywood.

First off, there's the showcase life she'll live as long as she's a star. It takes lots of girls a long, long time to realize that, and some of them never do. Only the other day, Joan Crawford, who certainly should know better after 20-odd years, motored through the Northwest, supposedly with her poodle. But also along was her director, Vincent Sherman, a married man. Although everything was, I'm sure, very proper and all, newspaper accounts had her eloping with her next husband, and it was embarrassing when those reports came back home to Hollywood. Nor did it do Joan's reputation any good.

From the minute she is worth noticing, a girl will be noticed. Everything will be magnified mercilessly. Her daily routine, her boy friends, her home life, her deportment—everything. If she slips to the right or to the left or sags in the middle she'll be mauled—often with good cause, but often unfairly, too.

In any normal town, Elizabeth Taylor's teen-age heart strivings with their consequent rifts would have been smiled on sympathetically and recognized as pure "puppy love." But Elizabeth drew indignant blasts and the ridiculous tag, "The Jilt," before she married Nicky Hilton. You should have seen some of the withering mail she received, calling her every fickle, cruel-hearted name in the book—and as I did—the tears it drew from Elizabeth's violet eyes.

Elizabeth's good name didn't deserve such a lacing. Ava Gardner's did. Little Jane Nigh currently is getting just as much criticism for having a different date each night and collecting a string of sighing swains, which is perfectly normal (and nice work if you can get it) as is Ava for carrying on a flagrant affair with a married man. The vicious, unfounded gossip that was whispered about Shirley Temple and John Agar's boy friends was enough to twist your hair into a permanent wave. There's no rhyme nor reason half the time, to the shellackings a girl's reputation can take, but unless she's loveless, like Ann Blyth, sweet as sugar candy, above reproach, no girl is safe. And even saints slip—look at Ingrid Bergman!

But some silly little fools come to Hollywood actually seeking sensational publicity in the belief that it will make them stars. So off the track is their misguided thinking about what a movie career takes, that one headline-hunting girl actually pulled a strip-tease in front of Paramount studios a while back, "protesting" some snipped-out scenes of a picture she'd lucked into for a bit. The cops stopped her, and I suppose that's just what she wanted. But nobody's heard of her

Everything But Aspirin

Schwabs' is not the biggest drugstore in existence. It is not even the biggest in Hollywood, but it comes very close to being the most unusual drugstore in the world. Schwabs' is owned and operated by four brothers—Jack, Leon, Bernard and Martin Schwab—who regard their success with a kind of harassed delight. "The place is jumping with customers every evening, especially after ten-thirty, but we don't know what causes it," says Jack Schwab.

The telephone booths in the Schwabadero (Schwabs' drugstore) are always full of characters calling up Central Casting, or an agent, or a friend who might know about a job in pictures for them if they hurry. The traffic lanes in and out of the booths are so congested that the Schwabs persuaded the phone company to set up three extra booths in the vacant lot next door.

Around ten-thirty at Schwabs' the "floor show" begins. There are no entertainers and no music, and the "show" consists merely of a lot of people standing around talking to each other. Ten-thirty is apparently the hour when the faithful feel a compulsion to drop whatever they're doing and visit Schwabs' to mingle with the gang. By eleven, standees are three and four deep in front of the counter and are spilling out into every nook and cranny of the place.

PETE MARTIN—"HOLLYWOOD WITHOUT MAKEUP"

nce. Somebody gave that girl some very ad advice.

Every year talent scouts comb the coun- y and flood Hollywood with girls tterly unequipped and hopelessly misin- rmed about what they'll be up against hen they land here. Mostly, they're ex- loited and then most of them expelled. hat eventually happens to a lot of them, d rather not say. But when the bubble ops, they can't believe it, and that's hen the "leave-it-to-me" boys step in— ildcat agents and press-agents, pro- oters, exploiters. Girls draw bad com- any, bad advice—and bad ends. It's a ame and nine times out of ten it should ever have happened in the first place.

TALKED to a pretty girl named Norma Eberhardt, not long ago. She had a stu- io contract and Life magazine had printed er picture. She thought that qualified er to act like a star. She raised so much ouble with her demands that in barely ore than a month they dropped her. She as nowhere near being a star, but she anted to live like one, right now. Didn't veryone in Hollywood? She found that e answer was "No." It took a terrific- lly talented girl, Marie Wilson, eighteen ears to get her star break, and she's still ast acting, not acting up.

Howard Hughes' next big star is a girl ho's been learning her business for nine ng years. But today, Faith Domergue ready and she's getting the biggest uild-up of any girl in Hollywood.

If you're seasoned with serious strivings ke Barbara Hale or blessed with gal- anized guts like Ruth Roman, there's ttle danger of tumbling for the siren ng of your own publicity, which is the asiest mistake to make of all. And some eteran stars are still making it. Hedy amarr has had a dozen years in Holly- ood to size herself up for the skimpily- alented, decorative doll that she is. But edy, from the Ecstasy nudist start she ad and fashion model posings in Algiers, ot the firm conviction she was a great rtist, like Garbo and Dietrich. She has een rude and demanding—tossing tem- erament right and left—and once a pub- city man on her own lot presented her ith a book, "How To Act in Public," as not-so-subtle hint. Hedy's career was ery dim before Samson and Delilah— nother strictly face-and-body role. But e's still believing the publicity blurbs hat alone make her a great actress. The ther day she demanded $5,000 to appear t a press party—aimed at promoting the ery legend which she still believes right own to the last adjective!

. . Bob Roark tells about the unpopular ctor who received a wire from an ill- isher saying: "Drop dead. Nasty letter ollows." . . .

Shelley Winters is running the same igh-riding risk right today. Shelley is lready telling the studio that made her hat she will and won't do, and demand- ng everything her own way. Shelley's ublicity has gone to her curly head, and hat's dangerous. She's been told for onths she's just about the cutest thing n wheels. Now she's acting cute—too ute. The other day Shelley was re- ponsible for a very talented designer, Orry Kelly, quitting his job. It's a funny ort of story in one way, but it points n ominous trail which too many flattery- uddled girls choose to take.

Orry was responsible for making Shel- ey look well in her clothes. He designed er a dress and sewed in a "falsy" or two o bolster the budding Shelley Winters legend. But on the set, Shelley slipped in three extra aids to busty glamor. It ruined the dress and her looks, and got Orry Kelly in hot water. But when he pro- tested, Shelley said, "I'll do what I like. I know what's best for me!"

"Put in fifteen on one side and ten on the other for all I care," sighed Kelly, and shortly after he left, and with him the guidance to smartness Shelley badly needs.

A girl has to be on her guard con- stantly, not to get too big for her britches or bras.

Cathy O'Donnell had one of the rosiest futures in Hollywood until she turned temperamental and refused to make Rose- anna McCoy for Sam Goldwyn. Roseanna made Joan Evans, who stepped right in, a star—and where is Cathy now? It takes a level head for a girl to keep an even keel to her career. She has to keep a level heart, too, in chasing what's ten times more important and ten times as tough to find in Hollywood—a happy, con- tented private life.

EVERY girl wants and needs a man in her life. And girls in Hollywood, even if they're stars, are like girls everywhere. But almost everything stacks up against them. The setting for romance in Holly- wood is as artificial as the sets that frame its fictional love stories. A girl must be seen to get her name in the glamor col- umns. So a studio arranges dates and a tour of the glamor night-club show-boxes, gigolo style. Or, if the girl happens to be a real beauty and surely star-bound, a hundred hopeful, publicity-seeking young actors and ageing playboys latch on to her for reflected glory. Lois Andrews, Lana Turner, Gene Tierney sampled that. In each case every date is a "romance," and more than two add up to an engagement. Pretty soon the giddy girl reads about how in love she is and begins to believe it. Or, she's prodded and trapped until she says "Yes"—almost always to the wrong man. Even experienced people act like char- acters out of scripts when they get that funny feeling too fast. Evelyn Keyes and John Huston flew away to get married five hours after their first date at Rom- anoff's. They barely knew each other, and they were mismated. Next stop was divorce.

John Huston, of course, is a brilliant, fine man. But what about some of the prizes a girl is likely to draw in a Holly- wood romance?

HOLLYWOOD has a fatal attraction and always had for fortune hunters and phonies. It used to be said that even a bogus title was worth a year's free living in Hollywood. A real one could be a pension for life. The Marrying Mdivanis proved that, running through movie for- tunes on their peanut prince ratings. The Marquis de la Falaise cost Gloria Swan- son and Constance Bennett a pretty penny. But those boys were catches compared to some who show up on the movie mar- riage mart—and make profitable "I do" deals—profitable for themselves, ruinous to the stars they hypnotize.

The passport to Hollywood eligibility, too often, is merely a flashy wardrobe and a smooth tongue. Nobody investigates, nobody asks questions, until too late. A few years ago, "The Moonlight Burglar," a charming crook, cut a swath in some of our best Hollywood star homes by day; by night he climbed in their windows and ransacked their jewel safes. And Bugsy Siegel, the notorious mobster, can show up in the Pickfair receiving line, as he did, with a countess on his arm.

When Steve Crane was courting Lana Turner, he was hailed as a "wealthy scion," "young tycoon," and "prominent bachelor." He wasn't any of those—not even a bachelor. In fact, not until Lana was married to him and expecting her baby, Cheryl, did she discover that Stevie wasn't even free to be her husband—he had another wife somewhere else! Tragically hoodwinked and unhappy, Lana still had to go through remarriage steps to protect her baby's name. And why did Steve Crane woo Lana in the first place? Because she was a beautiful, sweet kid he wanted to love and cherish—or because she was Lana Turner, the glamorous Hollywood star? One guess. Anyone who calls her Hollywood path rosy is color blind. She has been betrayed, fleeced, chastened, pilloried, used and abused. No girl ever had such a rough going over. Steve Crane and Artie Shaw, too, married her and left her in tears. If Lana has a happy ending with Bob Topping, she has paid for it—and paid for every movietown trap, being the girl she is, she had no chance to dodge.

Steve Crane is an example of another thing a girl is up against in Hollywood. How can she ever know—if she's a famous star—that the man who whispers love vows in her ear wants her, herself, or a piece of her fame and of her fortune?

Bette Davis has just paid off in terrible publicity, emotional damage and cold cash, too, for a mistake she should have known better than to make in the first place. She knew from her first marriage, to childhood sweetheart Ham Nelson, that she couldn't keep a husband hanging idle around the house and keep her marriage, too. But Bette desperately wanted a husband and children before it was too late. William Grant Sherry was a fine figure of a man, in trunks, but he never stood a chance of making Betty happy, even if he'd wanted to. He didn't match Bette's background, standing, or ambitions. And so, the ex-houseboy became just that again, as Mister Bette Davis, and now he's teamed up with his daughter's nursemaid and they'll probably live happily ever after—on Bette's money. Does this sound like Bill Sherry was ever in love with Bette Davis—or in love with what he could get out of her?

THERE are plenty of right men for the right girls in Hollywood—and yet, only the most canny and wise wives, once they get their husbands, seem to reach the solid, satisfying goal of a normal, happy home life. Why? Because there are disturbing, destroying factors working night and day in this unreal movie world, built on ambition, success, high pressure, and distorted values. Often even the cagiest girl loses her home base bearings in that unreal atmosphere if she doesn't watch out, especially when her husband becomes her rival, or vice versa.

Greer Garson told me the main thing that led to her divorce from Richard Ney was finding him rested from a day by the swimming pool and eager to go out, when she returned frayed and tired from a hard studio day, with another staring her in the face the next morning. That's exactly what made Ginger Rogers decide to divorce Jack Briggs.

Husbands, too often, are excess baggage in Hollywood.

And no girl, star or not, can keep her love and respect for a man who doesn't carry his own weight. There are too many delightful opportunities for idle husbands, and wives, to dally in greener fields around Hollywood, too many beautiful ladies on the make, too many handsome men with understanding ways—on sets and off. Too much opportunity too, on vacations between pictures and long location trips.

Last summer in Paris I ran smack into a certain star's loving husband. He was doing the sights of Montmartre with a cocotte, and when he spied me, he turned a pale green and ducked into a café quick. I didn't tell, but I had a mind to. Recently in New York I stepped into the elevator at my hotel, to confront a very great Hollywood star riding up with another star's spouse. She cut me cold and hasn't spoken to me since, horrified that I'd print what I saw. I haven't until right now, but I won't tell her name, so she can relax.

I've known Hollywood wives who played it safe at home—but only by sacrifices. Eleanor Powell did, to be Glenn Ford's constant companion, wife and the mother of Peter Newton. She's not sorry. Glenn's the big star now, but Eleanor, who deliberately committed career suicide for a greater goal, is the winner, from a woman's standpoint, and she doesn't need me to tell her. So is Brenda Marshall, who was as big a star as Bill Holden when she married him, but who dabbles in a part now and then, only to keep her hand in—definitely no rival to Bill, and by her own choice. But that choice is a tough one to make for a girl whose acting ambitions brought her to Hollywood in the first place. Often it's an impossible one. Often the ambition is so powerful that it blots out the real goals of a girl's life.

DO you suppose Judy Garland had a thought for her daughter, Liza, or her husband, Vincente Minelli, when she locked herself in her bathroom and smashed a glass to stab at her throat? The only thought that filled Judy's head then was, "I'm through—I'm through in pictures!" Did Ingrid Bergman think of her daughter, Pia, when she wrote Roberto Rossellini she was his whenever he beckoned? Only the hope of a great picture for the great Ingrid Bergman mattered at that moment. Wanda Hendrix knew all the time she was married to Audie Murphy that she couldn't keep him and her career, too. The twenty-four-hour demands of her picture life infuriated that touchy Texan and often he grumbled, "What's the good of a wife who's never home?" Still Wanda couldn't bring herself to sacrifice her ambition to her love.

Talking about a well-known starlet, one Hollywood wit said: "She means only half of what she says, but she says twice as much as she should."—Milton Epstein in The Film Daily

Ambition is a wonderful thing, but it's also the hidden root of most of the evils which face a girl in Hollywood. It's why they do the things they do and land in trouble of one kind or another.

I see girls start and I see them falter, and the more I look around me, the more I want to say "Careful—watch your step" to every new one who walks through the mirror into a far more frightening world than met Alice's eye in Wonderland.

A few weeks ago, MGM offered a contract to Michelle Farmer, Gloria Swanson's daughter, and Gloria was all set to let her sign. But after making her own comeback in Sunset Boulevard, Gloria thought it over again, and wrote in protective clauses for Michelle too stiff for the studio to swallow. They canceled the offer, and I'm sure Michelle was heartbroken. Maybe someday Michelle will thank Gloria and consider herself a lucky girl, and maybe she won't. But if you ask me, Mama who's certainly been through the movie mill herself, knows best. She knows the lopsided odds. She knows that unless you're that one girl in a million, you can't win.

Anyone who laughs off child-bearing in Hollywood as a sort of hobby, like gardening or making furniture, is dumber than he thinks. More than one star's marriage has broken up because there wasn't a baby to creep into the room as Mama lifted the lamp to toss at Daddy's head. If there had been a baby in the house there wouldn't have been any lamp-lifting in the first place, because both parents would have known it isn't good for children.

But to get back to Esther. A lot of people say that the reason her first marriage failed is that she had a one-track mind. She couldn't see her husband for the chlorine in her eyes. And she didn't have a child to recall to her all the wonderful traits her husband had when he wasn't angry. And without a baby, a married couple is responsible only to each other. That kind of responsibility you can write off in Reno.

With her marriage to Ben Gage, Esther got smart. She liked this man well enough to keep him even after he stopped sending roses. So she planned a little marriage insurance, and a couple of ways to get dividends for herself, lifelong dividends.

Sometimes, though, Fate throws a whammy into the plans. A little over two years ago, Esther lost her first baby. It was a girl.

At that time, Esther and Ben were on their way to a football game in San Francisco. Lou Busch and Esther's best friend Janet Blair were along with them, and they spent the night in a Monterey Hotel.

Two hours after they checked in Esther began to feel terrible. Pains raced all over her, but she didn't say a word. Finally, though, she turned to Ben and said, "I don't feel so good."

The baby was three months off, but Ben wasn't taking any chances. One look at Esther and he called the doctor. The doctor came on the double. He took one look at Esther and said, "We've got to get her to the hospital right away."

They rushed her to the hospital, where the baby died as it was being delivered.

ESTHER was grief-stricken for a while, but as the weeks flew by, her strength and her good humor came back, and she went to work with a zest. Only, by that time, they were beginning to talk at Romanoff's, and The Brown Derby, and Lucey's. "Too bad Esther lost her baby," they said. "I guess she lost her marriage with it."

"I don't give that Gage-Williams combo much more time," one gossip would say to another. "You know how they met, don't you? Ben was dating Ginny Simms. He took her to this charity affair at Earl Carroll's, and Esther was a cigarette girl that night, just for charity, you understand, and the next thing anyone knew, somebody came over and said that a big studio executive was taking Ginny home, and Ben wound up with Esther instead. That's how it started. I mean it was all a mistake to begin with. If they don't have any children I give them three years together, maybe four. . . ."

While all this was going on, Esther became pregnant again. She was making Neptune's Daughter, and every day she felt more and more like a mother. She started being ill mornings, and came down late to the studio, which for her was very unusual, and co-workers worried about it.

Charley O'Malley, the assistant director, couldn't understand it. "For a while," he said, "I thought she had a cold. I kept her dressing room heated. I saw that she had a towel around her as soon as she got out of the pool.

"She, herself, told me she had a cold, but she said it with a smile and that should've tipped me off. But then again she's always smiling and kidding around. When you make a picture with Williams you never know when she's going to drag you into the pool right after her.

"Anyway, I kept giving her this heat treatment, and she kept coming in late. Finally, one morning when she was two hours late, I said, 'Still got the sniffles, uh, Esther?' She grinned and said, 'What I've got aren't sniffles, Charley. I'm pregnant.' Well, she could've shoved me into the pool with a feather.

"In Hollywood, when an actress is expecting, the first thing the studio does is check with the doctor. If the doctor says to take her out of the picture, out she comes. If you ask the actress herself, she tells you she feels great and doesn't want to hold up the works. So you start rolling, and six weeks before the picture is scheduled to fold, the girl gets sick and you've lost a million bucks."

ESTHER'S doctor said it was perfectly okay for Esther to keep swimming, only she wasn't allowed to do anything strenuous. All the girls she was working with knew she was pregnant and they began talking about it. Here was a lady who wouldn't let motherhood stop her career, and wouldn't let her career stand in the way of motherhood. It was a good trick—and she did it.

"I think Esther is one of the bravest kids I've ever met," one of her co-workers says now. "I used to get sick swimming around that hot, chlorinated pool. You know those swim pictures are hard to make. They have to move the camera in and out for every set-up, and you're supposed to stay in focus all the time. Of course, Esther was in practically every shot, and I know a whole lot nicer places to spend time waiting for your baby than in the MGM swimming pool."

Esther's second pregnancy was rather tough. She and Ben wanted a child. They knew what had happened to the previous one. You can imagine their apprehension and finally their relief when Esther gave birth last August to a seven-pound eight-and-a-half-ounce boy. He was named Benjamin Stanton Williams. The Ben for his dad, and the Stanton in honor of Esther's dead brother.

Oddly enough, Esther's second pregnancy, once it became known, served to kill off the rumors, unfounded as they were, that she and Ben would eventually go their separate ways.

PEOPLE had said that Esther didn't need Ben, that she was a shrewd business woman in her own right. Some had even claimed that Esther didn't like the way Ben was managing her business interests, that these outside activities were the basis of disputes between them.

How these items originated no one knew. "Hollywood just can't imagine that any couple can stay happy very long," one of Esther's friends explains. "Ben is no world-beater as a television performer, but he's done an excellent job of supervising the restaurant they own. It was a failure when they took it over. It's making lots of money now. Anyway, I can tell you that couples who are unhappy together don't build families together."

After little Benjie was born, the rumors came to life again. As a matter of fact, this spring when Esther and Ben went to Hawaii, and Ben came home alone—the story spread that this was it. The love birds had quarreled in the Islands. A divorce was in the offing.

Actually, Esther was pregnant again.

And yet, was she pregnant? On the island of Kaui, she herself couldn't be sure. She wouldn't go to the island doctor for a check-up, and the possibility existed that it might be a false alarm.

In any event, Esther, good sport that she is, kept swimming in front of the cameras for The Pagan Love Song. Most of the picture was shot on Kaui, and when Esther left the island, it was late in May, and she had a pretty good idea that her little Benjie would shortly be visited by a young brother or sister.

WHEN Esther got back to the States, she went to see Dr. William Bradbury. A few days later, she had her answer: Mr. and Mrs. Ben Gage were expecting a second child early in December, 1950.

This time, the studio had Esther complete a few finishing touches and check off the lot. No more shooting until the very last minute as in Neptune's Daughter. This time, Esther would spend five months of her pregnancy resting at home.

Of course, she hasn't. She's much too restless and energetic for that. Two nights a week, you can find her down at her restaurant, The Trails, singing with the band, greeting customers, and signing autographs. During the day, she takes care of little Benjie, swims in the pool, Nunnally Johnson (speaking of a movie magnate's son-in-law): He's done very well, indeed, for a young man who's had only his talents to depend on.

helps Cole design suits, and checks her brother on how things are progressing in her investment company.

A fan who dropped in for a salad at The Trails and asked Esther whether she wanted a boy or a girl for a second child was told, "We'll take anything we can get. We were so thrilled about having a boy that anything now will be a bonus."

Esther will have her next baby just as she had Benjie. She will check into the Santa Monica Hospital early in December where she will be given an analgesic. She will be asleep when the child is delivered. When she awakes, her child will be in the same room with her or in an adjoining partition. This is known as the rooming-in system of confinement.

It's been used in Holland for decades and several years ago, the Massachusetts General Hospital introduced it here.

Supposedly, it has an excellent psychological effect upon the mother, since for the length of the confinement it never severs the mother-child relationship.

Shirley Temple, who was also confined by Dr. Bradbury, had little Linda with her almost from the time she was wheeled out of the delivery room until she arrived home.

Esther will also have a television set in her hospital room. During her confinement with Benjie, she tuned the set in one night and got husband Ben. In honor of his first son, he was singing "Sweetest Little Fellow, Mighty Lak a Rose."

"I couldn't help it," Esther says. "I cried. It just broke me up."

This time, the arrival of Esther's second child may break up once and for all those irresponsible rumors about her and Ben. If ever two people were perfectly mated—those two are Ben and Esther Gage. They know it, and they know what it takes to make a marriage work.

You a teen-ager? Then read this—a monthly feature especially for you.

I'M just plain mad. And I hope I stay mad until I get what I have to say off my chest. There are thousands of teen-age boys in this country I'd like to shake.

It's the necking situation or, as most of you kids call it, parking. I've had hundreds of letters about it from nice, sensible, intelligent girls and I've been wondering how to get the message across. Then I decided that I'd devote this month's column to speaking directly to you boys.

Here's how one girl wrote, "I'll go out with a very nice boy. We'll have a good time at the movies or skating or something. Then the boy will park the car and try to kiss me. This embarrasses me and I don't like it. But I don't want to be a prude. I wish you'd tell me if parking is necessary to a nice evening."

Well, the answer is no, it is not necessary. And you know what I think? I think you boys try it just to be smart, so you can boast about what great big men you are to the other boys. Or maybe you think the girl expects it. Well, take my word for it, she doesn't. She would be a lot happier and like you a lot more if you would take her home after a date, walk with her to the door and say good-night.

And while I'm on "walking to the door" subject I'd like to say that I had ten letters this month from girls who asked, "Shouldn't a boy walk you to your door after a date?"

Well, of course he should! It's just plain rude for him to let you scramble out of the car by yourself, find your key, maybe on a dark front porch and let yourself into the house.

I had that happen to me—but just once. We live on top of a hill. The garage is below the house and there are thirty steps leading down to it. Well, the boy I was with just pulled into the garage, said, "Good-night, Joanie" and let me get into the house as best I could. Know what happened? I've not been out with that boy again.

BUT back to the parking situation. Look at it this way, boys. Sometime you'll get married. Will you want a wife who has been kissed by every kid she ever went out with?

A lot of girls have written to say, "If I don't let the boy park I'm afraid he won't take me out again." And one girl wrote, "I had a first date with a boy who seemed very nice. We went skating and had a lot of fun. At least, I had fun and I thought he did, too. Then he wanted to drive out on a lonely road and when I told him to take me right home he never asked me for another date."

All I've got to say to that boy is, "Shame on you." A girl puts herself out to be charming and gay and just because she doesn't like to drive out on the lonely road you don't see her again. You know how that makes her feel? It makes her think, "Why he doesn't like me at all. He doesn't find me attractive. He wants just any girl he can neck with. So what's the use of trying to look nice and be attractive if I sit at home while the girls who will park get all the dates."

Just for one minute put yourself in the girl's place. When you stop seeing her because she won't park you have given a cruel blow to her ego. Or—and this is worse—you have made her say, "All right. I'll play it their way. I'll make a trade. I'll string along." And that makes for bitterness and toughness.

The word "nice" doesn't mean "stuffy." Nice means "kind, friendly, considerate." So the nice girls stay at home knitting while the tough, wild girls get all the dates. This just isn't fair.

Take my word for it, boys, you're not being smart at all. As a matter of fact, you're just being extremely silly and juvenile. For let me say again, girls actually do not like the parking routine. And if you're doing it for the girl's benefit to show her what a big sophisticated man you are you're making a mistake. For she just isn't impressed. Or she's impressed the wrong way.

There, I've said it and I'm glad and I'm not quite so mad as I was. What cheered me up was opening a few more letters to find that not all boys are like this. For example, one boy wrote, "How should a boy act when he is out with his date? Should he try to out-do himself, take her to the best place in town or let her decide where you should go?" Now there's a kid who is really considerate.

You know how much money you have to spend so you should make the decision. It's embarrassing for a girl when a boy says, "Where shall we go? You decide." Because the girl doesn't know whether he has just enough money for the movies or enough to go dancing at some swank place. So he should give her a choice in his price range. For example, he could say, "Would you like to go to the movies or go bowling or skating?" All these cost about the same.

If it's a real big, heavy date—like a dancing date—he should tell her this in advance so she'll be properly dressed.

HERE's another little item I'd like to take up with the boys. I had a letter from a girl who said, "Do you think it right when you go on a double date for one boy to talk just to one girl? The other evening I double-dated and I honestly don't know why because the other boy didn't speak to me even once all evening."

In the first place the boy was rude and in the second place he doesn't understand the idea of the double date. The talk and fun should be general and after all, four of you have agreed about where you're going then all should enter into the activity. But, boys, don't carry this too far by playing up to the other girl just to make your date jealous. It embarrasses not only your girl but the other one as well, since she can't give you the lecture you obviously need when there are these other people around.

In fact, I don't see any reason for that silly business that both boys and girls try. I mean the jealousy routine. What does jealousy or the pretense of jealousy prove?

A boy I know is always trying to make me jealous by talking about another girl. He tells me how pretty she is and what a big career she is going to have. Know what I do? I agree with him. And you know what happens? There just isn't any argument. When the boys try to get a rise out of us by flattering other girls the smartest thing to do is to say, "Yes, yes, isn't she wonderful?" That will surprise him so much he'll change the subject fast!

Honestly, it's too much trouble to be in a big turmoil all the time. Why can't everybody relax and be simple and natural? Why can't people just have a good time on dates without being rude or trying to assert their own individuality? Why not stop thinking about yourself for awhile and think about the girl you're with and what makes her happy? You'd enjoy yourself a lot more if you would.

HERE are some questions on different subjects, but before I go on I want to thank you for being so nice and friendly to me and for believing that maybe I can help. I'd give anything if I could answer every letter personally. I read every letter but if I answered them all I'd be doing nothing else but, and it seems I'm under contract to Mr. Samuel Goldwyn who keeps me pretty busy.

"Dear Joan: What did you do to lose baby fat?"—R. H., Bronx, N. Y.

For five days this was my diet: An egg and one piece of thin-sliced, slightly buttered toast for breakfast. For lunch a fruit salad or cottage cheese and pineapple. For dinner either a small steak or lamb chops, celery, sliced tomatoes and one green vegetable. I lost five pounds that way. Now I am just careful—no sweets, no potatoes, no bread and butter. Then I did stretching exercises—not exercises to make you muscular but to make you lithe. Good posture makes you seem slim. When I see someone I haven't seen in quite a little while I'll hear, "Why Joan, you've grown taller." I haven't grown so much as half an inch in over a year. It's just that I carry myself better than I did. Try my method, it works.

"Dear Joan: Due to illness I was kept back a year in school. Now I'm in high school—first year. I'm a year older than everybody else and I feel strange. Boys a year younger than I am seem like babies."—J. L., Butte, Montana.

Isn't it funny about problems? Yours is just the reverse of mine. I skipped eighth grade so in my first year in high school I was a year younger than everybody else. What I did was to find my social contacts outside the school. Can't you do the same? Discover your own age group through church activities or, perhaps, you could join some young persons' club. Or—and maybe this is the best suggestion of all—could you get a teacher to work with you after school and evenings and make up the year you lost so you can catch up and join your own age group?

"Dear Joan: Every time I take a girl out she starts talking about going steady. I don't want to go steady. What should I do?" —C. R., Birmingham, Ala.

I have just been giving the boys a lecture so now I guess it's time to give one to the girls. As I've said many times I think going steady for teen-agers is wrong. I can't imagine a girl bold enough to suggest to a boy that you go steady. That's the boy's place. If I were you, C. R., I'd just explain to the girls that you're not old enough to go steady and that getting serious at our age is foolish.

"Dear Joan: How do you tell a boy you can't go to a certain place without seeming a prude? After the show the boy wants to take you to a place to eat. But the place is your parents out-of-bounds region. How can you convince him not to go there without scaring him away?"—P. T., Winnipeg, Canada

So many problems would be solved if we would all just tell the truth. All you have to do, honestly, is to tell the boy that your parents do not want you to go to this particular place and you're sure they have good and valid reasons. There must be other places to eat, places your parents would okay. Then if he insists on going to the out-of-bounds place you can be sure that your parents are quite right and it's not a good place. I believe that if two people can talk out a problem, if both sides can be heard that there is always a solution.

"Dear Joan: I will go out with a boy and like him a lot. Then he will start to like me and I find I don't like him. What should I do?"—L. M., Tampa, Florida.

The trouble with you is you're fickle. You must have a straight talk with yourself. I can't answer your problem. Only you can answer that. You must ask yourself some questions. You must find out why you go cold on a boy the minute he begins to like you. That's a fault in your nature. I always advise talking a situation out. This time you have to talk the problem out with yourself.

Thanks again, for listening.

Editor's note: Do you have a teenager problem? If so, tell it to Joan. Write to Joan Evans, Box 93, Beverly Hills, California.

HOLLYWOOD, HERE I COME

While working as a salesman for a Philadelphia advertising firm, Dan Duryea spent a weekend with friends in Syracuse. He took part in making a backyard amateur movie there. Turning on all the charm he had, Duryea flung himself whole-heartedly into the enterprise. The next time he visited Syracuse, the picture was projected for him. Looking at it he brooded about the same things any other man worries about at such a time—whether he seemed gawkish and amateurish; whether or not his hairline was receding. Suddenly with a sinking feeling in the pit of his stomach, he found himself worrying about something else. Despite the charm he slathered on, the pictured Duryea he saw was a punk he wouldn't have staked to a cup of coffee if he'd found him starving on the street. Through some freak of physiognomy, plus his ability—so hair-triggered that he cannot always control it—to let his projected personality change him into an ugly duckling, he had arrived on that screen looking unlovely and unlovable.—(Pete Martin, from Hollywood Without Makeup)

But that was almost a year ago. Now, late in 1950, Kirk Douglas, playboy, hit and run artist in romance, the lad as fast with a rhumba as Cugat and as anxious to learn as a young Casanova, looks as if he's in love.

To Kirk Douglas' friends and advisers this is a situation that wasn't anticipated and which, if the tenor of their conversations is legitimate, has all the earmarks of a catastrophe similar to the fall of the Roman Empire, or the occasion upon which Lana Turner did not marry Victor Mature, thereby throwing the entire machinery of Hollywood romance out of kilter for a month.

For Kirk Douglas to marry now, his associates feel, would throw a kink in his career that would slow it down to an amble. For him to take a vow to love one woman and one alone at a time when literally millions of lasses from fifteen to eighty-five want him, and are willing to spend fortunes to sit in dark theaters and pant in anticipation of the day he comes walking down their street and into their lives, would be disaster number one to dreams of the golden years ahead.

But there is nothing they can do about it. According to those in the know, the tiny arrow of Cupid has penetrated his heart and Irene Wrightsman McEvoy, the lady involved, has a ball and chain resting in a dark closet waiting for the day she can weld it onto his manly ankle. The only question is, will Kirk hold still while the job is done, or will he suddenly fly away, abandon the love that burns within him and dash back to the cache where his little black book has been buried?

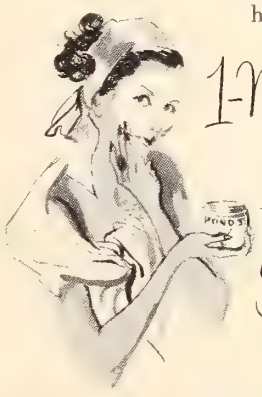
His press agent would have you believe the latter.

"We've spent too much time and effort in building Kirk up as a big romantic interest," says he, "to have it all torn down by a thing like marriage."

But Irene McEvoy has just signed a two-year lease on an English-style rambling home in Brentwood. The house is nice enough to be a honeymoon cottage.

Kirk Douglas has lived for several years in a home in Laurel Canyon, just a dozen blocks up in the hills from Hollywood Boulevard. If you've ever seen pictures of the place, you know what it is like. A bachelor's dream. Small, not too accessible, not safe for babies and much too ruggedly furnished for a bride. The Brentwood house is, on the other hand, too large for a single woman, ideal for entertaining—and has a built-in nursery. It is quiet and private. Just the place for a man to start a family. It adds up.

Also, there's a situation. A situation in which a fellow who hits the high spots nightly with a different girl, suddenly puts on the brakes, and a head-waiter never sees him—and in which a girl, reported engaged to a fellow named Robert Stack, suddenly loses his address and begins spending all her waking hours with another fellow named Kirk Douglas.



Actually, this is nothing new for either of the people involved. Kirk sometimes courts girls for, well, almost a month. Evelyn Keyes is probably the record-holder. Irene went steady with Bob Stack for more than a year. Both, to a degree, are capable of staunch loyalties to the opposite sex. The degrees, however, are quite individual. Irene, since her divorce from Mr. McEvoy, has been the soul of more than one or two other fellows. Kirk, on the other hand, has proven by his actions and firm statements on the subject since his divorce that he is as active in the love department as a buck goat alone in a herd of anxious nannies.

And when Kirk Douglas leaps the fence and begins bleating in one pasture, it would seem almost too apparent that he is in love.

At the time of this writing, Kirk Douglas is working on location some twenty miles outside Gallup, New Mexico, making the picture Ace in the Hole. And also, at this moment, Irene Wrightsman McEvoy is sitting a short distance away from where Kirk is acting, underneath a big sun umbrella which is set up for her every day so she can be with Kirk every possible moment. This gesture of permitting a woman to sit on a set and watch a star act is, in the profession, about as rare as an Iowa farmer bringing his lady a string of priceless pearls every time he comes a'calling. There just ain't no greater compliment—nor is there a greater evidence of devotion possible in Hollywood. Kirk Douglas has never allowed it before, and it is a cinch that Irene McEvoy never cared enough for a guy to swelter in a desert for thirty solid days.

Irene's day begins at breakfast with Douglas, and no other member of the company is encouraged to join them. They ride, hand in hand, to the day's location. Irene takes her seat under the umbrella and watches, seldom taking her eyes from Kirk. At every break in the action, Kirk comes over and joins her—and they hold hands. They lunch alone, then back to the umbrella for the afternoon session of mutual admiration and acting. They dine alone, and afterward, they slip off to watch the moon do tricks with the cactus.

Yes, this is the kind of devotion that, it appears, will either wind up in marriage or at least one broken heart.

And Kirk Douglas has changed. He is a newly-inhibited man. To realize this you need only go back to a few months ago when Kirk bumped into a magazine photographer in front of a popular night club. The photog asked if he would pose for an exclusive picture.

"Sure," said Kirk, "anything you want."

"How about swinging around that pole?" said the photog jokingly, pointing to a bus stop sign.

Kirk asked his date, Evelyn Keyes, to stand out of harm's way for a moment, and obliged. The cameraman showed his astonished editor the picture the next morning and was almost accused of using a gun to get the shot.

A solid dozen photogs got another beauty one night at Ciro's when Kirk obligingly joined a tumbling act on the stage and held still while the boys popped their bulbs. When he had a date with a girl and a writer came to his table in a club for an interview or a quick question, Kirk obliged with a smile. When the cameramen came over, he would kid his date into smiling pretty for the boys and he himself never lost his grin or good humor.

But that's past.

Today, when Kirk Douglas takes his girl on a date, he takes her some place where there will be no cameraman. If he does take her to one of the strip hot spots to see a show, he's as wary of what he does and says as a jewel thief in a pawn shop. Pictures, if they can't be avoided, are taken, but if there's a way out, Kirk wants it. He wants privacy in the little world he has with Irene.

Let's take a look at the romantic records of these two and their backgrounds.

Kirk, as is widely known, came from a family in very modest circumstances. He worked his way through college, slung hash, wrestled in carnivals, did almost every menial thing a man can do to earn a living and remain self-respecting. How many times he has been in love is anybody's guess. However, when it came time to marry, he was not only very particular in the choice of a bride in the normal sense, it seems that he wanted a woman who could bring into his life some of the background and culture that had been missing. It may have been an accident that his wife was society and of good family, but that may have been one of the things that made him fall in love with her enough to marry her.

This marriage did good things for him. He became used to the niceties of well-bred living and, in his private life, it shows. Although his wife was an actress, she was also welcome in the homes of the social registrites and actually she was a far cry from the garden variety actress. It is to be expected that when Kirk Douglas marries again he will look for someone with the same brand.

Irene McEvoy is that type. An heiress to a fortune, she is beautifully educated and a lady to her fingertips. If she shares that honeymoon cottage with Kirk, she will be able to offer him graceful living. While her former husband has been called an international playboy, it is evident from the company he keeps abroad these days that he plays in the most select circles. In her only other well-known romance—with Bob Stack—she was not stepping out of character or consorting with the kitchen help. Stack is a wealthy lad, and a member of one of the coast's bluest-blooded families.

There is one thing, though, that must be reckoned with—that sly old devil Time. Unless Kirk chooses to dash across the Mexican border and take a chance, as others have done, on a shaky Mexican marriage, he is not going to marry anyone for several months, until the divorce decree from his former wife becomes final. Time has been known to thwart the best-laid plans. Quarrels that after marriage become something trivial to be dissipated with a kiss, sometimes take on a guise of major importance when the bonds between two people are not cemented by marriage—and pouf goes a good love.

None of this may happen to Kirk Douglas and Irene McEvoy. But, of course, there's no way to be certain. Kirk is notoriously close-mouthed about his love life.

He was interviewed by Modern Screen shortly after he was separated from his ex-wife. He was asked, naturally, if there was to be a divorce. His answer was short and to the point. "I won't talk about it," he said. "I just won't talk about it." Some months later, when it seemed everyone was certain that there was to be a divorce, although even then some columnists were not too sure, for they predicted a reconciliation, Kirk was asked the same question. His answer was, "I won't talk about it."

The point is that upon both occasions Kirk Douglas knew his marriage was ended. At the last interview it is a fact that a property settlement had been made, grounds charged, and all the details of a dissolution of a union involving children done away with. It could have done no harm to admit it, but Kirk Douglas wouldn't talk. And won't now.

So there you have it. The case of the suspicious romance. The case of the honeymoon cottage. The case of the rare devotion. The case of the newly-inhibited man. If you think it adds up to the case of the bride and groom—you'll have to wait a while to prove it. The End stag night in the steam room

"Aw, let him out," said Tony. "Maybe he can play gin-rummy."

"With you?" said Scott. "He's better off where he is."

"Hey, fellas!" screamed John, and they let him out.

Draped in sheets, the boys sat around and played cards. Scott lost a quick round of gin rummy to Tony, and gave up his hand to Hugh O'Brian.

"I've had enough of this guy," said Scott. "Played with him for 16 weeks while we were making Shoplifter, and didn't win a hand."

"One thing's sure," said Hugh. "In this joint, at least, he won't have any cards up his sleeves."

"Gin," said Tony.

"Why don't you go back to Brooklyn?" Scott asked Tony. "With your brains you could make a million running a card parlor."

"Naw," said Tony. "I'll stick with you. Couple more pictures together and I'll be wearing mink."

"Okay, sweetheart," said John Bromfield. "Deal me in."

WHILE John was being shellacked by Tony, everyone else was getting alcohol rubdowns. (Alcohol closes the bather's pores and prevents him from catching cold when he goes out into the normal temperature of the street.) Finlandia's two masseurs, Kaarlo and Richard, who've been there so long they're practically water-proof, worked over us.

"I believe I'd rather catch my death," said Scott, as Richard wrapped him up in a sheet and started to fan him dry.

"You don't have the right attitude," Rock Hudson yelled from the next rubbing room, where Kaarlo was massaging Hugh O'Brian's back. "Take a look at this boy."

Scott peered over the partition, and said, "He looks like he's dead."

"Superior ability to relax," Hugh mumbled, as the masseur pushed his nose into the pillow. "Mind over matter."

"Like I said," Scott replied, "you look dead."

"Treat him with respect," said Tony coming in on the tail-end of Scott's remark. "Know what this guy does for a hobby?"

"Yeah," said Scott. "He makes pictures. Rocketship X-M, starring Hugh O'Brian. I can get you tickets."

"Listen, dope. He's the athletic instructor for 17 of the most beautiful dolls in Hollywood. Works out with them three times a week."

"My old pal, Hugh," said Scott. "Why didn't you tell me, Hugh?"

Hugh shrugged his free shoulder, and smiled.

"Up at the 'House of the Seven Garbos,'" said Tony. "You know, the boarding house for models. The girls wanted to exercise. So Hugh was kind enough to donate his time and effort. Would you be kind enough?"

"Smart enough, you mean," said Scott. "I get my exercise boxing with my brother."

JUST then Sam Amundsen came in to announce that lunch was ready. One of the reasons Finlandia is so popular is proprietor Sam. He likes to please his customers. He'll not only have them steamed, rubbed down, and wrapped up, but if they come in parties, he'll order a snack from the Scandia restaurant across the street. The snack for us turned out to be huge cuts of roast beef, turkey, ham, Scandinavian cheese and plenty of potato salad. Along with this went fruit juice, soda and beer.

For a little while everyone was silent. Then, after the last few slices of meat were polished off we went back to the dressingroom for a nap.

"The steam will get rid of the poisons in your body," Sam tells his guests. "And a rub down will loosen up your muscles. But there's nothing more refreshing on earth than a half-hour's sound sleep. At least, it never hurt anyone."

Everybody dropped off except John Bromfield and Tony Curtis.

"Going on a fishing trip," said John. "Me and Corinne. You know Corinne."

"I'm crazy for Corinne," said Tony.

"My wife!"

"Calm down," pleaded Tony. "It's hopeless."

"Better be," said John threateningly. "Anyway, we'll both be free from work for the first time in six months. When I finished The Furies, Corinne started Irma Goes West. Now we're keeping our fingers crossed about sudden assignments. Going up to Lake Mead. You know, the bass up there are more than a foot long—practically jump into your boat."

"I'll believe that when I see the pictures," laughed Tony.

"Wise guy," John said grimly.

"Okay," Scott called, "Pipe down."

"Get that guy," said John, crawling onto a cot. "Fifteen minutes in a steam room and he can't keep his head above the water. Fifteen measly minutes. . . ." And the sandman swooped down over Finlandia.

linda christian

(Continued from page 41) he had no right to ask her to make such a sacrifice. He knew, too, from acute personal experience what two acting careers will do to a married couple.

In Linda Christian, he had a girl who wanted, and still wants, five children. She was the only girl Ty loved who was honestly enthusiastic about renouncing her other life simply to share his.

"June, '49," Linda wistfully recalls, "when I came home from the doctor's office in London and told Tyrone that I was pregnant, you should have seen him. He was so happy he almost jumped through the ceiling. He started to devise a detailed savings plan so that enough money would be set aside for the child's education. . . . He wouldn't let me lift anything heavier than a water glass. . . . He decided with my approval that the baby was going to be a boy and we'd call it Tyrone Power, Jr. . . . He did all the things new fathers are supposed to do.

"He was so happy I can't tell you. And because he was, I naturally was happy, too. That's all I want, all I ever want, to make Tyrone happy.

"But then, after four months of pregnancy, they took me to the American Hospital in Paris, and I lost the baby, and I cried and cried. I knew what it meant to Tyrone, and thinking of him and what happened, it made me feel worse. But the doctor said I was all right and that I could have other babies and that gave us hope."

AFTER Linda lost her baby, the Powers came home to California.

Deeply hurt, trying to forget, hoping for the future, Ty threw himself into his work. He needed a rest—he had made The Black Rose in Morocco, and Prince of Foxes in Italy, but he wanted no time to think, no time to brood over his great disappointment. He was cast opposite Susan Hayward in Rawhide, his first non-location picture in almost two years.

When he finished that one, and Darryl Zanuck asked him if he'd like to go to the Philippines to star in American Guerrilla, he said, "Sure, I'd love to go."

People began asking, "Why all this travel? What is Ty trying to run away from, himself?"

But Ty wasn't running away from anything. In fact, he was the happiest man on earth. Life was running to meet him. Linda was pregnant again. At last, he'd have that baby. Boy or girl? He didn't care which.

It took thirty hours, this past spring, to fly from California to Manila, but Ty didn't even seem tired after his long air journey. One of the advance men who met him at the airport says, "He seemed buoyed up by some inner secret. The very evening he landed, he appeared at a benefit for the Philippine Community Chest. The next day he flew by chartered plane to the summer capital at Baguio to pay his respects to President Quirino. Then he flew back to Manila, and served as host at a reception we gave for the various politicians and business men. Linda joined him, and we didn't know she was pregnant at the time, but we should have suspected something, because he took such wonderful care of her.

"For example, we shot the picture at Subic Bay, at the U.S. Naval Station there. It's about seventy miles north of Manila. The station consists of a lot of quonset huts.

"Ty and Linda had a whole quonset hut for themselves. Ordinarily, twenty-two men sleep in one quonset hut, but Ty was taking no chances with Linda. He wanted her to be happy and careful, but break the bank

a modern screen quiz

Bert Parks, sparkling m.c. of radio's Break the Bank quiz show (NBC—Wednesdays at 9 p.m.—EST), suggested this puzzler for Modern Screen readers. See how well acquainted you are with some of Hollywood's best-known names. The answers are on page 90.

1. Four stars have the same last name, beginning with letter P; three female stars have the same last name, starting with letter R. Name them: ..... P....., ... P....., ... P....., ... P....., ... R....., ... R....., ... R.....

2. Some names have been repeated through Hollywood history, although the bearers may not be related to each other. Name the bearers, past and present, of each of these names: Dana, Mason, Lamarr, Young, Haver.

3. Five male stars have the same name, beginning with letter D. Who are they? ..... D....., ... D....., D..... ....., ... D....., D..... .....

4. Louise Hovick is the real name of: Lois Albright, Wanda Hendrix, Gypsy Rose Lee

5. His parents named him Guenther Schneider, but Hollywood dubbed him: E..... A.....

Linda is an adventurous girl, you know."

While American Guerrilla in the Philippines was being shot around Subic Bay, Linda grew bored. There was little to do around the Naval Station. She didn't want to interfere with the making of the picture, to be one of those Hollywood "set" wives who spend all their spare time watching their husbands perform.

With Bill Gallagher, a distant cousin of Ty's who acts as his business manager, she began making various side trips by plane around the south Pacific. On one such flight, she and Bill flew to Bali. On another, they winged to Hong Kong.

Here, in this British crown colony jammed with rich Chinese refugees, Linda learned that she had lost her second child.

"I WENT to a doctor in Hong Kong for a checkup," she says. "You know how it is when you're pregnant—you see a doctor every few weeks.

"I wanted to make sure that everything was in good order. We wanted this baby so badly. So I went to this doctor, and he examined me, and then he told me the terrible news. 'Mrs. Power, your child can never be born. It's dead.'

"I was stunned. I couldn't believe it. I couldn't believe it was true. No! Not another miscarriage. What should I do? How would I tell Tyrone?

"I realized that I needed excellent medical care and needed it quickly. I flew back to Subic Bay and told Tyrone, and he put me in the U.S. Naval Station Hospital at once, and they removed the dead child, and I was in the hospital three days. Then the company moved back to Manila, and by that time I was recovered, and I went with them."

Micheline Prelle, the French actress who stars opposite Ty in American Guerrilla, says that Ty tried not to let this latest misfortune affect his work and that by sheer force of will-power he succeeded.

Other members of the company say, "It was a tough break and everyone knew it. We all sympathized with the guy, but what good is sympathy at a time like that? We were darn glad we had finished up and were going home."

Now, oddly enough, when Ty returned to Los Angeles after the picture was completed, Linda didn't come with him. Instead of flying back with him, she took off in a plane that was going in the opposite direction, Bangkok, India, Cairo, Rome, the Netherlands, and London. She wanted to see her father in Holland, and she wanted to meet Ty in London where she knew he was scheduled to open on July 18th in the stage play, Mr. Roberts.

WHEN TY hit Hollywood and his friends sympathized with him about Linda's second miscarriage, he accepted their condolences politely and quickly.

Once again, he sought escape from tragedy in work. He flew to New York and rehearsed Mr. Roberts. Then he flew to London where he proved to be more popular than ever before in his career.

Ty is scheduled to stay in London until December. After that, he will probably make a picture somewhere else in Europe.

As for Linda, she hopes to stay by his side. She knows what people who were jealous of her marriage to Ty are saying back in Hollywood. They're saying that without children she hasn't a chance in a million of holding her handsome hero, that without children her marriage is headed for the rocks.

She accepts such gossip stoically. She got married to have a family and raise it, and she's determined to do both.

"I've lost two children," she says, "but I'm still young, Tyrone is still young, and there is still time." THE END

Never a lean, long, dark fellow with a La Jolla accent. Impressed me, though, the way you managed to retain that hungry look throughout the whole picture."

Hungry? That didn't take much acting. Just a little memory . . .

Ten years and the menu has changed. Steak and apple pie. Cold cuts and Danish pastry. Eggs and bacon—any time, anywhere. Ten years, and he doesn't even need a name, his face is so familiar. There it was in Spellbound, The Yearling, Duel In The Sun, in Gentleman's Agreement, Twelve O'Clock High, in the lobby of Radio City's Music Hall . . .

But the ten-year marker, Captain Horatio Hornblower, was gathering dust on the shelf. Where was the man who was man enough to play the Captain?

He was thinking of going to Europe to make a movie. Now he had a family to join him there—Greta and the two boys, and Greta was expecting. "Go ahead," she told him, "I'll meet you there." Greg decided to call off the trip because he didn't want to leave a brand new baby alone at home.

Warners searched around for a role. They called a writers' conference and sat up all night, and worried all day, but it didn't do any good. Then someone remembered Horatio and the rush was on. Ivan Goff and Ben Roberts went to work to get the script ready for shooting in London. Top brass came over and hovered about them. The wives of the top brass made sandwiches, and Steve Trilling brought them coffee and baked beans. Greg sat around reading the pages as they fell out of the typewriter. Reading them and getting the plot confused with the picture of a character sitting in a rooming house wondering whom they'd pick to play the part . . .

And here was the answer, ten years in coming—he and Greta were on their way to England to bring Horatio to life. Horatio Hornblower? Horatio Alger on the glory road . . .

The Pecks returned to Hollywood this summer, to their ranch house, to the life a star and his family lead.

But he hasn't forgotten the beginning. The La Jolla Playhouse is a witness, his brainchild, and Mel Ferrer's. At La Jolla experienced actors work with stagestruck kids, guiding them, helping them learn, keeping their flame alive.

He and Mel are planning a Beverly Hills Theater group, together with Charles Boyer, John Garfield, Dorothy McGuire, Rosalind Russell, Jerry Wald. They're trying to raise $3,000,000 to build a theater, the start of a small Radio City. They want to establish a dramatic school and provide scholarships so that young actors can jingle some change in their pockets and buy a hamburger whenever they want one, so that they can walk into a theater without first stabbing the usher.

This is it, the plan that took root ten years ago. The plan that won't be forgotten because a long, lean guy is full of memories about all the yesterdays.

"Not thinking of becoming an actress, are you, Arlene?" a Lutheran minister, her cousin, asked a little sternly.

"An actress? No, sir. Not an actress . . ." But there it was. The word. Spoken. It sent the blood to her cheeks and burned her eyes. An actress . . . yes. . . .

Her mother and father knew. They watched her as she read plays to herself, mouthing each word. They left her in that world of her own. When she was a high school freshman she got an A plus on a paper she'd written about Katharine Cornell. For her teacher, reading between the lines, could see the adoration there. . . .

WHEN the Better Drama League of Minneapolis held tryouts for Tom Sawyer, Arlene was on hand, reading for the role of Becky Thatcher, getting the role.

At eleven, she'd fallen in love. No one could tell her, "You're too young." No one could laugh it off, because there she was—in love. And the boy said he loved her. They were chaperoned on their dates until she was sixteen, and then her mother told her to wait a while before she got married. Wait until the boy was twenty-one, and she eighteen. So they waited.

Arlene continued through high school as an honor student, winning her classmates' votes as the "Most Likely To Succeed," winning a trophy from the Bearcat Legion Post Band as the outstanding Drum Majorette, winning an art contest and a scholarship to a noted New York School of costume design. . . .

Arlene didn't accept the scholarship. Her mother had suffered a stroke a few years back and had become a semi-invalid. Arlene didn't want to leave her. She took some courses at the University, worked in a department store near home as a model, as a display assistant. And then her world began to crash. The boy she loved, didn't love her anymore. She was heartbroken, the pain lingered on for five years. . . .

Then her mother died. Shocked, bewildered, Arlene plunged into her studies and her work, clinging to the future.

A few more years went by and Arlene's father met a widow, the mother of three daughters. Laughter seemed to come easy to him again. Arlene met the daughters, and liked them. Once when all of them were having lunch together, Arlene suddenly turned to her father and said, "Why don't you two get married?"

Fair-skinned Mr. Dahl turned a little pink then stuttered, "Well, I've sort of been thinking along those lines."

On April 15, 1943, Arlene acquired a stepmother and three sisters.

When the International Sportsman's Show reached Minneapolis, Arlene became a bathing suit and sports togs model for it. Then she was invited to go along with the show to Chicago.

In Chicago, she was only 17 but the Charles A. Stevens store wanted her as fashion consultant and model. She telephoned her father. "Take the job," he said, "and do your best. I know you'll always make me proud of you." From Stevens she went to Marshall Fields as an assistant to an assistant buyer. Just after she started the job, the top buyer quit and she became an assistant buyer. She lived in an apartment with three other girls from Minneapolis—childhood friends, Grace Blackwell, Eve Bogard, Toby Thovsen.

ONE day the Patricia Stevens Modeling Agency called her. "How'd you like to go to Florida for a three months' free vacation? You can model enough to pay expenses." Arlene didn't know, but her roommates did. "You're going!" they said. Ethel Capp, titled Miss Photoflash, got the same offer and they went together.

In Florida they met George Abbott and J. J. and Lee Shubert, noted Broadway producers. Ethel told them of their ambitions and the men said, "When you come to New York, look us up."

Look them up! Broadway. Stardom.

They hurried back to Chicago, worked until they'd saved train fare and some over. Ethel had $75 over and Arlene $100. In New York, they registered at the St. Moritz Hotel in a $15.00 a day room and set out to see the promising producers. They couldn't get in to see George Abbott. The Shuberts were polite but they were going out of town. Milton Berle was sorry but his show was already cast. Everyone was sorry. Then Arlene was invited to a cocktail party where Felix Brentano was a guest. Arlene sang and Mr. Brentano invited her to his office. . . .

He was casting for Mr. Strauss Goes to Boston. And there she was—in it, singing, dancing. The musical was a hit in Boston. New Yorkers didn't care. It lasted only 12 performances on Broadway and Arlene was out of a job and nearly broke again. On the strength of the job, she'd supported Ethel (who hadn't managed to find one yet) and herself in an apartment on London Terrace.

She went to Walter Thornton to get more introductions to theater people. "I'll make you a top-flight model," he said, "but I can't introduce you to theater people." He gave her $300 and sent her to Vogue Magazine where she started posing at $15.00 an hour. Within three months she was making $30.00 an hour. She appeared in Revlon ads and was the Edelbrew Beer Girl of 1946—but not an actress.

THEN one day she read in Cue that there would be tryouts for 10 feminine roles for Questionable Lady. She raced over to the office but was one girl too late. The director liked her, though. He handed her a script, explained the character of the girl and her part in the story. Arlene read herself into the ingenue role and spent six weeks on the road working toward Broadway, but the company never made it.

If Broadway wouldn't take her, Hollywood did. She played opposite Dennis Morgan in My Wild Irish Rose. Immediately afterward she was offered an M-G-M contract and a role in The Bride Goes Wild. Then she became Red Skelton's leading lady, displaying a nice sense of comedy. Following this came a dramatic role in Reign of Terror. And she was a star—in The Outriders, Three Little Words, Watch the Birdie. An actress.

An unmarried actress, but not for long, they say, pointing to Lex Barker. "Lex?" she says, her eyes shining, "He's in Africa now and has been for six weeks."

In the meantime, there's Lew Ayres, Philip Reed, Col. Jo Perron, Turhan Bey.

Arlene lives in an attractive apartment near Roxbury Park with her cousin, Elena Dahl Syness, and her maid, Elizabeth Townsend.

Once a year she gives a big party.

"Christmas was the most wonderful, wonderful time of the year when I was growing up. We Norwegians celebrate for six weeks. We have a smorgasbord for a week before Christmas and we don't take down our Christmas tree until the end of January. So now I have open house about the 20th of December. I can't prepare all the wonderful Norwegian delicacies (although her friends rave about the way she cooks Norwegian meat-balls), but I've found that Scandia (A Sunset Strip restaurant) is really wonderful when it comes to catering for my smorgasbord, complete to boar's head with the red apple in his mouth for the centerpiece."

Suddenly she'll stop in her remembering. "I've been lucky," she'll say, and laugh it off. "Lucky enough to be in the right place at the right time. I had to worry about finances only once—when Mr. Strauss Goes to Boston folded. I was down to my last nickel when I appealed to Walter Thornton to help me get a job. I used to walk from 23rd Street to Central Park at 57th and back again because I didn't have even bus fare. My shoes wore out, too. Plenty of matchbook covers have been scotch-taped into my inner soles.

"BUT I'd never write home for help—not after all my father had done for me. Some youngsters have the challenge of poverty. I had the challenge of making my father proud of me for some achievement of my own. After all he'd provided the money for any kind of lessons I wanted to take, anything I needed to achieve my goal. I had to prove he was right when he said, 'I know you'll always make me proud of you.' "

And Minneapolis knew it, too. Arlene treasures a copy of "The Prophet" given her by her English teacher Mrs. Keyes. Inscribed in it is, "Please accept this with my admiration for what you were here at Washburn High, for what you are now and with best wishes for what you are going to be." A while back, the Misses Ward, three sisters who ran the Minneapolis dancing studio where Arlene studied for ten years, wrote to Arlene for advice about moving to Hollywood to open a studio. "Why don't you try it?" Arlene wrote back. "You're sure of at least one student!" So they moved to Hollywood and once a week Arlene goes over to their studio on Melrose Avenue for a ballet lesson, merely one of the many students the three teachers instruct. They're proud of her—the Misses Ward.

And her father, who lives in Santa Monica now, doesn't have to tell her how he feels. She knows—that lovely, lucky Dahl.

You've just never been introduced properly, that's all. You've been confused by the roles he's played. At the end of a day's work you expect him to carefully park his car in the family garage and, brief case in hand, stalk formally through the front door to bestow kisses on Mrs. Holden and the kids before strolling to his comfortable chair for a quiet reading of a conservative newspaper. Not Holden.

It's an even bet that after a day's work he'll call home an hour after the scheduled dinner hour and tell his wife he'll be tied up in a conference, while a bunch of studio laborers are ordering for him at the bar. And when he gets home, he will probably block the driveway with his car, rescue one kid from a tree, pile another on his shoulders and storm into his house howling, "Where the devil's my dinner?" And when he makes that phone call, he is scared to death of his wife, and for no other reason than he knows she is not going to believe him and might hit him with something when he finally does show up at home.

The assassination of Bill Holden's true personality was a great loss to the screen. It was a dastardly deed, in any event, part accident and part intent, forced on him by necessity—the need to earn money for his home and a few of the simple pleasures of life. This in combination with an odd contractual set-up, has kept his nose to the grindstone and that haunted, harassed expression on his face for so many movies he can't remember them all.

He got into pictures on a pass. Being tall, rugged, handsome and living in Pasadena, it was only natural that William Beedle (his real name) should give some portion of his thoughts to acting. He did. Not too much, but enough to make him spend a little time hanging around the Pasadena Community Playhouse. Movies were a world away—away over in Hollywood the other side of the mountains. Bill Beedle might never have taken the trouble to make the trip if somebody hadn't come and got him.

Columbia Pictures was going to make a film called Golden Boy. They needed a lad with a husky physique but with a face you could believe belonged to a violin player, and they wanted someone who had never been seen on the screen before. This was quite an order and, partly to keep the publicity boiling and partly to make sure they got a guy they could use again, the search sifted maybe five hundred potentials. Then an agent trotted Bill Holden into the casting office, and, like a follies girl pulling up her skirts for a chorus captain, Bill took off his shirt to show his muscles. The muscles were great, but what sold the man on Bill that day was the expression on his face.

The eyes were narrowed and inquisitive, the brow was furrowed in concentration, the mouth was full and looked as though it could tremble when a fiddle bow pulled a melancholy chord from a Stradivarius. This, thought the casting man, is the face of an artist and the body of a brute. A few more talks with other executives, a few more strip acts and Bill Beedle became Bill Holden, Golden Boy.

The picture was both an artistic and financial success. Holden, the critics said, is Golden Boy, but what does he play next? The studio couldn't drop the lad, he might go out and make a fortune on his own. It didn't want to keep him around eating his head off without working, so Columbia made a deal splitting half his contract with Paramount. Finally, one day, one of the studios needed a nice kid to marry a sweet girl in a picture and they handed the part to Bill. He did it so well, that he got another one, and another, and another until pretty soon it seemed he was playing all the nice young guys in the movies.

A MAN'S CLOSE friends are pretty good yardsticks to gauge the real character of the man himself. The first, and probably closest friend that Bill Holden made in Hollywood was Brian Donlevy. Bill's dressing room at Paramount was two doors away from Donlevy's and Brian was the biggest star on the lot. As he was walking past the great man's door one night, Donlevy called him in.

"Hey, kid," he called. "Come here."

Bill walked into the dressing room.

"Sit down," said Donlevy.

Holden dropped into a chair and Donlevy picked up a glass and poured him a drink, then he sank to a sitting position and looked intently at Holden.

"I understond we're going to work together in The Remarkable Andrew," said Donlevy. "Glad to have you on the show."

Donlevy studied him a while longer.

"You look okay," he said finally, "but I'll tell you one thing, kid, don't let these monkeys push you around. I'll help you all I can."

A friendship begun that day has done a great deal to develop the off-screen personality of William Holden. Most of the activities of his private life are as rugged as those of his friend. They're both fighters and as salty as brine in their talk when the occasion demands it.

When the war struck, the army took one look at that physique with the shirt off, peered into an ear and didn't see daylight on the other side and dubbed Bill Holden Private. He had made several pictures and it began to look as though the fans would buy the nice guy for a long time. On the strength of this, Bill had married Brenda Marshall, a girl to whom he wanted to give nice, expensive things. Induction to him was no worse than it was to anyone else, but, too, it was no better.

Bill Holden could have carried all the money he owned in his pocket the day he marched off. He had obligations which, on his army salary, were staggering. As in the case of other draftees, death was the only solution that made any sense. He was as patriotic as they came, but terrified at the situation he found himself in. If he had had it to do over again, he would have liked to have stayed in Pasadena and become a broken man because he couldn't have afforded to marry Brenda Marshall.

But, having played a fascinating army boy in I Wanted Wings, Bill Holden was not permitted to go through the run of the mill training given the average soldier, the army wanted him for morale and recruiting purposes—and Bill, the financial load piling higher and higher on his shoulders, sweated out the entire war working eighteen hours a day for Uncle Sam in the Good Will Department. And when they turned him loose there was a silver bar on his shoulder and fear of the future in his heart.

BILL sat in his agent's office and looked bleakly across the man's desk into the future.

"How are things in the picture business?" he asked.

"Lousy," said the agent. "Horrible. Industry's in a turmoil. Things look awful. Think I'll get into war surplus, myself."

"But I've got to work," said Holden.

"Hmmmm," said the agent. "Maybe we can get Paramount and Columbia to extend the contracts. . . ."

At that particular point Bill Holden would have sold his body to a medical school if it would have brought the right price.

"Anything," he said. "Anything so I can give my creditors something on account."

Under the hard, cruel pressure of immediate necessity the true personality of William Holden, and five years of his professional life, went down the drain.

It wouldn't be fair to the movie industry, Bill Holden, himself, or his advisers to say that there has been a deliberate plot to exploit him commercially to his own disadvantage. That is not quite true. He has been used, however, in a manner and in parts that have definitely tended to lower his artistic standing. He is regarded by directors as one of the finest actors in Hollywood. He has just been wasted on parts that would have suited a less competent performer. His salary, which is huge but by no means comparable to the take home pay of lesser performers and drawing cards, is low enough that he can be fitted into the cost of a minor production without straining the budget. And Hollywood, like most businesses, runs on a budget.

In every other activity in Hollywood but acting Bill Holden is a big man. As vice-president of the Screen Actors Guild he is a relentless agent for the rights of his fellow thespians, big and small. In negotiations with the heads of studios, he is a man to be feared for his daring and cleavage to the principles of his guild. In patriotic affairs he is a violent advocate of democratic Americanism and a stern foe of factions which tend to lean in any other direction. He is respected for his unswerving integrity in business dealing.

HE has a sense of humor that has never been photographed, and that is truly a pity. He has been so busy fretting in pictures that his laugh has seldom been heard. It is true to his character to put a bucket of water over a door he expects some elegant gentleman to open. If he has invited some important people to dinner, he is as likely as not to have his maid inform them at the front door that they have the wrong house, or the wrong date, and then drive off down the street to bring them back and explain the joke.

The next time one of his contemporaries feels moved to call him Mister Holden it might do well for them to remember that on a Sunday afternoon recently he drove an automobile, souped to the gills, a hundred and forty miles an hour on the flat bed of a dry lake near Hollywood. Nobody else in the movies has ever moved that fast on the ground. The next time you picture William Holden as a sterling young man walking into the boss's office to ask for a raise so he can buy a new suit, picture him, also, as he really is, storming up the side of a steep hill on a roaring motorcycle, gambling blood and bone for a thrill.

In most other matters, too, Bill Holden is more on the mad side than sober. A couple of years ago he needed a larger house. He and Brenda went shopping and she, being sensible about the matter, looked at places in their practical price brackets. One day Bill took her by the hand, led her to the car and drove to a swanky street in the most exclusive section of the San Fernando Valley. He stopped in front of a huge house, a mansion style home, and helped Brenda out of the car.

"Nice, isn't it?" he said.

"It's gorgeous," said Mrs. Holden, "but let's not look at it too long. Let's go look for a house to buy."

"We're through looking, honey," Bill said. "I just bought this palace."

They say he had to run into a neighbor's house for a glass of water to revive her on the curb. It may not have been that bad, but it was a shock she didn't get over for a long time. Now the place is loaded with antique early American furniture and is a show place. It was a crazy thing to do, but it was typical Holden.

TAKE, for instance, the Bill Holden poker parties. After sitting in a couple of games with neighbors, Bill decided he was ready to organize a game in his own home—and maybe pick up a buck or two on the side. He bought a fancy table, some fine chips, a set of comfortable chairs and, to his wife's protestations that the thing was becoming as expensive as a Las Vegas gambling joint, he offered the comforting explanation that with his talent with cards he'd have the money back in no time. Well, the crowd met six times. Bill lost an average of a hundred and fifty a night. His food bill that period ran into something representing the cost of opening a small restaurant—and in a howling rage at four o'clock one morning Bill dragged all the equipment out to the garage where it has been gathering cobwebs ever since.

The morning that Bill shoved into the head man's suite at Paramount and said that the fellow at the guild meeting calling him Mister was the last straw seems to have been a turning point in his career. People on the lots who have known him for years are looking at him now in obvious awe.

"Hey, the guy can act," they say in great surprise.

Holden likes that. He likes the whole idea.

"Wait till you see Sunset Boulevard," he said happily, on this particular day in his dressingroom. "I play a real rat. A monster. Man, I loved it. In Union Station, I'm a good guy—but strong."

He reached for the phone and took the instrument off the hook, holding it in midair while he spoke.

"And you know what I do in Born Yesterday?" He chortled. "I steal this guy's girl right from under his nose—and I louse him up for keeps. That's for me from now on. Let some of the new boys play the clerks."

Dizzy with the new experience, he dialed the number of his home slowly. When the phone rang through, he answered it, and a rather bold expression, blended neatly with just a decent trace of fear shifted across his face.

"Hello, honey," he said to his wife. "I'm at a meeting in the studio. Ought to be home in half an hour or so." He winked, and hung up. "Let's have a little refreshment," he said. "We've got lots of time."

When we returned to the ranch to pack, there was a small silence. "Nice here," Guy remarked.

"Awfully."

"Maybe the ducks will stay in the backyard if we don't fix the fence tomorrow."

I laughed. "They'll have to." I could afford to laugh. I'd already talked to Mr. King about extending our reservations.

We are now two authorities on how overnight hunting trips can last a week. And we clung to our bows and quivers. One night Guy spotted a boar, took aim and shot. But all we found was the arrow. It had gone straight through the animal. We searched the woods, but the boar had disappeared.

A GOAT had the most cause for concern. Guy shot two. I got two. One dead. The other, very much alive, walked straight into my arms. It couldn't have been more than a few hours old when it wandered out of a thicket. "My wife brings 'em back alive," Guy told the Kings when we brought in our captive. I was ready to take it home to our backyard. However, no game is permitted to be taken off the island.

The evening before we left, we saw some familiar faces from Hollywood. C. B. Hilton (Nicky's brother) was hosting the Marshall Thompsons and Jane and Geary Steffen aboard his yacht, anchored in the harbor. They'd had a day of surfing and volley-ball.

"Come hunt," we invited.

"Not on your life," they laughed. "There's a square dance tonight." And they left for the Ranch's favorite weekly event.

Determined to have a last try for a boar, we were out practically all night. Luck wasn't with us. Dragging our feet to the door, Guy and I said goodnight to our hunting party.

The following morning we noted that they seemed terribly cheerful—or perhaps our faces were long by comparison.

"What a shame we didn't get anything," I consoled us.

"We did," came the reply.

"You went back out?"

"Not exactly." The answer was sheepish. "We went on up to the barn when we left you. There were two pigs. Practically on the front porch."

Things like this can drive hunters to fishing at the Sportsman's Lodge. But on the other hand, places like the Guest Ranch can keep guests on Catalina for months at a time. Guy had an appointment scheduled with his agent. And that's what brought us back to Hollywood. So we missed the barbecue that night, although our goats were guests of honor.

Now our friends say we sound like broken records because we go around declaring there's nothing like hunting on Catalina. And if our ducks will pardon the expression, it certainly beats fixing fences!

open house, open hearts!

"Both of us came from mortgaged homes," Betsy says. "And we weren't going to go through life the way our parents had, trying to meet the payments on the house. I didn't want to start our post-married life saddled by debt. I limited myself to the only three houses in Beverly Hills that we could afford to buy with our savings."

Betsy's selection narrowed down to two when she decided that a hillside wouldn't be a safe place to raise Kerry. Her ultimate purchase was based on the fact that she was buying from a doctor—Betsy feels doctors can be trusted—plus the fact that she was double-checking everything with Gene on the long-distance phone.

"Is the place termite-proof?" Gene would yell across the continent.

"I had the FHA assessor check everything."

"How about the taxes?"

"Not bad," Betsy would answer.

"What about storage space? Are there lots of closets and book shelves?" (Gene was dreaming of the day when he could spread out his belongings in something larger than a foot locker.)

"Lots of closets," Betsy shouted back, "also a basement, three old-fashioned bathrooms and four bedrooms."

"Sounds fine to me," Lieut. Kelly said. "Tell the man to wrap it up. We'll take it."

BETSY did. "Without Gene there, though," she says, "I had plenty of doubts."

One of her main misgivings was the drab appearance of the three downstairs rooms. They were painted a depressing green. Then, there were some French doors that made the living room look dated. Before she flew east to meet Gene in New York, Betsy hired a crew of painters to scrape the dull green off the woodwork and restore its natural color. She told them to paint the ceilings and walls a light beige with some good Dutch Boy paint, and then she ordered a clear red cotton bouclé carpet for the living room floor. "The problem of the French doors," she says, "I left for Gene."

Many movie stars hire a very chi-chi decorator to furnish their homes. As a result, the finished interior reflects only the personality of the decorator.

This isn't true of the Kellys. All the color schemes, every piece of furniture, every single accessory they own was selected by both of them.

The result today is a comfortable, informal house with emphasis on books, art objects, records, and flexible seating arrangements. "We moved into the house with nothing but books," Betsy recalls, "books, a trunk full of Gene's dancing shoes, and a mattress. We spent six months deciding how to furnish downstairs. We spent another six months trying out ideas."

The idea they experimented with in the living room was to keep the walls, ceiling and upholstery a neutral shade and to let accessories provide the splash of lively color. It turned out to be an excellent idea.

THE painting above the fireplace, for instance, is a carnival scene jammed with action and vivid colors. It's one of six paintings that Gene gave Betsy the first Christmas they moved into the house. Another item is the terra cotta Indian water jug they picked up on a motor trip one summer. Spotted at random throughout the house are framed playbills, family photographs, and the art work little Kelly executes in school. These accessories make the room interesting and warm.

The furniture in the house follows the same motif. With the exception of one chintz-covered chair, all the living-room pieces are covered in the same beige cotconversational group around the fireplace or set along opposite walls for charade teams. Some of Betsy's furnishings come right out of Sears Roebuck & Company, and she doesn't care who knows it. The rugs, which Betsy vacuums with her Hoover once a week, are a product of that world famous mail-order house.

On a level slightly lower than their living room, the Kellys have a combination bar and barbecue. Originally, this recreation room was separated from the living room by the French doors mentioned earlier. These doors did nothing but cut off the view of the backyard and shorten the living room. However, there they stood.

One evening Betsy, Gene, Lois, his secretary, and Stanley Donen, the Metro director, were sprawled on the red rug. They were wondering how to curtain the glass doors, when Gene suddenly jumped up and said, "Heck, I've never liked French doors, anyway."

In no time at all, he had taken out his tool box, unscrewed the door hinges and removed the doors, to everyone's immense delight.

LATER, a carpenter installed waist-high bookcases between the bar and the living room. Betsy bought some low, deep-cushioned couches, had them covered in navy plaid, and backed them against one of the bookcases. Gene built a rough-hewn lamp table out of an old board he found behind the garage. And because the floor covering in the bar is Armstrong linoleum tile and the only uncarpeted floor surface in the house, it's Gene's favorite spot for breaking in new dance routines—"thinking with his feet," Betsy calls it.

The Kelly dining room-den is another combine of two rooms merged into one. Both are furnished with early American reproductions. The same blue plaid wallpaper put out by Thibault covers both rooms. Unbleached muslin curtains are Dutch-hung over the window. Richard Whorf, the talented director-actor-painter, executed a primitive landscape which hangs on the dining-room wall. He signed it Grandma Whorf, 1871, because the Kellys have always yearned for but never owned a painting by Grandma Moses.

Of all the rooms in his house, Gene loves the big, uncluttered bedroom best. Professional decorators will tell you that blue is too cold a color for a bedroom, but the Kellys don't care. When the California sun seems unbearably strong and heat waves bounce off the rest of the house, the bedroom of soft gray-blue is always cool and restful. For Gene, who loves to sleep late, it's ideal.

One bedroom wall is covered with Colonial-type drawers and cupboards. More cupboards line another wall, and along the third side is an early American school bench. The single headboard behind their twin beds is made of antiqued wood and actually is a series of book shelves.

Over the years Gene has had lots of ideas for improving the family's living standards. When news of his Sunday afternoon volley-ball games spread, and he needed more athletic equipment for his guests, Gene converted the back hall closet into a series of sporting goods shelves. Now he has enough equipment stored away to supply a small YMCA, and he calls the closet the "Sports Palace."

He converted his den closet into a housing for his phonograph and record albums, and had a carpenter build a tall, shallow magazine rack for all the periodicals he never has time enough to read.

Betsy, too, is always on the lookout for decorating tricks that will fit in with the Kelly style of living. The style is contemporary, the mood is American. And the living is easy. THE END it comes up love

MEANWHILE Ida, the gayest Lupino, had not locked herself in her room. Romances lit up her life like Roman candles, and faded out the same way. One admirer went so far as to steal her automobile. He thought this would keep her nicely for himself. But there were other automobiles—and other men.

Finally, Ida met Collier Young, story editor, literary agent. And Howard was thinking of getting married to Ava, and Universal-International was thinking of co-starring Lupino and Duff in Woman In Hiding.

Turned out Universal had the best idea.

A few days after the picture started, Howard attended the opening of a new restaurant and met one of his writer friends.

"How's it going?" the writer asked.

"I haven't decided yet," said Howard.

"Well, you've been working on it for three days . . ."

"Oh, you mean the picture. The picture's fine."

"Sure I meant the picture. What else?"

"Nothing else," said Howard. "Nothing. Say—I've just met the most fascinating woman I've ever known in my entire life. Ida. Ida Lupino . . ."

Howard talked about her the rest of the night. Even so, a romance seemed a little silly. Ida was married to Collier (although there'd been separation rumors), and even in his wildest fantasies, Howard Duff had never wrecked a home. Besides there was Ava. Ava is not the kind of girl you throw away.

But she can be taken away . . . Frank Sinatra came along, and Ava sighed, "Goodbye, Howard . . ." The rumors about the Young-Lupino marriage stepped out of the rumor class and went to Reno. Then, only the two of them were left.

The two of them went everywhere. "There's Howard and Ida," friends would say. "They've just made a movie together." Romance? Ha. Howard was pining for a lost love, and Ida was shaken with the failure of her second marriage. To say nothing of the fact that these two didn't seem a match, on general principles.

OF course they were both unhappy. Why shouldn't they have been? The shattering of his one big romance left the introspective Howard moody and cynical. Ida had been through heartbreak before, and now again, she was getting the business. As for Howard and Ida going together like ham and eggs—did they have to, like ham and eggs? There are other combinations. Opposites do attract, and the attraction lasts when the differences between two people can be made to work for them both. Then, too, there are a couple of sentiments that Howard and Ida share—their attachments to their families, for one thing, their love of homelife.

Ida's an executive when she has to be, hard-boiled as they come. But when she doesn't have to be, she likes to relax. Howard's tired of the bright spots. When he walks into a nightclub, the music hits him, the hatcheck girl goes coy, and the smoke gets in his eyes. He'd rather be home. Often now, on Sunday evenings, Ida, Howard and both their mothers gather in a living room to watch television or to talk.

This would probably surprise a few people. "How do they get Ida to sit still?" they might wonder. They might be even more flabbergasted by this story:

One night Howard went over to Ida's house to pick her up, and Ida's mother answered the door. He followed her into the living room where several of Mrs. Lupino's friends were sitting around, talking. Howard joined them for a while, but he kept looking toward the door.

"Do you think Ida's ready yet?" he finally asked her mother.

"Oh, Ida's in the kitchen, Howard."

"Cook's night out?" he laughed.

"Well, yes. That's it exactly . . . go in, and see for yourself."

He went in, and saw for himself. There was his "date" up to her knees in pie crust, her face smeared with flour.

"That you, Ida?" he said, amazed, and for once, almost lost his balance on the kitchen stool.

"I'll be with you in a second," she grinned, filling the pie crust with beefsteak and kidneys. "The cook walked out," she said briskly, as if every time a cook walked out, Ida walked in.

"Guess you'll do," said Howard.

"Do for what?"

"Do for me . . ."

ANOTHER thing. Every Sunday night at five, Ida, who likes mysteries the way kids take to spinach, turns on the radio, and listens to detective "Sam Spade," alias Howard Duff. No one can speak to her; no one can touch the dial, until "Sam" signs off with the words "Goodnight, sweetheart."

What are the gossips waiting for? Here's a natural. It's simple, really. They're a pair who like being together. They always have a hundred things to talk about; they respect each other. He makes her calm, she teaches him how to lose his temper. He's becoming an extrovert, she's becoming intense. Does that sound like an impossible affair?

"My Ida seems very taken with Howard," her mother will tell you if you ask her. "We're all crazy about him."

That about sums it up. The clues are all here, maybe "Sam Spade" could tell you the end. Maybe it'll be a happy ending. Anyway, after Ida finishes Mother Of A Champion, she's going to England to visit some relatives. If Howard follows her there, the romance would seem too obvious to deny. It's too obvious even now, because no matter how you look at it, the picture comes out love. THE END

One day when I still was a WASP pilot, I was checking the weather for a proposed flight from Dallas to El Paso. The weather officer was briefing me with all known information on clouds, winds, and icing to be expected along the route. I'd been paying no attention to the Navy officer standing beside me, when suddenly he asked, "Think you can make it?" Suspecting the usual ribbing Army pilots get from the Navy, I was about to make a snappy remark when I looked up and recognized Lt. Robert Taylor. He'd simply been asking because he expected to fly the same route.

(Continued from page 35) experiencing their lives through constant association. I had mainly just been hearing about them, and my motherhood had been so distant as to be a guardianship, perhaps, but certainly not the warm, intimate relationship it should be.

Because of our studio commitments, Jess and I had to keep on working, so we couldn't change our mode of life too drastically. But I know now that with the next baby I'm going to take a year off and live my motherhood completely. My mistake was trying to do it second-hand. It just can't be done that way. Even then, though we still kept a nurse, we would bring the babies in with us more and more and try to live our lives all together. It gave me a chance to do something for them, but, more than this, it gave them a chance to do something for me. I don't know how they did it, these two, tiny beings who just looked up and smiled at me, but the wonder is they did.

They taught me to look at the world with more faith. If I came home discouraged, disappointed with humanity in general, perhaps, as can happen these days, I needed only one glance from their unworried, confident little eyes to wash out my doubts. They gave me courage. At first I was afraid to touch them, to bathe them, for instance, for fear I would do something wrong. They weren't fearful. They accepted my awkwardness, any sort of slip-up, with complete relaxation and indifference, seeming to say that they knew I would learn and come through, and I did.

They gave me a sense of responsibility I never had before. With every little gurgle or coo they seemed to tell me that they were very well pleased with their mother, very sure that she knew what she was doing, and what else was there left for me but to live up to their expectations?

The twins did more than this. Even before they could talk they enriched my life with little compliments. At first, when friends visited us and the babies were brought in, I was sometimes hurt because both Greg and Timothy would turn away from me when I held them and want to go back to their nurse. But afterward, when the new family deal started working, it was different. The moment they were carried into the room there would be a reaching out of hands and an eager feet-kicking in their frantic efforts to get to me. They made me feel as if I was really something!

Today, as five year olds, they run to me. And that isn't all. They can talk and they make comments. Need I explain the kick I get when Gregory burst out, "Gee, mother, you look nice in that dress!" or to overhear Timothy bragging to his friends that his mom is the most beautiful "lady-mother" in the whole world? (He may be wrong, but if that's the way I look to him I feel like the most beautiful lady-mother in the world and that's all that counts.)

Yet the story of what our children have done for Jess and me doesn't stop there. Jess and I were both actors when we married and we were actors after we were married. There is always a sense of professional rivalry between actors, and I might as well say right now that there was such a rivalry between Jess and me. We didn't actually vie with each other, but it was there, and it caused trouble.

With the coming of the boys, however, that rivalry began to lose its importance. We were also parents and there was something else to think about. If Gregory wasn't eating well (as he didn't for the first month of his life) that took precedence over our individual careers. If Timothy seemed to be acting listless, as if an illness was coming on, we found it difficult to get het up about this or that movie role. And more important than that, when we quarreled, as all young couples must, the character of our arguments changed after the boys were with us. We had to consider them, and they didn't have to be present to make themselves felt. To be frank—Jess and I have gotten over many a difficulty we might not have gotten over if it hadn't been for the children. And we're both thankful to them.

I remember the time before the boys came, that I lost out on a good starring role. The studio concerned had actually okayed the loan-out deal necessary (it was an independent picture) and all the papers were signed, when the producer made a last minute switch and asked to be let out of his agreement. The studio agreed, and my chance was gone. I was so sunk that there just seemed nothing left for me anymore.

That couldn't happen today. I don't mean that I won't again miss out on some picture I want, but it won't be such a knockout blow.

Today my happiness evolves from the family. If all are well there is little chance of any outside influence affecting me very deeply. I get my biggest kicks and sometimes my heartbreaks strictly at home. For instance, nothing can compare to the emotional runaround Gregory gave me when he was only four weeks old.

He hadn't been eating well and one afternoon, while taking his bottle, suddenly lost his milk all over the place. It wasn't just the ordinary throwing up babies will do, it was an eruption so violent that I phoned the doctor immediately. When I described what had happened he came right over and in a few moments had diagnosed Gregory's condition as a muscular disarrangement at the entrance to the stomach. It had become acute and would make it practically impossible for him to eat anything more until it was surgically corrected.

Jess was on location. I reached him by telephone and told him what had happened. An hour later, we were at the Children's Hospital and the doctor was operating. Late that night I left Gregory at the hospital, and, although they said he was coming along fine, I was shot through with a thousand fears. The first thing I did when I got home was to go to the nursery to see Timothy. Imagine my shock when I saw only one crib, his crib, in the room. The nurse had put Gregory's crib out of the way in a closet. It was a shock I'll never get over, and I am sure the nurse won't forget what I said about it in a long, long time.

There have been times in my life when I waited anxiously for some turn of fortune to happen, a call from the studio, a chance at some picture, and I thought then that no strain could compare with this. But it was as nothing to the nine days that passed before we got Gregory back from the hospital, smiling and gurgling up at us as if nothing at all had happened, and as if he didn't have a scar on his tummy looking almost as long as he was. I learned something about joy and sorrow in that episode and nothing any producer or director or studio head can say will ever be able to compare in effect.

Jess and I figured out the other day that our conversations, between ourselves and even with friends, used to run 90 per cent shop talk, studio business and all that, and only ten per cent personal. Today it is 70 per cent family and only 30 per cent shop. This ought to indicate pretty well where our interests lie.

BLUE JAY SAY:

"Quick CORN Relief!"

AMERICA'S No. 1 CORN PLASTER

This might give the impression that our lives have narrowed down to mostly just the home because of the boys. This is true only in one sense. Actually, through the boys, we are living a wider, more diversified life. A fishing trip, a vacation, even a walk with them become events in which we investigate things and learn, because they are always investigating and learning.

I never cared too much about swimming. Today not going into the pool means missing a chance to frolic with the boys. I never knew what a circus was until I took Gregory and Timothy and saw it through their eyes. I had even forgotten what great fun just a picnic can be, until they recalled it all for me by their enjoyment of it. All the simple things of life that I never had time for I am now rediscovering, and enjoying it with them.

These days we no longer have a nurse for the boys. We have "young people" take care of them; a high school girl, perhaps, who can have fun with the boys as well as mind them. High school girls don't stick around too long. They go back to school when the summer is over, or they develop other interests, but we are satisfied to let them come and go. They come and go but the family stays. When we had a nurse it was the other way around. I would come and go and the nurse stayed. No wonder they turned to her and I felt like an outsider.

I'm an insider now in our organization. I am No. 2 boss and the actual, working mother. Jess is No. 1 boss and the actual, working father. We stick close to the home—we were never much on entertaining or going out anyway—and the home is the center of all our lives.

Not long ago Jess and I were congratulating ourselves on how we developed this setup. Timothy and Greg were playing around the yard, running up to show us things every once in a while. Jess turned to me after a while with a question. "Did we work this out or was it worked out for us?" he wanted to know. And he looked toward the boys. I knew what he meant immediately. I knew he was thinking of a lot of times when we were close to stumbling, not too sure of the future . . . before the boys came. Now we are sure. We have something to be sure about. That's what our boys have done for us.

I didn't have to tell this to Jess. Jess was way ahead of me. I could tell by the answer in his eyes. THE END

hollywood's draft status

Schuyler Dunning, husband of Celeste Holm, is another Air Forces Reserve specialist who expects an immediate recall to active status.

Practically the only actors who are "safe" and draft-proof are the ones who've hit 45 and aren't in the reserves. Walter Pidgeon, Spencer Tracy, Bill Powell, Cary Grant, Joe Cotten, and that group.

Others who were classified as 4F in the previous war may be classified IA in this one. Gregory Peck, Fred MacMurray, Frank Sinatra, Van Johnson, and Monty Clift are just a few.

Ladd, and Donald O'Connor were invalided out of the last was, which means that they will probably be excluded from this one.

Occasionally, the public thinks that movie stars are fawned upon while in the service and given a lot of breaks that ordinarily soldiers don't get. Not true! If anything, the opposite is.

During World War II, Army non-coms and inept officers abused Red Skelton so consistently that many a night he bawled himself to sleep. They put him on latrine duty for months; they ordered him to do the dirtiest work; they made life miserable for him in an attempt to show that the Army played no favorites.

ONE time, Red, who has exceptionally healthy teeth, reported to the post dentist for a checkup. The captain's nurse remarked that she'd like to have a souvenir from the Hollywood star. In five minutes her boss yanked out one of Skelton's molars and had him autograph it for the dear girl!

Somehow, Red recovered the tooth. When he went on furlough, he took it to Dr. John Duzik, the young Beverly Hills dentist who was engaged to June Haver when he died. "Offhand," Duzik told Skelton, "this looks like a normally healthy tooth." Red was inconsolable. He wept for half an hour.

Victor Mature was another serviceman who had it rough. Mature was in the Coast Guard. One night while he was pulling shore duty, one of the braid asked him to open up about Rita Hayworth. At the time, Vic was very much in love with Rita and didn't particularly cherish the idea of making public the most private side of his life.

"Come on," urged the officer. "Let's have the lowdown on her. I hear tell she's real hot."

Mature drew back his right hand and let go with one short punch. A week later he was pulling Coast Guard duty on the high seas out of Iceland.

Turhan Bey, when he was going with Lana Turner, was drafted into the Army five or six years ago. He, too, was given a rough deal by stupid noncoms who wanted a complete briefing on his dates with the lovely Lana. After a while, he made up the most fantastic stories just to keep everyone amused.

Bill Holden, when he was stationed with the Air Forces in Texas, listened with great rapture while a fellow-officer conjured up the most incredible tales about Hollywood and its stars. When the officer began to regale everyone with stories of an actress, named Brenda Marshall, Holden got up and softly said, "That's just a lot of baloney."

"Who are you to say that?" demanded the lieutenant.

Holden smiled. "I just happen to be her husband."

GLENN Ford, ex-sergeant in the Marines, was worked as hard as any enlisted man in the corps. "He had to prove," an ex-buddy of his recently explained, "that he could take it whether he came from Hollywood or not." Ford lost 24 pounds as a leatherneck.

A few screen celebrities were handled with kid gloves in the service, but not many. Mickey Rooney, who married an Alabama girl, Betty Jane Rase, while in training down there, allegedly promised his topkick that he could manage him when the war was over. When this deal failed to materialize, the sergeant filed suit against Mickey.

Bob Mitchum worked in an aircraft plant for eighteen months and wasn't drafted until World War II was over.

With one or two exceptions, Hollywood's actors in the last war took whatever was coming without fear or flinching. They sought no favors and asked only to do their duty.

Most of them volunteered and weren't drafted. Undoubtedly, they and their successors will act the same way in this war.

What worries the studios is that many an actress will insist upon joining her husband if he is sent to a training camp.

Elizabeth Taylor, Jane Powell, and Esther Williams will all move to nearby communities if their husbands are called into the service. Naturally enough, they want to spend as much time with their men as possible.

JEANNE Crain, Betsy Kelly, Gloria Stewart, and Elizabeth Dailey say they will do the same thing. In the last war, Elizabeth spent as much time with Dan Dailey at various training camps as she possibly could. She even took a job in a cavalry post.

Betsy Kelly stayed in Washington with Gene when he was sent there, and Georgia Skelton spent every spare minute that the authorities would permit with Red at Camp Roberts.

The present war is too young to have altered the face of Hollywood, but if it continues for a year or two, it not only will drain the available manhood out of the film colony, but it will transform this community into one of the most "blacked out" ones in America. For this is not only the home of motion pictures, it is the greatest airplane construction center in the world.

Plans for the reopening of the world-famous Hollywood Canteen have already been made, and the camouflage paints and nets have already been taken out of store rooms.

Like the rest of the nation, Hollywood is girding for war. And one official at 20th Century-Fox has reached this dismal conclusion: "If the war lasts more than two years," he says, "practically every actor in Hollywood will see active duty." THE END

She began to wonder if she had done the right thing in coming to America.

Marta's childhood was devoted to the classic dance for which she had exceptional talent, and which has given her today a fluid grace of movement. As a baby she had been unusually active and when she was four, her mother took her to Vera Alexandrova, a dancing teacher of excellent reputation. Marta was a shy child, and while she performed well with the class, she was unable to bring herself to dance alone. Instead of forcing Marta, Vera merely told her that eventually she would have the courage. The teacher told little stories that went with the music, and one day she described a lovely sunrise. Marta was charmed by the story, and for the first time, offered to dance her impression. In interpreting the sunrise, she had the opportunity to begin with her head down, and by the time she had straightened and was facing the class, she had achieved self-confidence.

When Marta was thirteen, Vera Alexandrova married and went to Poland to live, but before leaving she told Marta's parents that the child had great talent and should one day be an actress. Marta stopped her dancing lessons, and after finishing her required education, held a job in the Swedish War Office, but she was unable to forget her teacher's advice and the idea of acting excited her.

So it was that when the Royal Dramatic Academy of Sweden announced a few openings for new members, Marta Toren was one of the 112 applicants. Only four boys and four girls were chosen. Marta was among them.

Marta had been working for some months when an American screen writer arrived at the Academy. For his own amusement, he wanted to look over the school's students, remembering that Garbo, Hasso and Bergman had all studied there. He was unimpressed with the classes he saw, but finally he met Marta.

"Can you speak English?" he asked.

"Ja," said Marta.

He pulled a letter from his pocket which he had recently received from America and asked her to read it aloud. Marta stumbled through it, but because of her face and figure, the writer would have been impressed even had she been unable to read her own language. Out of his own funds he paid for a screen test to be made, and sent it back to Hollywood. Automatically, he changed from writer to agent when the Universal-International studio cabled him to sign Marta Toren.

Marta didn't jump at the chance. Such a decision would require leaving her country, her home and her family. It was three months before she decided that she must take the chance. If she stayed in Sweden she would undoubtedly have a successful stage career, but the lure of the United States was strong, and she knew that if she turned it down she would wonder all her life what she had missed.

HAVING arrived in New York she was amazed at the American way, or rather the Hollywood way, of doing things. She was steered by her chaperone to all the so-called right places, where she would be seen and photographed. She was highly embarrassed by this procedure, but even more upset over the fact that she was not allowed to taste a banana split. A Swedish friend had been to America years ago and had brought home a glowing report of the concoction.

"Honey," said her protector, "you just can't go into a drug store and sit at a counter. You simply can't."

"Why not?" Marta wanted to know, and the reason given confused her. It seemed that she was to be seen only at "21," the Waldorf-Astoria and the Stork Club.

"But that is not me," protested Marta. "I want to see what an American drugstore is like, and I want a banana split."

"Nothing doing," came the answer.

One day when no one was looking, Marta stole down the hall of the hotel, into the elevator and then across the street to a drugstore. She had her banana split and she loved it. Almost better than that, she liked the young clerk who slid the dish across the counter to her.

"Here y'are, sweetheart," he said.

Marta beamed and retorted with what she considered to be the height of American slang. "You bet!" she said.

IT made her day brighter, that excursion. For the first time since her arrival she had a taste of freedom and a chance to be herself, and from then on she balked at every effort made to change her into a stereotyped Hollywood personality. "If you want bathing beauties," she told her new bosses, "you have them around the corner. If you wanted me for what I was in Sweden, please let me stay that way."

There have been many lessons for her to learn. In Sweden, people do not speak to strangers until they are properly introduced, and so it was that in the early days in Hollywood Marta made herself a reputation on the set of being haughty and aloof. Once she learned that she was expected to smile and speak to them first she was charmed with the idea.

The day she was introduced by her agent to the late Sam Wood, she bowed her head and curtsied. Afterward her agent exploded. "Good Lord!" he said. "You're a grown woman! You don't curtsey now!"

"But Mr. Wood is a director."

"That doesn't make him any different from anyone else," said her agent, and Marta accepted this new idea.

To date Marta has appeared in seven movies (her latest is Spy Hunt), all of them the cloak-and-dagger type, and her roles have required that she play the heavy-lidded fly in the international ointment. This isn't Marta Toren. Her ideal role would be a modern "Camille," or sophisticated comedy. She'd like to try both, and in these roles audiences would see the real Marta for the first time. As Marta says, "I can do none of the things like Betty Grable. I cannot dance or sing, so the only thing I can do is talk." And after she has talked, especially to her fans, they tell her that she isn't the femme fatale they had expected, but a really warm and delightful person.

NOW that she has mastered the English language (and amazingly well in three years) and learned the technique required in motion pictures, she has a future planned. She wants to marry and have children, but she hopes they will understand her urge to act because she knows that if they don't, her frustration will bounce back at their innocent heads. "If they let me do what I must do, it could be that I would enjoy the cooking."

During her first months in America, Marta felt divided in loyalty. Although she had fallen in love with the United States, she still felt the tug of her own land, and wasn't certain she wanted to stay here. Her first trip back to Sweden settled her mind immediately. It was good to see family and old friends once more, and most of all her nephew Dag, who returns her adoration. He slipped past the policemen at the dock and threw himself into her arms. But things in Sweden didn't seem the same, and Marta learned the new truth of the saying, "You can't go home again."

On her return she rented a house in Beverly Hills and filled it with the gay color that is so dear to her Swedish heart. There are Swedish books on the shelves, but Marta seldom reads them these days. She reads English much faster. She thinks, and even dreams in English, so it would seem that there is no longer a question in her mind as to where she belongs. She is studying now to obtain her American citizenship. "I live here. I eat here. I use the highways. It is my home," she says.

EVERY marriage authority in the world agrees that sex is the dominant motive which brings men and women together, but to suppose that sex is the only thing movie stars care about when they get married is to overlook the truth.

It may surprise doubting Thomases, but there are only a handful of childless movie stars. Greer Garson, Claudette Colbert, Katharine Hepburn, Ginger Rogers, Clark Gable and Gene Autry, are among the few top-flight stars who've been married but, to their sadness, have no children.

What better answer to the question of sex or babies can there possibly be than this: In the past few months, June Allyson, Esther Williams, Jean Hagen, Cyd Charisse, Lana Turner, Jeanne Crain and Mrs. Ezio Pinza have all announced their impending motherhood.

A theory was once held in Hollywood that an actress was not good box-office if she was a mother. Every time a movie star or an actor's wife gave birth to a child the news was hushed up.

When Jennifer Jones arrived in the screen colony, few people knew that she was married to a boy named Robert Walker, and had two sons. It was felt that an announcement of this sort would detract from her allure.

A little over a decade ago, when Ingrid Bergman landed in New York, publicity men again failed to mention that she was a mother.

When Gary Cooper's wife gave birth to her daughter, when Alida Valli had her second child, when Irene Dunne presented her dentist-husband with Mary Francis —the news was classified as top secret.

"You see," a veteran publicity man explained, "you can't let the public realize that movie stars are just like other human beings. To begin with, they're not. You know that. They're prettier; they're handsomer; they have more money, more clothes, more talent. If you let the public know that Betty Grable has babies just like any other married woman, do you think ten thousand G.I.'s in the Pacific are going to write in for her picture?"

"Do you think they will?" the publicity man was asked.

He scratched his head. "Personally," he said, "I think so. Only some producers don't. Take David Selznick. He likes to give all his stars the glamor build-up. He couldn't even call Alida Valli by her full name. He had to have her called Valli.

"Nowadays, things are changing, but for years, the producers kept asking, 'Who's going to go to a movie to see a dame who has three kids?' "

THE fact that Betty Grable became ten times more popular after she had children, and that the most popular actresses at the box-office today are mothers, has done much to change the producers' attitude.

Jeanne Crain says that each time she gives birth to a child, her career improves. "I get better roles," she explains. "After I had my first baby the studio starred me in Apartment for Peggy, and A Letter To Three Wives. After my second son, Michael, was born, they put me in Pinky. Who knows? After this one, I may get the best part of my career."

Jeanne didn't wait for the studio's go-ahead to become pregnant for the third time. She took the production staff at 20th Century-Fox by surprise. She'd been scheduled to go to Georgia on location for I'd Climb the Highest Mountain, when she announced her news. Fortunately, Susan Hayward, another mother, agreed to substitute for her.

June Allyson, too, didn't let her career stand in the way of motherhood. After six years of marriage, she was on the verge of adopting a second child when she discovered that an adoption would be unnecessary. She notified the studio, was taken out of Royal Wedding, and went home to enjoy her condition. Judy Garland was given the part, but got a suspension, and Jane Powell stepped in. For a while it was thought that she, too, had become a member of the Metro Stork Club, but that turned out to be a false alarm.

"Next time," Jane says, "I hope it's the real thing." Jane's hoping so hard that she and her husband Geary Steffen have just added a nursery to their home.

Almost every newly-married couple in Hollywood wants a family. Elizabeth Taylor says that a family and a happy marriage mean more to her than her career. "If my career ever interferes with Nicky and me, out it goes."

"The sooner I have children," Jane Russell (Mrs. Bob Waterfield) says, "the better I'll like it."

These youngsters know what Hollywood couples and couples everywhere found out long ago—those marriages which have the most children usually last the longest. Protecting one's marriage doesn't fit in with the myth about Hollywood stars, but here are some more facts that destroy the myth:

MAUREEN O'Sullivan, married since 1937, has six children, as does Don Ameche, married since 1932.

Steve McNally, married in 1940, has five offspring. Bing Crosby, Bob Hope, Teresa Wright, Pat O'Brien, John Wayne, Alan Ladd, and Joan Bennett (who's a grandma, too) have four children each.

Fred Astaire, Bill Holden, Gregory Peck, Burt Lancaster, Loretta Young and a host of others have three children each.

If anyone still thinks that motherhood deprives a girl of her sex appeal, just look at Hayworth, Bergman and Turner. These three hold their own against any unwed siren you'd care to mention.

Early in the game, when producers were outspokenly opposed to hiring mothers, actresses like Mrs. Spencer Tracy, (Louise Treadwell), and Mrs. Bing Crosby, (Dixie Lee), who disagreed with them, retired from acting and began raising families.

Others like Joan Crawford and Eve Arden compromised by adopting babies.

In time, the box office receipts proved that marriage and families made no difference to movie-goers and the stars began marrying without consulting studios. They began having children, as many as they wanted.

These stars realized that they were confronted during the course of their careers with many sexual temptations. They felt strongly that family ties would keep them settled, responsible, and capable of resisting temptation.

Given the choice of sex or babies, Hollywood's stars have for the most part

I SAW IT HAPPEN

My girlfriend and I were sitting in the Oval Room of the Copley-Plaza Hotel in Boston, watching Vic Damone sing. We'd saved up our money especially to see him that night and had to take the bus back to Hartford the same evening. We told this to the waiter, so you can imagine our thrill when Vic himself came over to our table to talk to us. Just as the waiter brought us our check, someone picked it up and signed it, saying, "I'll take care of this." It was Vic! Two extremely happy girls went back to Hartford that night—Vic Damone fans for life.

chosen babies. It may sound trite, but screen celebrities love to live normal lives. The theory that actresses are too career-minded to be normally maternal is completely false.

No girl, for example, has been more career-minded than Olivia DeHavilland, and yet when she became pregnant, she remained in bed seven months rather than take the chance of losing her child. Now her happiness as a mother is greater than her thrill at being an Oscar-winner ever was.

Georgia Skelton, Red's wife and an actress in her own right, did the very same thing before the birth of her child.

Betty Hutton epitomized Hollywood's sentiment about babies when she said recently, "I didn't know how good and full life could be until I had my children."

THIS is not to say that all life in Hollywood is idyllic. There are childless couples, and Hollywood does have its sinners, but they are in the minority.

Frances Farmer, one of the most beautiful and promising actresses the community has ever known, wound up a series of love affairs by taking overdoses of alcohol and benzedrine and ended up a patient in an asylum.

Carole Landis, hopelessly in love, committed suicide because she couldn't marry the married man she loved.

Lupe Velez, the gay, carefree Mexican spitfire, burst on Hollywood like a bombshell and died almost as suddenly. The darling of many local Lotharios, her list of conquests were the envy of every playgirl in town. But eventually, passion undid her. She conceived a child out of wedlock, and swallowed fifty-five sleeping pills to forget about it.

Madge Meredith, the beautiful wide-eyed country girl from Iowa who wanted so hard to become a movie star, got herself involved and convicted with a bunch of kidnapping thugs who beat up her manager, Nick Gianaclis. Today, Madge works in the Tehachapi prison for women, sentenced to a five-years to life term, forgotten by all but a few.

Jean Wallace, after making a failure of her marriage to Franchot Tone, tried to stab herself to death. Luckily, she recovered.

The list of moral transgressors in any community is long but so is the list of healthy, happy families. Hollywood ranks high on the latter list. Its citizens know that babies are the nicest people, and they are as welcome in this town as anywhere else on earth. THE END ava, the talk of the town

"I don't like it," said one executive. "It comes too close after the Bergman scandal. It's no good for the industry. I wish that girl were back in the United States. It's easier to keep an eye on them here. This thing is no good for the industry."

The other executive shrugged his shoulders. "I don't think there's anything to do," he said. "Sinatra is no longer under contract to Metro. He's legally separated from his wife. Ava is legally divorced. Who wants to stand in the way of love? Love, you know, can be very big at the box office."

All of this is typical of the discussions going on in Hollywood about the famous romance. While it was reaching its height, Frank and Ava were in London, sitting together in a Bray-on-Thames restaurant, making small talk, trying to ignore the fact that they were the object of all eyes, trying to answer the question of why the world would not let lovers alone.

There are many who say that Ava is making a fool of herself, that Frank is constitutionally incapable of sustained devotion, that this is merely an infatuation which will wear itself out and fade into memories.

The people who think this way are doing Ava a great injustice. They make her out to be a silly, naive little girl. Ava is nothing of the sort. No one can be married to Mickey Rooney and Artie Shaw, and date dozens of other men, and still be considered naive. Nor does Ava suffer from an inferiority complex as is widely believed. The only thing inferior about Ava is her lack of formal education. And she learned years ago, that a beautiful body and a beautiful face more than compensate for these inadequacies where men are concerned.

This was brought home most sharply to her when she was married to Artie Shaw. Artie was always begging her to improve her mind. He sent her to college to take courses in English literature. He insisted that she spend all her spare time reading worthwhile books.

Once when they were staying in New York, Ava went out and bought a copy of "Forever Amber," by Kathleen Winsor. Shaw, according to the tale, blew his top. "Cripes!" he exclaimed, "how can you read such unadulterated trash? This is pure rubbish."

A few months later, Artie divorced Ava and married Kathleen Winsor.

NOBODY knows better than Ava what counts in this world. Anyone who has spent any time at all with her can testify to that. Ask Mickey or Shaw or Vic Damone or Howard Duff. They'll tell you.

Before she started going with Frank, Ava knew all about him, and knowing about him, she declined to accept his company. Having been married twice before, Ava has always made it a point to refuse dates with married men. Sinatra was no exception to this rule.

He became an exception, however, when he let Ava understand one evening that all was not honey between him and Nancy, and that to all intents and purposes, they had come to the parting of the ways.

No one can ever point the accusative finger at Ava and say, "That woman was responsible for destroying a marriage."

Sinatra's domestic discord can be attributed only to him and Nancy.

The public doesn't know this, however, and that's why they feel so strongly that Ava should not be permitted to love him.

The fact of the matter is that Frank's relationship with Nancy is merely a legal fiction. On September eighth, Frank is scheduled to appear in court and resolve once and for all the financial settlement due Nancy and the three children.

Frank's income for the past ten years has approximated some $10,000,000. He no longer has a motion picture contract (his old one paid him $5,000 a week), his records are no longer best-sellers, sheet music sales are away down, his future television show may or may not be any good. He's never going to be the popular bobby-sox idol he once was. In short, Frank has had it.

All this means that, in Frankie, Ava has a man who is past his professional prime. If Ava wants him under the present circumstances, surely she must be in love with him. "I can't go around screaming I'm in love with somebody who isn't even divorced," she says. "I think Frank is a wonderful person and if I were in love with anybody, it'd be him."

You can read between those lines quite easily. Ava's in love, all right. She has risked her career for him, and Frank has done the same for her.

When he bowled them over at the Palladium in London, Ava was in the third row center, applauding. When Frank was singing at The Shamrock in Houston, Texas, Ava was at a ringside table, applauding. When Frank was booked into the Copacabana in New York, Ava was on hand for the opening week.

These two have been following each other all over the world. Los Angeles, New York, Houston, Miami, Spain, Paris, London.

They're in love. They must be in love —and somehow the world frowns upon them. "Frank will never marry her," people say. "Surely, she must know it."

But Ava doesn't know it. She is certain that Frank will find some way to get a divorce. She is sure that somehow, sometime she will wind up being Mrs. Frank Sinatra.

She will confide her hopes to no one, not even to her sister Beatrice, who doubles as her chaperone, but her thinking is as visible as the top line of an optometrist's chart.

JUST look: Frank has been incredibly resourceful, to date. He shortened his personal appearance engagement at the Copacabana because of a bad throat, and flew to Ava in Spain. He got out of his booking at the Chez Paris in Chicago. He had his business manager "Blubber"

HOW TIME FLIES!

■ What's next for Dorothy Lamour? Her romance with Greg Bautzer has been leaping and bounding along the paradise trail, with Dotty confessing that "I have never before known such joy." Now, it seems, her joy may be due for a jolt. Lana Turner, her deadliest opponent for Greg's affections, is on the loose again. The fur hasn't begun to fly yet, but Hollywood anticipates a beautiful scrap while Barrister Bautzer squirms.—October, 1940, Modern Screen.

Burns, and his agent set up a booking at the Palladium in London exactly when Ava would be there. In order to time things so that he might enjoy Ava's companionship, he even renounced his contract with MGM.

In a sentence, Frank has built his professional life these past six months around Ava Gardner. She's been the motivation behind all the moves in his public and private life.

He's worked things out beautifully. Why shouldn't he be able to work his way into a marriage with Ava?

Ava's smart enough to realize that love has a way of conquering all obstacles. Dick Haymes got out of his marriage. Nora Flynn got out of hers. Harry James secured a divorce and married Betty Grable when a divorce seemed almost hopeless. It happens. Who is there to say that eventually, Frank won't maneuver himself into freedom? Who is there to say that when the great moment arrives, he won't make Ava his wife?

A few months ago you could have gotten odds of fifty to one that the Sinatra-Gardner entente would be nothing more than a fast fling.

Nowadays, people aren't so sure.

There's a lot of talk that Metro will buy up Ava's contract, that the studio disapproves of her friendship with Frank. Nothing official. But Ava might very well find herself washed up in Hollywood—at least for a while.

Still she continues to see Frank, for like all women who have had successful careers, Ava has reached the inevitable conclusion—a career is a very wonderful achievement, only you can never get it to propose.

"I think you can depend on it," he said.

June's whoop brought the whole household running to her—Dick, Olie the nurse, Marian the cook, Frank the house man, and finally the small Pam, who had tangled in the hall with Pat the poodle.

June beamed at them all. "Guess what?" she said.

There was no mistaking the pure delight in her face, and they in turn all wore the same expression of disbelief.

"Not—" said Marian.

"Holy Hannah!" said Olie.

"Open some champagne!" shouted Dick, and he took June in his arms.

It was quite an afternoon, and since then everyone in the house has been expending his energy trying to get Mrs. Powell to take her pills and/or a nap. Comes two o'clock of an afternoon and they suggest, simultaneously, that she lie down, but June, who is comprised mostly of energy, flatly refuses. One day Dick decided that drastic measures must be taken. He swooped her off her feet, carried her into the bedroom, deposited her on the bed, and gave strict orders that she was to stay there for the afternoon. She made a face at his retreating back, and began to twiddle her thumbs. In five minutes she was fast asleep, and woke up three hours later, feeling horrible, mad at the world, and sporting a violent headache. She burst from the room in a fury.

"See what happens when I take a nap!" she said to the house in general. It was her first and last nap.

Books on the subject of expectant motherhood have flooded the house. At the beginning June read every one of them right straight through, and none of them made much sense to her as they dealt with such far-off subjects as formulas and what to expect at the hospital. The only thing that made an impression on her was a list of symptoms which, if experienced, required a fast phone call to the doctor. She found that upon reading the list she immediately developed the symptoms, and so the books have been piled in a dark corner somewhere, a move which has been conducive to her peace of mind.

The doctor is of small help. He answers June's myriad questions with a shrug, a smile or a grunt, none of which tell her a thing. Each time she makes a complaint, her doctor smiles and says, "That's to be expected," and June feels that her individuality in this world is fading fast.

She feels blandly superior, however, to women who are not in her condition, and when she goes shopping, moves among strangers like a queen. She is different, she is a real Woman, for the first time in her life, and she wants everyone to know it.

As for Dick, he is living in his own world of superiority. At home he is adoring and solicitous of June, keeping after her to sit down, slow down or lie down, but when he leaves the house he is a changed man. He carries his head higher and his chest grows visibly bigger—and he moves among strangers like a king.

One day he asked June how Herman was getting along.

"Herman?" said June. "Who's Herman?"

"Who else?" said Dick.

"Oh," said June, and the name has stuck. It isn't that Dick wants a boy in particular, but you can't go on calling a baby "it," and Herman seems to have solved the problem. As for June, she doesn't care whether the baby is a boy or a girl, but all the same she admits that pregnancy is the world's biggest suspense act. "It really teaches you patience," she says.

If theirs is a boy he will be named Scott, and if a girl, Allyson. June had chosen Pat for a girl, but succumbed to Dick's insistence on Allyson. He thinks Allyson Powell is a beautiful name and while June agrees with him on that score, she is positive and petrified that the little girl will be dubbed Alley by her friends. Whatever the baby's gender, it will have Edgar and Frances Bergen as godparents.

The Powells had requested a baby boy from an adoption center, and the child was due to arrive shortly after June learned she was to have one of her own. The temptation was strong to keep silent about the news and take the baby boy regardless. But she finally told herself that it wasn't fair, that too many people are on waiting lists for children, and that to take the boy under the circumstances would be the height of selfishness. It's difficult for her now to put the baby boy out of her mind; she keeps wondering where he is and what his new parents will be like.

June is progressing in exactly the opposite way predicted by her doctor. He told her, as any obstetrician would, that she could expect to be nervous, irritable and subject to fits of depression. To the contrary June is calm as a millpond, more cheerful than ever, and is completely undisturbed even by the disappearance of the laundress, an event which at any other time would have brought on a stroke.

She has been instructed to drink quantities of milk, yet one small sip of it will send her bolting from the room. Her dream meal these days consists of Italian spaghetti with a side dish of pungent pickles, which is topped off by quarts of ice cream. June finds this repast leads to a night of heavenly sleep.

Like any woman pregnant for the first time, June is trying to rush the whole idea. She bought and wore her maternity clothes long before such apparel was necessary. As far back as last summer she was proudly tying her one hundred pounds into a pair of maternity blue jeans. Finding that these clothes were more than a little previous, she bought size 12 clothes instead of the usual 10, and to her dismay, discovered they had to be taken in to fit her.

Faced with a frightening array of pill bottles, June claims it is no wonder that pregnant women are supposed to look beautiful. "How can they help it?" she says, gulping more calcium. "They're forced to keep themselves in top physical condition. Me—I've got a 100% blood count, perfect blood pressure, and I've never felt better in my life."

It could be that most of her well being is due to her frame of mind, for she has never been so happy. She spends most of her days with Pamela, dreaming of the time when there'll be two small Powells instead of one. At first she wondered if she would feel any differently toward the adopted Pamela, but by now she knows there will be no difference. The only thing is that Pamela required no naps, or milk, or calcium pills, and beyond those small matters, it is as though Pamela were her very own child.

Recently, June met a woman who had gone through five months of pregnancy and was already bored with the project. "I'll be glad when this is over," the woman sighed, and June felt a sudden urge to turn on her heel and walk away.

"I don't understand that attitude," she says. "When you think of all the women in the world who want children, yet must remain childless, I think it's a sin for anyone to feel that way."

For herself, she feels only gratitude and an aching happiness. "It's what you're here for," she says. "I feel now that I've completed my life. It's the first time I've ever really felt important. And," she adds, "I hope I'm lucky enough to feel important like this two or three more times before I'm stowed away for good." THE END a baby for liz?

"Why not?" I said.

"Nicky and I want to have lots of fun first. We want to go places and see people and you can't do that when you have children."

Well, maybe she's right. But, on the other hand, this idea has never stopped Nicky's father, the debonair Connie Hilton. He has three grown-up sons by his first wife. And an entrancing baby daughter by his second, the gorgeous Zsa Zsa. Connie loves to dance all night long—which is one reason why Zsa Zsa told me, at Elizabeth's wedding, she divorced him. "He just wore me out." Nicky has all of his father's energy!

And having two children didn't stop Mr. and Mrs. Taylor from traveling with them to this country from England when Elizabeth was seven years old. Came the war and of course they stayed here. Now there might be another conflict and who knows what will happen with Nicky in the Naval Reserve. But children in the home are great to come home to. I know. I have two.

And as for Liz's setting a definite date for the stork—well, that's one bird you can't count on as far as the calendar goes.

So if Liz and Nick are going to have a baby sooner than they anticipate, or if they're anticipating a baby sooner than they say, it sets me to wondering what that sweet bundle has in store for himself (or herself, or themselves!).

Liz has already decided that she wants a boy first. "I used to want a girl," she told me, "but Nicky wants a boy. So I hope the first baby is a boy. It's better for a girl to have an older brother watch out for her. My brother Howard is two and a half years older than I am. We've always had fun together. And it's wonderful when you grow up and want to go places. Your brother can always take you if you don't have a date." (That's one problem Liz never had to worry about, and I guess her daughter won't either!)

Whatever sex it is, Liz's baby will be born not only with a silver spoon in its mouth, but a golden knife and fork in each hand.

It's mama stands to earn a million dollars as a movie actress with a brilliant future. Poppa has oodles of shares in the dozens of fabulous hotels owned by the senior Hilton. And the young future father is smart in his own right to boot.

But above all, Elizabeth's baby will have a mother who knows all the answers about the facts of life. There'll be no "birds and bees" business in reply to that usually dreaded question, "Mama, how are babies made?" Elizabeth has known the answer to this one for the past thirteen years.

"I'll always remember when Elizabeth was five years old and she first saw a calf being born," her mother told me recently. "We were living then in what had been the gamekeeper's cottage on the estate in England of her godparents, Mr. and Mrs. Victor Cazelet. She came flying into the house, her eyes wide with excitement and shouting, 'Mummie, come quickly.' And when the calf was lying by its mother's side, Elizabeth asked me very seriously, 'Is this the way chidren are born too?' I told her yes and I explained that all mothers carry their babies very close to their hearts until the time comes for them to be born. So Elizabeth has never had to ask me questions about babies. It was so different in my time. I had a wonderful mother, but it was considered shocking to want to even know about such things."

I haven't yet asked Elizabeth or Nicky what kind of a nursery they plan. They both seem such babies themselves I get kind of embarrassed when I discuss the fascinating topic. After all, they still say they are not planning a baby for two years. But this I know, there will be no strict feeding schedules for the young Hiltons. In Elizabeth's babyhood and until a few years ago, a baby had to be fed at 6 A.M., 10 A.M., 2 P.M., 6 P.M., and when very tiny, at 10 P.M. as well. "I'm sure that's why she didn't like food," says Mrs. Taylor. Now doctors say—"Feed 'em any time when they are hungry. And pick 'em up and give them lots of loving and to heck with the rules."

It's a cinch that Elizabeth's daughter will be mad about clothes. The only time Lizzie didn't scream for joy over a new dress was during her early adoration for Ann Westmore. She preferred to wear Ann's old clothes while her own new clothes languished in the closet until she outgrew them and her mother gave them away! But now, even if she never adds to her huge and wonderful trousseau, she'll have plenty to wear for the rest of her life.

I know, too, that future Taylor-Hiltons, boys and girls both, had better learn early to love the open spaces, because that's what they'll get plenty of. Nicky's an expert golfer and very good at fishing and hunting. And ever since Liz was knee-high to a stirrup—four and a half years old—and owned her own pony, she's been crazy about all sorts of animals.

"She didn't care for dolls at all until she was eight years old and we lived in Beverly Hills across the street from Ann Westmore (the daughter of make-up expert Wally and Elizabeth's maid of honor at the wedding)," her mother tells me. "But when she saw Ann's collection, she wanted one just as big. At one time Elizabeth had a hundred dolls. At Christmastime they were all over the house. I've saved ten of them for Elizabeth to give her children."

Elizabeth took turns with Ann at playing the mother and the nurse to their large doll family. They used to borrow their mothers' clothes to wear themselves, and Mrs. Taylor was kept busy making fancy outfits for the dolls. Today Elizabeth's favorite is not a doll but a big teddy bear—it still sits guard on her bed.

Nothing, by the way, has been touched in Elizabeth's bedroom in her mother's house. Except the pearl-gray carpet—Elizabeth house-broke her dog in her bedroom and after the wedding the carpet was sent to be cleaned.

And here's a sad note. During Elizabeth's honeymoon the little dog, "Butch," died. Mrs. Taylor did not spoil the honeymoon by telling her about it until she came back. The dog pined for Elizabeth after she went away. She always used to take him to the vet's to be clipped—he was a gray, miniature poodle. He was very highly strung and to hear him howl after Elizabeth went was awful. I live in the next street and I heard him.

About a month after the wedding Mrs. Taylor took Butch to the vet's. At two in the afternoon they called her to say Butch had been trimmed and he was fine. Before she could get out of the room the phone rang again and they said, "Oh, Mrs. Taylor, he's dead." Poor Butch, he was only eight months old.

At one time Elizabeth had five dogs. And if you have never read "Nibbles and Me," her book about her pet chipmunk, you should—it's delightful. Until she was sixteen, the house was always full of guinea pigs. Plus several talking birds. And she still has the horse, King Charles, she rode in National Velvet. MGM gave her the handsome animal for her 13th birthday.

It will be interesting to see how Elizabeth tackles the eating problem of her children. When she herself was little, she had to be almost tricked into eating, she hated food so much. And it wasn't until National Velvet that Mrs. Taylor really tricked her into an appetite. She told her mother, "I want to grow big and strong so I can ride the horse well." "But darling, how are you going to grow if you don't eat?" quickly replied the senior lady Taylor. So Elizabeth started eating man-size steaks. She never did get fat, however. Unless there really is a baby on the way, Elizabeth currently wears size ten in dresses and tips the scale at 114 pounds.

In all the years I've known her, Elizabeth has never been ill with more than a cold or a case of sunburn. As a child she was just as healthy, suffering only with whooping-cough which she caught from brother Howard. And an abscessed ear. "She was never delicate, just slender and slight," says her mother, who is also slender and slight—and strong.

When Elizabeth was small, she was painfully shy. She wasn't exactly afraid of people. "But," her mama tells me, "she used to cling to my hand, and shift from one foot to another without saying a word." Elizabeth is no longer shy. And she's beginning to talk more and with more authority. And I don't somehow think that her children will be anything but very self-possessed and "at home" in large groups. They will have lots of practice anyway—both Lizzie and Nicky love people around them.

The plan now is for the young Hiltons to live in a suite at the Bel Air Hotel (of which Nicky owns 20%, and which he manages) for one year. Then they buy a lot and will build their very own home. Elizabeth wanted something very early American, with white and red bricks. Nicky doesn't care too much for that. He goes for "Traditional Modern"—all the comforts, and space and big windows of modern styling, with some antiques that are solidly comfortable. So that is what Elizabeth wants now. (This marriage can't fail to be successful!) Of course there will be a pool and the mansion will be on a hilltop.

As a cook, Elizabeth is a good actress. Her first cake was so hard, they had to throw it down on the floor to break it up. But Lizzie wants to learn—she's married to a guy who knows all about food because of his years of training in hotel kitchens. She has asked her pal Ann to show her how to cook hard-to-make delicacies like Yorkshire pudding and soufflés.

So this is how I see the Nicky Hiltons in five years—a gracious, happy couple, living in a beautiful modern house, both successful in their chosen careers. And, oh yes, two small children. I hope they get what they want—first a boy, then a girl—and the girl must inherit Elizabeth's looks—she'll be doing fine if she gets some of Nicky's, too.

Now we have to wait for the date of the first-born. It's an odd coincidence, but Liz's next movie is called Father's Little Dividend. Maybe a better title would be Mother's Little Dividend. I don't know. I'm only guessing. But it seems to me a wonderful idea for private life, that is. Maybe I'm prejudiced, but I think Liz was made to be a perfect mother.

Q. How can Errol Flynn marry Patrice Wymore if, according to his own testimony, he can't afford to pay for the support of his first wife, Lili Damita?
—T. R., CHICAGO, ILL.

A. Flynn can afford to pay for the support of his first wife. He just wants the Court to reduce the amount of that support. Miss Wymore is not exactly poor either. Flynn receives $200,000 for one picture a year from Warner Brothers.

Q. Why don't the four Marx Brothers make pictures any more? Is it because they fight with each other?
—N. M., DETROIT, MICH.

A. They consider it financially advantageous for each to go his separate way.

Q. In looking over a back issue of Modern Screen, I came across a story about Robert Walker and his new bride, Barbara Ford. What ever happened to these two? Are they still together?
—F. F., BAINBRIDGE, GA.

A. Robert Walker was not in the best mental health at the time of his marriage. Barbara Ford quickly realized this and immediately secured a divorce. Not long after, Walker received treatment at the Menninger Clinic in Topeka, Kansas. In fine mental health, he's unwed.

Q. What is this about Joan Crawford and Vincent Sherman?
—B. K., LOS ANGELES, CALIF.

A. Mr. Sherman has directed Miss Crawford's last three pictures. She admires his directorial skill, and is extremely fond of him.

Q. I've been told that Claudette Colbert absolutely refuses to have her profile shot from the right. Is this true?
—P. Y., PHILADELPHIA, PA.

A. Miss Colbert has a break in her nose and the right profile is not photogenic.

Q. I have read hundreds of stor about Alan and Sue Ladd, and I'll darned if I can find out the truth fr any of them. How many children the Ladds have, anyway, and how ma times has each of the Ladds be married?
—E. F., ROCKPORT, IL

A. The Ladds have been married tw and have four children to prove it.

Q. Why did Linda Darnell and her hu band split up? Is it because he's twi her age? Isn't that also the case wi Dick Powell and June Allyson, with B Powell and his wife "Mousie"? Is a difference too great a barrier for succe in marriage?
—V. D., DENVER, COL

A. Not at all, age made no difference June and Dick Powell, and there more to the Darnell-Marley splitup tha age difference. Linda and Pev hav conflicting viewpoints on certain sub jects and cannot reconcile them.

Q. Why do the major studios refuse let their stars appear on television?
—L. D., ORLANDO, FL

A. They think it is bad for the motio picture business. If you see Lana Turne on T.V. for nothing, why pay to see he at your local theater? That is the offici reasoning.

Q. I've written several actresses askin them to please send me the old clothe they've worn in a picture. Several hav written back, telling me that thei clothes don't belong to them. Is tha true?
—R. S., DES MOINES, IOWA

A. Clothes worn by actresses in an motion picture usually belong to th wardrobe department of the studio shooting the film. Actors supply thei own clothes, except in costume pictures Occasionally, the studio will let an ac tress keep the clothes; frequently i will not.

American Guerrilla in the Philippines

The lean, hard American took the girl in his arms... Forgotten was the danger... as they found each other...

His name was Chuck Palmer, Ensign, U.S.N.R. He came out of the fire of battle, through wild mountain passes and jungle brush, over seas wide-open to bombers...to the Island of Leyte, of palm trees, shimmering moonlight...and enemy occupation.

There, in the village of Tacloban, he saw her, the dark-eyed girl — her face firm with a hardness, belied by the softness of her lips. And they fought together, the war of the guerrilla...

Here is one of the great love stories of our decade as it was told in the powerful Book-of-the-Month and Reader's Digest best-seller. A motion picture to excite you, to impart a rich and deeper meaning... because it was true.

NANCY SINATRA'S LIVING HER OWN LIFE . . . SCARLETT O'HARA'S BACK IN TOWN! . . . JUDY GARLAND'S A NEW WOMAN,

Is Farley Granger's romance with Shelley Winters, and vice versa, colder than a frappé crême de menthe with Missy Shelley keeping it alive just for the publicity laughs?

I'm not saying—I'm just asking.

I have good reason to believe that Shelley and Farley have had a bitter quarrel over his return to Europe to court a beautiful blonde charmer of the Paris nightclub set.

But Shelley is a very smart girl where publicity is concerned. All the while Farley was gone, she made it a point to tell reporters about the "messages and letters" he was mailing her. Several had a little back-swipe at Granger as, for instance, the postcard he supposedly sent her for a birthday gift!

And then, there was a letter (Shelley said it came from him) signed "Mrs. Hilton."

When asked why he used that signature, Shelley replied airily, "That's just our little private joke. We weren't invited to Elizabeth Taylor's wedding to Nicky Hilton."

Whether she and Granger are blazing or feuding—never let it be said for a moment that Shelley isn't squeezing every inch of space out of their present relations.

Gary Merrill, unknown a year ago, suddenly becomes the center of Hollywood interest as an actor following his elopement with Bette Davis.

Merrill, an earthy good looking guy with Gable-like qualities, was just another actor until Bette saw him and fell in love with him. Now he has almost every studio in town wanting him for a picture and trying to get him away from 20th where he has a contract.

Even though Merrill is much in love, as I know he is, it must strike him as a little ironical that his acting talent went unappreciated until he met and married a star!

All about Eve, the picture in which both Bette and Gary emoted and in which they met, is a honey and may well be an Academy Award winner.

If Nancy Sinatra had read in the morning papers that Ava Gardner had just planed into New York and would be followed by Frank Sinatra within hours, she gave no indication of it the same night of her Square Dance shindig in Hollywood.

A very elegant hoe-down it was!

Van Johnson looked like a 20-year-old kid in a loud red and white checked shirt and the way that boy can do-si-do is a caution.

The evening began with cocktails down by the swimming pool—and later an Italian dinner was served, bouffet style, on the terrace.

But, as the evening grew chilly, everybody, including the orchestra, moved indoors with everybody pitching in moving back the furniture in the big playroom.

Bunny Waters (Mrs. Johnny Green) was all over the place with her elaborate camera equipment and I must say she had some interesting "subjects."

Janet Leigh, looking like a doll in a white cotton dress embroidered in daisies, was having the time of her life whooping it up for the dances. Janet tells me that (temporarily) she's not in love. "I have so much more fun when I'm not," she laughed.

Evie Johnson looked like an old fashioned portrait in a white dress, cut low off the shoulders, with a narrow red velvet band around her throat.

Ginger Rogers decided against dressing for the square dance and looked lovely in black net with silver sequins. Although there have been rumors of Ginger and attorney Greg Bautzer cooling—they sure didn't look it at this affair.

The prize crack of the evening was pulled by Metropolitan opera star, Robert Merrill, who was a guest in the Sinatra home for the first time. "I'm doing the wrong kind of singing," he laughed, looking around.

Everytime I see those adorable Sinatra children, I wonder how much longer Frankie can stay away. He would have been so proud of dignified little Nancy helping her mother receive, little Frankie Jr. strutting all over the place in his cowboy outfit, and the curly-headed baby who appeared just long enough to yell to be carried back to the nursery!

If Errol Flynn and his tall, blonde leading lady, Patrice Wymore, ever really get around to marriage, many cynics will lose a bet. Some of the gossip following announcement of their engagement was:

His "engagement" to Patrice was for the purpose of breaking off his "engagement" to the Princess Irene Ghica.

It was publicity for their Western movie, Rocky Mountain.

It was for the laughs.

Well, I don't know. Flynn is completely unpredictable and changeable. But his best friends say he meant it when he said, "American girls make the best wives." His personal score has been zero. He lost with both French actress, Lili Damita, and again with American girl, Nora Eddington.

Enough to make a nervous hostess drop dead—were the antics of Gene Kelly, Danny Kaye and George Burns putting on a dance routine at the Louis B. Mayers' party that had them hurdling divans and just missing coffee tables!

Gene, particularly, has never done more athletic precision numbers for any of his pictures—which is one reason lovely Lorena Mayer didn't collapse. But when she managed to keep the same composure when Gene was followed by Danny, the zany one, and George—well, I wonder if I could have been so calm?

The laugh is—far from being an informal affair, this was one of the most dignified parties of the season given in honor of Irene Selznick, daughter of the MGM executive.

The Mayer living room, with its bright, gay colors, had been converted into a ballroom and a prettier sight you never saw than Loretta Young, Claudette Colbert, Roz Russell, Sonja Henie, Judy Holliday and other lovelies twirling around to the music of the full orchestra.

But the two big eyestoppers were—Vivien Leigh and Ethel Barrymore.

Hollywood and all eyes were on her.

She was wearing a white, heavily beaded Egyptian style gown, an emerald necklace, and with her black hair worn straight with long bangs—she looked exactly like a modern Cleopatra.

Getting Vivien alone took a bit of doing. Sir Laurence Olivier had not yet arrived and all the dandies wanted to dance with Scarlett O'Hara Leigh.

But, I finally managed—at least long enough to ask her what changes she noticed in town since her last visit ten years ago.

"The traffic—such jams of cars," she said in her soft, clipped accent, "and that—that fantastic Charleston dancing I saw at the cafe the other night. I could never do it—but it is fun to watch!"

Vivien had been asked if the infamous Los Angeles smog bothered her and she had been puzzled by the term until I told her it meant FOG with smoke in it.

"Oh, fog!" she laughed. "We have fog in London which seeps through doors and under windows—so a little thing like smoke i wouldn't bother a Londoner." (Chamber Commerce, please note!)

LOUELLA PARSONS' good news

that supposed jaunt to Europe with Vincent Minnelli while he films American In Paris I hear that trip is off and the whole picture except for exteriors with a second camera unit, will be made in Hollywood. (For Judy Garland's open letter to MODERN SCREEN readers, turn to page 29.)

GEARY Steffen, husband of Janie Powell, is such a nice boy I was surprised at the spanking he got in the press box for rowing with newspaper cameramen.

It happened when Jane went to the County Clerk's office to pick up the $19,000 worth of bonds saved (the court orders it for juvenile performers until they reach 21) from her salary while she was growing up.

As I hear the story, Geary got very temperamental and called the boys "stinkers" for poking into their private affairs.

Believe me, there are far better ways of dealing with situations of this kind. Geary could have asked the cameramen to photograph only Janie—and leave him out, if he did not want to pose. Or he could have left the office until after the official business of Janie's receiving her bonds.

Instead, he antagonized every big newspaper cameraman in town and the boys left in a body swearing off the Steffens in the future. (For another picture of Jane and Geary's life, see page 30.)

STARS, producers and every-day workers have all fallen under the spell of Laurence Olivier—by far the most popular "import" ever to work on the Paramount lot.

Sir Larry has been hailed as the greatest actor of his day. But to the "gang"—he's just the hardest worker.

He arrived in Hollywood with a mustache so droopy that even Vivien Leigh said she couldn't stand it. "Don't worry," he told her, "if this is too dreadful, I'll get something more fetching from the make-up department." (He needs the mustachio for Carrie, his picture with Jennifer Jones.)

Every morning, after the gates open, Olivier can be spotted bicycling to the rehearsal stage. At first, he had just an ordinary bell on the bike. Then, someone gave him an automobile horn which he uses with delight because it makes pedestrians jump.

He loves American stories and is always asking someone to tell him one. He doesn't like to tell them himself because he says he isn't good at it.

He does not visit on the set of other actors unless he is especially invited. Sir Larry almost bowled over Bob Hope by ASKING if he might visit on The Lemon Drop Kid set.

He eats all sorts of outlandish things—particularly the dishes he can't get in London.

And, one of the nicest things I know about him, is the help he gave Mary Murphy getting the role of his daughter in Carrie. Let me tell you about Mary:

She is the Cinderella girl of the hour! For two years this extraordinarily beautiful girl was employed as a package wrapper at Saks Fifth Avenue.

Look closely! Compare the shining softness . . . the live, long-lasting "spring" . . . the lovely natural look of both permanents. Which is which? You can't tell! Not even experts can find any difference between the $1 Toni and the beauty shop wave. Because a Toni looks as natural, feels as soft as a $20 wave (*including shampoo and set.) It's actually guaranteed to be as beautiful and last as long. Your Toni has that natural look from the first day. There's no frizz! Even if your hair is baby-fine, bleached or tinted, Toni's gentle Creme Waving Lotion leaves your wave as satin-soft and easy to set as Alva Anderson's (at left). You can be sure of this – for only Toni has given over 93 million natural-looking waves to all types of hair. Try a Toni—you'll love it!

Toni alone, of all home permanents—
looks so natural, feels so soft!
That's why more women choose Toni than all other home permanents combined!

Here's the reason! Toni contains its own gentle blend of the very same waving ingredients used in most expensive beauty shop lotions. Yet Toni costs only $1

Toni HOME PERMANENT

LOUELLA PARSONS' good news

One day, she was having breakfast in the drug store at the Beverly-Wilshire Hotel when Paramount talent scout, Milt Lewis, happened to be having a cup of coffee in the very same spot.

He looked—then gulped—and not because his coffee was too hot. He said later, "I was looking at the most beautiful girl I think I have ever seen."

Afraid she might think he was just a wolf, he almost stammered as he said, "Look here. I'm a Paramount talent scout. If you don't believe me, call me at the studio in half an hour. Then come over immediately for a test."

Even in her wildest dreams, Mary did not suspect that the role she would test for was with the great Olivier and Oscar-winning Jennifer Jones!

She was far too nervous to make a test that first day. But two days later, when she reported to Director William Wyler, Laurence Olivier was there, himself, to coach her in her lines and play two scenes from the movie with her!

Can you wonder that Mary Murphy, former package wrapper, thinks it's Christmas every day since fate brought her to that corner drug-store for an inexpensive breakfast before reporting at the store for her wrapping job?

HAD a wonderful time on my vacation at Del Mar.

Betty Grable got down to the track several times after being sure her movie with Dan Dailey wouldn't permit. The fans go crazy for Betty—she is always so sweet and cordial—and she looks glamorous even when she is wearing sports clothes.

She usually wears red or green coats—and with her blonde hair still worn shoulder length—she is easy to spot. I particularly noticed how nice she is to the fans with cameras. Always stops and poses for them—and so does Harry James.

Lucille Ball was recuperating at the same place I stayed—the Del Mar Hotel—and I saw her frequently. No one will ever know how heartbroken she and Desi Arnaz were over losing their expected baby. After ten years of marriage, they had been so thrilled when they thought the Stork was soon going to visit them.

But Lucille doesn't talk about it any more. Nor does Desi. The important thing is for her to get her health back—because she has been quite ill.

Getting back to the race track—Victor Mature was frequently spotted at the $2 windows, not seeming to care very much whether he won or lost. "I never bet enough to hurt," he grinned. "Mrs. Mature's little boy is too smart for that."

George Raft showed up one day with a beauty he seemed mad for. She looked no more than 15—but George solemnly assured me she was a snappy 22!

After all that fun, it isn't exactly easy to get back on the beam again. Isn't that the way you feel after your vacation? But that's all for now. See you next month!

Love in Bloom

Mum's the word with Shirley and Charles, but it sounds more like wedding bells—and come December, the gossips may be right!

BY ARTHUR L. CHARLES

Shirley Temple's been keeping steady company with Charles A. Black since they met in Honolulu last winter. Although the son of a wealthy man, Charles relies on himself for support. He's an account executive with a Los Angeles TV station.

■ THE TALK'S going around that sometime in December, after Shirley Temple's divorce decree becomes final, she'll marry Charles Alden Black, a thirty-two-year-old gentleman from San Francisco. The only ones not talking are Charles Black and Shirley Temple.

A New York reporter recently called on Charles Black in Los Angeles. Right now Black is an account executive at television station KTTV in Los Angeles, and all the talkers are sure he took the job to be near Shirley. It's a nice thought; a nice job; and maybe it's true.

Anyway, the reporter took a firm stance before Mr. Black and said, "Mr. Black, ever since you started going with Shirley Temple last April, my paper's been trying to get a line on you. Won't you give out with a little stuff, especially about you and Shirley?"

Black smiled pleasantly, and the reporter whipped out his pencil.

"I'm going to be very frank with you," Black said. "I'm not interested in any personal publicity or any publicity coupling me with Miss Temple."

The reporter sighed and put his pencil away.

"Ever since I got here those fan magazines have been howling for interviews," Black went on. "I don't know how many calls I've gotten. I'm not going to be interviewed by anyone, so you don't have to worry about getting scooped.

"I'm just not talking about myself, and I'm certainly not talking about Miss Temple. I've read all sorts of gibberish about us in the columns, how we plan to get married and take our honeymoon in every spot in the world from the Aleutians to Hawaii. But none of it's true.

"I know you've got a job to do, and I'd like to help you, but I come from San Francisco, not Hollywood, and we don't go in for publicity up there. As for biographical material on me, I'm pretty dull, wouldn't make good reading at all. Why don't you just drop the whole thing and let things continue as they are?

"I hate to be stubborn," he added, with a disarming grin, "but that's the way things are."

What way? the reporter might have wondered as he shook Black's hand. What, if anything, is going on between those two? Black didn't give (Continued on page 16)

"Blemishes* are no problem for me," says Mrs. Phyllis MacDonald, Toronto housewife. "Noxzema makes my skin look so much softer and cleaner. I apply it first thing in the morning and at bedtime, too. It's my all-around beauty aid."

"My skin was once dry and very sensitive," says successful Philadelphia career girl Barbara Swanson. "But since my Prom Queen days, I've used Noxzema regularly as my night cream. It has consistently taken care of my skin."

"You know," the reporter told his city editor, "compared to some of the jerks around this town, Black's a great guy. Level-headed. He knows what he wants and what he doesn't want.

"Won't talk about himself at all. None of that stuff about how he first met Shirley and where they went on their dates, or any of that. But if she married him, she's really gonna get a guy. He's got brains all right, and he can take Hollywood or leave it alone."

"Glad to hear you made a friend," replied the city editor. "But where the devil's my story?"

Is it love, or is it for laughs? You can count the people who know on two fingers.

There are a few facts about Charles Black that have beaten their way into the light: He comes from a socially prominent San Francisco family. His father, president of Pacific Gas and Electric, the largest public utility in northern California, is a self-made man. He started out in 1912 as an inspector for the Great Western Power Company and he worked his way up to his present powerful position. He wants his two sons to work their way up without asking for favors or accepting them.

As a result, few of the people who work with Charles Black today know that his old man heads one of the most powerful public utilities in the West.

Charles never mentions it. Neither does he comment about his war record. A Delta Upsilon fraternity brother of his at Stanford says, "If you ask Black what he did in World War II, he says, 'I was in the Navy,' and he let's it go at that. But the truth of the matter is that he was in Naval Intelligence, and he pulled off some of the most dangerous missions of the war.

"The Navy dropped him into the Dutch East Indies behind the Jap lines, and he had to provide Intelligence with news of what was going on, and brother, if you don't think that was dangerous, then you don't know anything about war.

"Black went into the Navy as a lieutenant and came out as a lieutenant commander. That should give you some idea about this guy. He was with the PT boats and on raiding missions, and well, he really did everything. I think he was in for almost five years.

"When he came out, a lot of us expected him to get a big job with his old man. No such thing. The guy enrolls at Harvard's Business Administration School.

"I'm not sure but I think he got his degree. Then, he came back to San Francisco. All the wise guys around the different clubs said Charley's father would make him a vice-president in charge of turning out the lights. But boy, they didn't know Charley. He goes down to the Golden State Milk Company, and he gets a job peddling milk from house to house. No fooling. From house to house. In one year, he works his way up to become assistant to the sales manager."

After his experience with the milk company, Black became assistant to the president of the C. & H. Sugar Company, the Hawaiian Pineapple Company, and went off to Honolulu, where he met Shirley.

Shirley was vacationing there with her daughter. Shirley's many Island friends invited her to all of their parties and social functions, and it was at one of these that her meeting with Charles Black took place. A mutual friend introduced them.

Maybe it wasn't love at first sight, or even second, but it seemed that Shirley gradually began to revise her estimate of the perfect male until it fit this dark-haired, handsome businessman.

When Shirley was a young girl attending school at Westlake, she used to tell the other girls that the man she'd marry would have to be tall and blond and gallant. And in a way, Jack Agar filled the bill. Charles Black, however, is the kind of man she hadn't dreamed about. "Jack and Charles are completely opposite," says one of Shirley's friends.

"I always liked Jack, but he was really too young to marry Shirley. He started proposing to her when she was 15.

"He was a young boy out of Chicago. He had no trade, no experience, no very great knowledge about anything. His father was dead, and maybe his mother spoiled him a little. After all, he was the only boy in the family. I'm sure, though, that he was very much in love, or at least infatuated, with Shirley.

"She felt the same way about him. She was too young to discriminate between infatuation and real love. She hadn't gone out with many boys. She'd had practically no experience with the college crowd. She didn't realize what marriage was. Neither did Jack. They plunged headlong into the ceremony and after six months, they both realized that they'd made a mistake.

"Shirley got married when she was too young. It's as simple as that. She didn't know the score, and she didn't know anything at all about men. There are mature men, you know, who make good husbands.

"Charles Black is that type of man.

"He's been around. The motion picture business means absolutely nothing to him. He has more money and an infinitely better background than 90 per cent of Hollywood's actors.

"I don't know whether he and Shirley will ever get married. I do know, however, that he's just about the nicest guy she's ever gone out with."

THAT Shirley Temple and Charles Black are intensely interested in each other there can be no denial.

After meeting Shirley in Honolulu, Charles resigned his position with the C. & H. Sugar Company and returned to San Francisco. The following weekend he took Shirley to the Bachelors' Ball, one of San Francisco's outstanding social functions.

Later that weekend, he drove down to Carmel, where Shirley introduced him to her parents. The Blacks, who belong to the exclusive Cypress Point Club, also happened to be staying on the peninsula at the time, so Charles took Shirley around to meet his parents. Everyone liked everyone else.

Shirley returned to Los Angeles, and a few days later Charles came to town!

He and Shirley began going around together, simultaneously denying that each had any intentions toward the other.

A few weeks later, Black got a job at a Los Angeles television station, and every columnist in the country became convinced that not long after December 6th, Shirley Temple will become Mrs. Charles Black.

How right or wrong this conjecture will be, only time can tell. Of one thing, however, you may rest assured, more than anything else in life, Shirley Temple wants to get married again.

She's had enough of her career, and while she would turn down no exciting roles, she is sensible enough to realize that life without a husband would be meaningless for her.

Anyway, one thing's sure, if Shirley marries again, you can bet your last sou she will stay with it for keeps. THE END

MOVIE REVIEWS

by Christopher Kane

Stagestruck Gloria De Haven announces to big sister Judy Garland that she's invited a troupe of actors to live at Judy's farm and put on their show in the barn. Farmer Judy isn't too pleased.

Judy gives in, with the understanding that the cast will help on the farm. Director Gene Kelly and his pal Phil Silvers bungle the chores, but not the show, with Gloria and a "big name" as leads.

The "big name" turns out to be a big heel when Hans Conreid persuades Gloria to go to New York with him for Broadway show. Gene talks fast and gets Judy to play the lead in his show.

Judy and Gene and the show make a great success. A romance has sprung up between them, too. This lets out Judy's rustic beau, Eddie Bracken, but disillusioned Gloria returns and falls for him.

SUMMER STOCK

■ What happens when a bunch of actors take over a farm in the country? Nothing like this, you can bet. Gloria De Haven wishes Gene Kelly and his troupe on sister Judy Garland, an earnest farmer. Judy works hard, loves her tractor, and is due to marry Eddie Bracken if he can stop sneezing long enough to ask her. Judy hates the actors but can't stand to break Gloria's heart, so she lets 'em stay. They're trying out a new show (pre-Broadway, of course) and first thing you know Judy's fallen in love with Gene, though he belongs to Gloria. Luckily, Gloria runs out on the gang just in time for Judy to take over the show's lead role, and Gene too. The extravaganza at the end is MGM-ly spectacular—if you can build a set like that one with the shimmering walls and the sparkling floors in your lil old barn, you can go into the silk-purse-out-of-a-sow's-ear business and get richer than Henry Ford. Still, it's very pretty, which is more than you can say for most lil old barns. Judy's her usual wonderful self; she seems kind of plump and healthy and a little on the matronly-build side as the picture opens, but she's burned her way back to a wraith by the time her last—and best—number comes up. It (the number) is an old one called Get Happy, and it's exciting the way only Garland could make it. Good new songs include You Wonderful You, and My Friendly Star, Gene Kelly's got charm to burn, and it's Technicolored.

EDGE OF DOOM

Edge of Doom is the story of a boy who kills a priest in a fit of rage, when he's told he can't have a big funeral for his mother. His mother's worked hard all her life, shared what little monies she's had with the church —and gone without shoes to do it. Yet when her husband died a suicide, he wasn't permitted to be buried in hallowed ground, and now that she herself is dead, she'll only be given the most simple rites by the church which she expected would take care of her splendidly. The boy's confusion, his love for his mother, his guilt, after he murders the priest, torture him, and you know his fate will be grim and inescapable. The picture, though, along with Farley Granger, who's generally one of my favorite actors, seemed to me not especially effective. Its dialogue is far from inspired, and its players appeared to be bogged down by—and in—the proceedings. There were occasional powerful moments—one dreadful scene where the boy is shopping for a casket, one intensely moving scene where the boy talks to his dead mother and tries to explain why he couldn't get more flowers—but by and large, the picture just isn't satisfying. There are too many weaknesses in its structure, so that its hero seems more sullen than tragic. Take the scene where Farley rushes home to his dying mother. He finds her on the street—she's been to church—and he starts berating her. She's too sick and weak to go out like this. He helps her half-way up the stairs to their apartment, and she smiles bravely and tells him to go to his girl friend who's been phoning. Okay. A loving mother might do that. But would a son, as concerned as this son is supposed to be, drop Ma's arm and dash off to have dinner with his fiancée, while Ma crawls back into her bed of pain with the aid of a neighbor lady? I don't believe it. Since Edge of Doom deals with a pretty unusual topic, you can call it brave, but I'm afraid you can't call it adequate.

Cast: Dana Andrews, Farley Granger, Joan Evans.—Goldwyn-RKO.

THE SCARF

Several good actors are put to work in a bad picture here, and it's a shame. The Scarf is draggy, pseudo-philosophic, episodic and unbelievable. John Ireland plays a fellow who escapes from the booby-hatch because he wants to find out if he really murdered his girl-friend. Only reason he never went to the electric chair is that he'd lost his memory. James Barton, an intellectual who raises turkeys, and talks to the wind, takes Kept my skin smooth and soft for romantic close-ups.

Being a liquid, Jergens is absorbed by thirsty skin.

CAN YOUR LOTION OR HAND CREAM PASS THIS FILM TEST?

To soften, a lotion or cream should be absorbed by upper layers of skin. Water won't "bead" on hand smoothed with Jergens Lotion. It contains quickly-absorbed ingredients that doctors recommend, no heavy oils that merely coat the skin with oily film.

Prove it with this simple test described above . . .

the fugitive boy in, shelters him. Boy meets Mercedes McCambridge who's so hard-boiled when she tosses a glance it's likely to break something. They become friends in a limited way, until she finds out he's an escaped murderer, and then that foolish girl turns chicken. If you can't figure out who's the real murderer, though, you'll surprise me. Especially when poor John Ireland goes around muttering, "David, my best friend. Why didn't he ever come to see me during the trial?" It's not a subtle film, though there are one or two things to recommend it. A nice scene with Mercedes as a singing waitress, and a bar-owner called Level Louie, who hates cousins. It's imitation Saroyan, mixed with adventure, but you have the feeling that if the script writers had worked a little harder, they might have got something.

Cast: John Ireland, Mercedes McCambridge, Emlyn Williams.—United Artists.

BORN TO BE BAD

Joan Fontaine is the lady who was born to be dretful. She acts all sweet and dewy, but she lures Joan Leslie's rich fiance (Zachary Scott) away from Joan Leslie, and she marries him, and then she tries to keep a love affair (with tall, rugged book-writer Robert Ryan) going on the side, and a man called Gobby (Mel Ferrer), who paints pictures, stands around through the entire movie making knowing comments about her. "Don't try to kid me, kiddo," he tells her, or words to that effect. "Remember me—I'm Gobby." If I was Gobby, I wouldn't brag about it, but that's life. Anyhow, Joan Fontaine comes out of the movie with only a few fur coats and a convertible car to show for her trouble, while virtuous Joan Leslie gets the by now second-hand but still sensationally rich Zachary Scott. I know it's a terrible picture, but it's kind of fun to watch—the women wear such lovely clothes, and the men are dark and attractive.

Cast: Joan Fontaine, Robert Ryan, Zachary Scott, Joan Leslie.—RKO.

LET'S DANCE

Mother love in Technicolor, with Betty Hutton as the girl who kidnaps her own son from his snooty great-grandmother's Boston house, and takes him to New York, where she plans to get a job and support him. (Betty's husband, father of the child, was killed in the war.) Betty meets Fred Astaire, an old pal, in New York, and he gets her a job in a nightclub. He's nuts, is the only trouble. Instead of concentrating on his dancing, he keeps wanting to be a business man, goes around trying to sell the Brooklyn Dodgers to big tycoons. His various enterprises come to naught, so Betty refuses to marry him on several occasions, and then some of great-grandma's lawyers track Betty and child down and try to remove child from Betty's custody because a night-club is no place to bring up a baby, even if he is learning French from the chef. Betty nearly elopes with Shepperd Strudwick, but Fred foils that, and there's a happy ending. Dance numbers are good, song numbers are good, picture's bright and sunny, though it seems exceptionally long.

Cast: Betty Hutton, Fred Astaire, Roland Young, Ruth Warrick.—Paramount.

Howard Duff is a photographer without a heart. If a man is drowning Howard'll take his picture, and then go away without throwing the poor guy a rope, and the blub-blub-blub echoing in his ears is as sweet music. He wants more money than a photographer can legitimately make, so he does blackmailing on the side, manages it so crook Lawrence Tierney has to pay him off $25,000 as a starter. (He took a picture of Tierney robbing a department store.) When Tierney plants a bomb in crook Brian Donlevy's automobile (these two crooks are deadly enemies), Howard stands by and watches as Brian gets in and blows up, even though Brian's been good to him. Howard wants Brian's wife, and besides, what a picture that explosion makes! Now Life magazine

Tierney gets to him first, but even as he shoots him dead, Howard's fingers reach up, squeeze the bulb, open the shutter on his camera, and he gets a perfect portrait of his murderer. What a man. THE TOAST OF NEW ORLEANS Down along the Louisiana bayous (what ever they are), everybody fishes, sings, throws women around, and has a joyous, virile time of it. Mario Lanza and Uncle J. Carroll Naish are two such hedonists, until opera impresario David Niven comes to town, hears Mario's magnificent—if uncultured—voice, and takes him back to New Orleans to train. Niven likes to discover talent, has built Kathryn Grayson into a star, intends to do the same with Mario. Mario falls in love with Kathryn. Kathryn teaches Mario good manners, and breaks his spirit. He gets his spirit back. There's Technicolor, some exciting shots of old New Orleans, or what I fondly expect old New Orleans must have looked like (I don't know if this picture was shot in Hollywood or on location), a lot of enjoyable singing, and another prize performance by J. Carrol Naish.

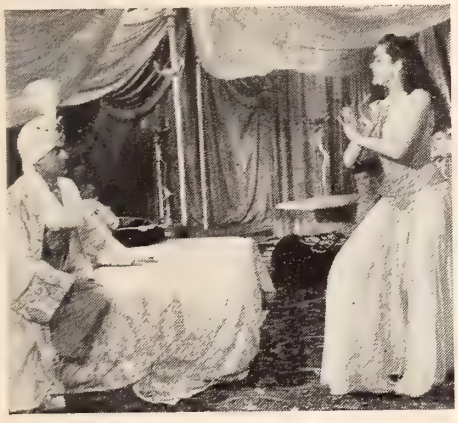
Cast: Kathryn Grayson, Mario Lanza, David Niven, J. Carroll Naish.—MGM.

THE BREAKING POINT

The Breaking Point is an unusually exciting picture. It has salty, stimulating, Hemingway-like dialogue (it's based on a story by Hemingway, and I'll bet a lot of the movie's speeches came straight from the book), its people are human, moody, and so real they often don't understand each other. Harry Morgan (John Garfield) is a fisherman. He owns a boat which can be chartered (he still owes money on it), he has a wife and two kids whom he loves. He gets into trouble when a man who hires him to sail to Mexico runs out without paying his bill, and Harry agrees to smuggle some Chinese aboard his boat, in order to get money to come home. He murders a man in self-defense, has his boat impounded by the Coast Guard (which has had wind of the Mexican adventure), gets in even deeper trouble with a gang of trigger-happy thieves, and is pursued throughout by Pat Neal, who can't believe he loves his wife so much he hasn't got a little attention left for her. There's nothing soft about this picture. It deals with elemental human emotions like hate and fear and the deep earthy need and satisfaction that's possible between some men and women. I've never liked Pat Neal before, yet I liked her enormously here; Wallace Ford as a frightened shyster lawyer is superb; there's adventure, sex, wry humor and a lot of other notable stuff in The Breaking Point. Cast: John Garfield, Patricia Neal, Phyllis Thaxter.—Warners.

SADDLE TRAMP

Through a series of accidents, Joel McCrea, cowboy, who likes to wander the West without responsibilities, finds himself saddled with four orphaned children whose eyes are big, but whose mouths are bigger. He has to feed these junior G-men, so he takes a job on a ranch. Rancher hates kids; Joel hides kids out in the woods, and smuggles food to them nightly. While he's gone one day, kids adopt Wanda Hendrix, who's fleeing from her lustful uncle, and there's one more hungry piece of trouble in Joel's life. Now Joel's boss is feuding with a ranch-owner next door, a Mexican named Martinez, and Joel's boss' wife is a kind of cracked Irish lady who believes in "little people," but everything works out fine. Joel settles the feud, marries Wanda, adopts the four children, and tells his itchy feet they're home to stay.
Cast: Joel McCrea, Wanda Hendrix, John Russell.—Universal-International.



DARK CITY

A bookie (Charlton Heston) and a night club singer (Lizabeth Scott) are the tortured lovers in this one. Charlton, who's had a horrid time in the army (his wife done him wrong) doesn't want to get "involved," Lizabeth does want t.g.i, and while they're arguing this out, several other things happen. Don De Fore comes to town, loses $5,000 that doesn't belong to him playing poker with Charlton's crooked friends, and kills himself. Charlton feels responsible, nobly wants to help De Fore's widow (Viveca Lindfors), also, less nobly, wants to cash the $5,000 check without being run in by the cops, etc. Furthermore, De Fore's escaped lunatic brother has sworn to get the men who made De Fore decease himself, and problem is added to problem until you're overwhelmed. Thing to shout about here is Charlton Heston, new, and a good actor. He looks sort of like Marlon Brando, sort of like Joseph Cotten, and he's very nice. Dean Jagger (in his first role since his academy award winning part in Twelve O'Clock High) is a pleasure as a police captain on the vice squad. Hardly a grade A film, but it is entertainment, off and on.

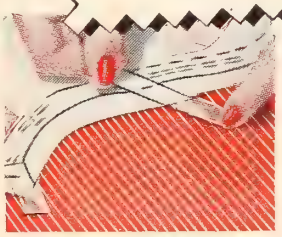
Cast: Charlton Heston, Lizabeth Scott, Viveca Lindfors.—Paramount.

THE DESERT HAWK



Here we have a picture which is a regular Arabian Nights encyclopedia. Characters include Sinbad, Aladdin, and the Princess Shaharazade. None of these seems even remotely related to his famous namesake, which I, for one, resent, but that's unimportant. Yvonne De Carlo, daughter of the Caliph of Bagdad, is the princess whom the wicked Prince of Teheran wishes to do away with. Wicked prince hopes the Caliph will think a blacksmith known as The Desert Hawk (Richard Greene) did the dastardly deed, and eliminate him (The Desert Hawk). Wicked prince oppresses the people of the desert, and The Desert Hawk defends the people of the desert. Wicked prince wants freedom for oppression. Murder, torture, and a little Mom says he's shy. He's Pop's top haying hand. But the girls will tell you Gary's big, and blond, and sorta beautiful. He can sing for them anytime; all the time.

by CONSUELO ANDERSON

Royalties are pouring in from Gary's hit records Play A Simple Melody and Sam's Song, recorded with a "friend" (Bing, of course). Decca wants to star him, but he'd rather play football at Bellarmine, a San Jose prep school.

■ The jukebox was giving out with Gary Crosby's rendition of Play A Simple Melody, and a couple of teen-agers were dreaming over their cokes in an ice-cream parlor on the south shore of Hayden Lake in Idaho. You can bet that teen-agers all over the country were sighing about the same boy at the same time, only what happened that minute in Idaho didn't happen anywhere else. A handsome blond fellow in blue jeans, T-shirt and crew cut sauntered into that ice-cream parlor.

"Well, who's that doll?" said one teen-ager to the other.

"Oh, you goon!" shrieked her friend. "Don't you know? He's the guy we're listening to. He's Gary—Gary Crosby!"

First teen-ager whirled around, stared, and swooned. For the past three months this behavior has become fashionable again among America's girls. On the basis of two recordings which he made with Bing, Gary Crosby can start asking Sinatra to move over. Play A Simple Melody and Sam's Song have already sold half a million copies. The labels on the records say Gary Crosby & Friend. Friend is Bing, and Gary is 17, five-feet-nine-and-a-half, and 185 pounds. The Decca Record Company has stumbled into another gold mine.

Dave Kapp, president of the company, says, "The kid reflects his father's charm and personality. He's got a good voice, a nice manner, he learns his songs quickly—and well, he just seems to be a chip off the old block."

As a matter of fact, the chip is so hot at the moment that he's already recorded three more songs with his Old Man for the Christmas trade. They're entitled That Christmas Feeling, I'd Like To Hitch A Ride With Santa Claus, and Happy Snow Man.

Decca would like Gary to record solo, but Dixie and Bing say no.

"This boy is not turning groaner," Bing says, "until he finishes his schooling. He's got one more year to go at Bellarmine (a preparatory school near San Jose, California) and after that, he's either going to Santa Clara or Stanford.

"He sings pretty well and we don't mind making (Continued on page 101)

Judy expresses her gratitude to Modern Screen's understanding readers

■ Dear Friends,

This is a thank-you note.

At a time when I've been gossip's victim and the target of a thousand lies, you people have stood by me. I won't ever forget that.

You've judged me not on the basis of headlines, rumor and innuendo but on my performances as an actress and entertainer.

Ever since the release of my last picture, Summer Stock, thousands of you have had the kindness to write me. You've congratulated me, encouraged me, and pledged me your future support. And for all this—let me repeat—I'm eternally grateful.

Inasmuch as it is impossible for me to reply individually to your more than 18,000 letters, I'm using this space in MODERN SCREEN to answer those questions you've most frequently asked.

I have a responsibility to you friends. Rather than let you be misguided by the flood of nonsense printed about me by reporters and uninformed writers who know none of the facts, I intend to fulfill my responsibility by telling you movie-goers the truth.

I am not quitting motion pictures. Movies are my life's blood. I love making motion pictures and always have ever since I was a little girl.

I do not intend, however, to make any films for the next six months. I'm just going to relax, take things easy, and regain my peace of mind.

For a while I expected to go to Paris with my daughter, Liza, and my husband, Vincente Minnelli—but his studio has decided to film all of An (Continued on page 83)

"If I should lose you"

Jane Powell doesn't know what the future holds. No one does. But if Geary should have to leave, he'll take with him a heartful of memories.

BY DORISMAE KERNS

■ Who would be there to light the candles on the dining room table if Geary should go. . . ? Who would be there to eat all the food Jane Powell loves to cook; who would toss the salad and brag about it and watch her with adoring eyes, if he should leave, even for just a while?

And he may leave her—he's in the active Army Reserve. Other husbands may go, too, and sweethearts and sons, and for each one left behind there'll be a special cause for sadness.

The six days a month Geary spends down in Long Beach, California, driving half-tracks and heavy tanks have taken on another meaning since Korea. It isn't only routine now. It may become a new way of life. Will he have to go back to what he faced in the winter of 1944? He was a ski-trooper then, in the Fifth Army located in Italy. On one particular day he was assigned to lead a group of twenty-six skiers armed with machine guns and carbines down a steep slope to a German artillery position. The Germans were wiped out, but only three of Geary's group came back alive. Geary was discharged a first lieutenant with a pocketful of battle stars. He's a likely candidate to be called again.

Jane's a marvelous cook—a fact Geary Steffen would be the last to deny! He's wild about her singing—buys records of her musicals (latest is Royal Wedding). They have 5000 records.

He fought in the streets for a way of life he didn't yet understand. Tony Curtis fought to protect his name, to protect his right to happiness . . .

BY JANE WILKIE

During the war he served on a submarine in the Pacific for three years. Was discharged in 1945.

Sudden success enabled Tony to furnish a home for his parents. Here he prepares to wash the windows.

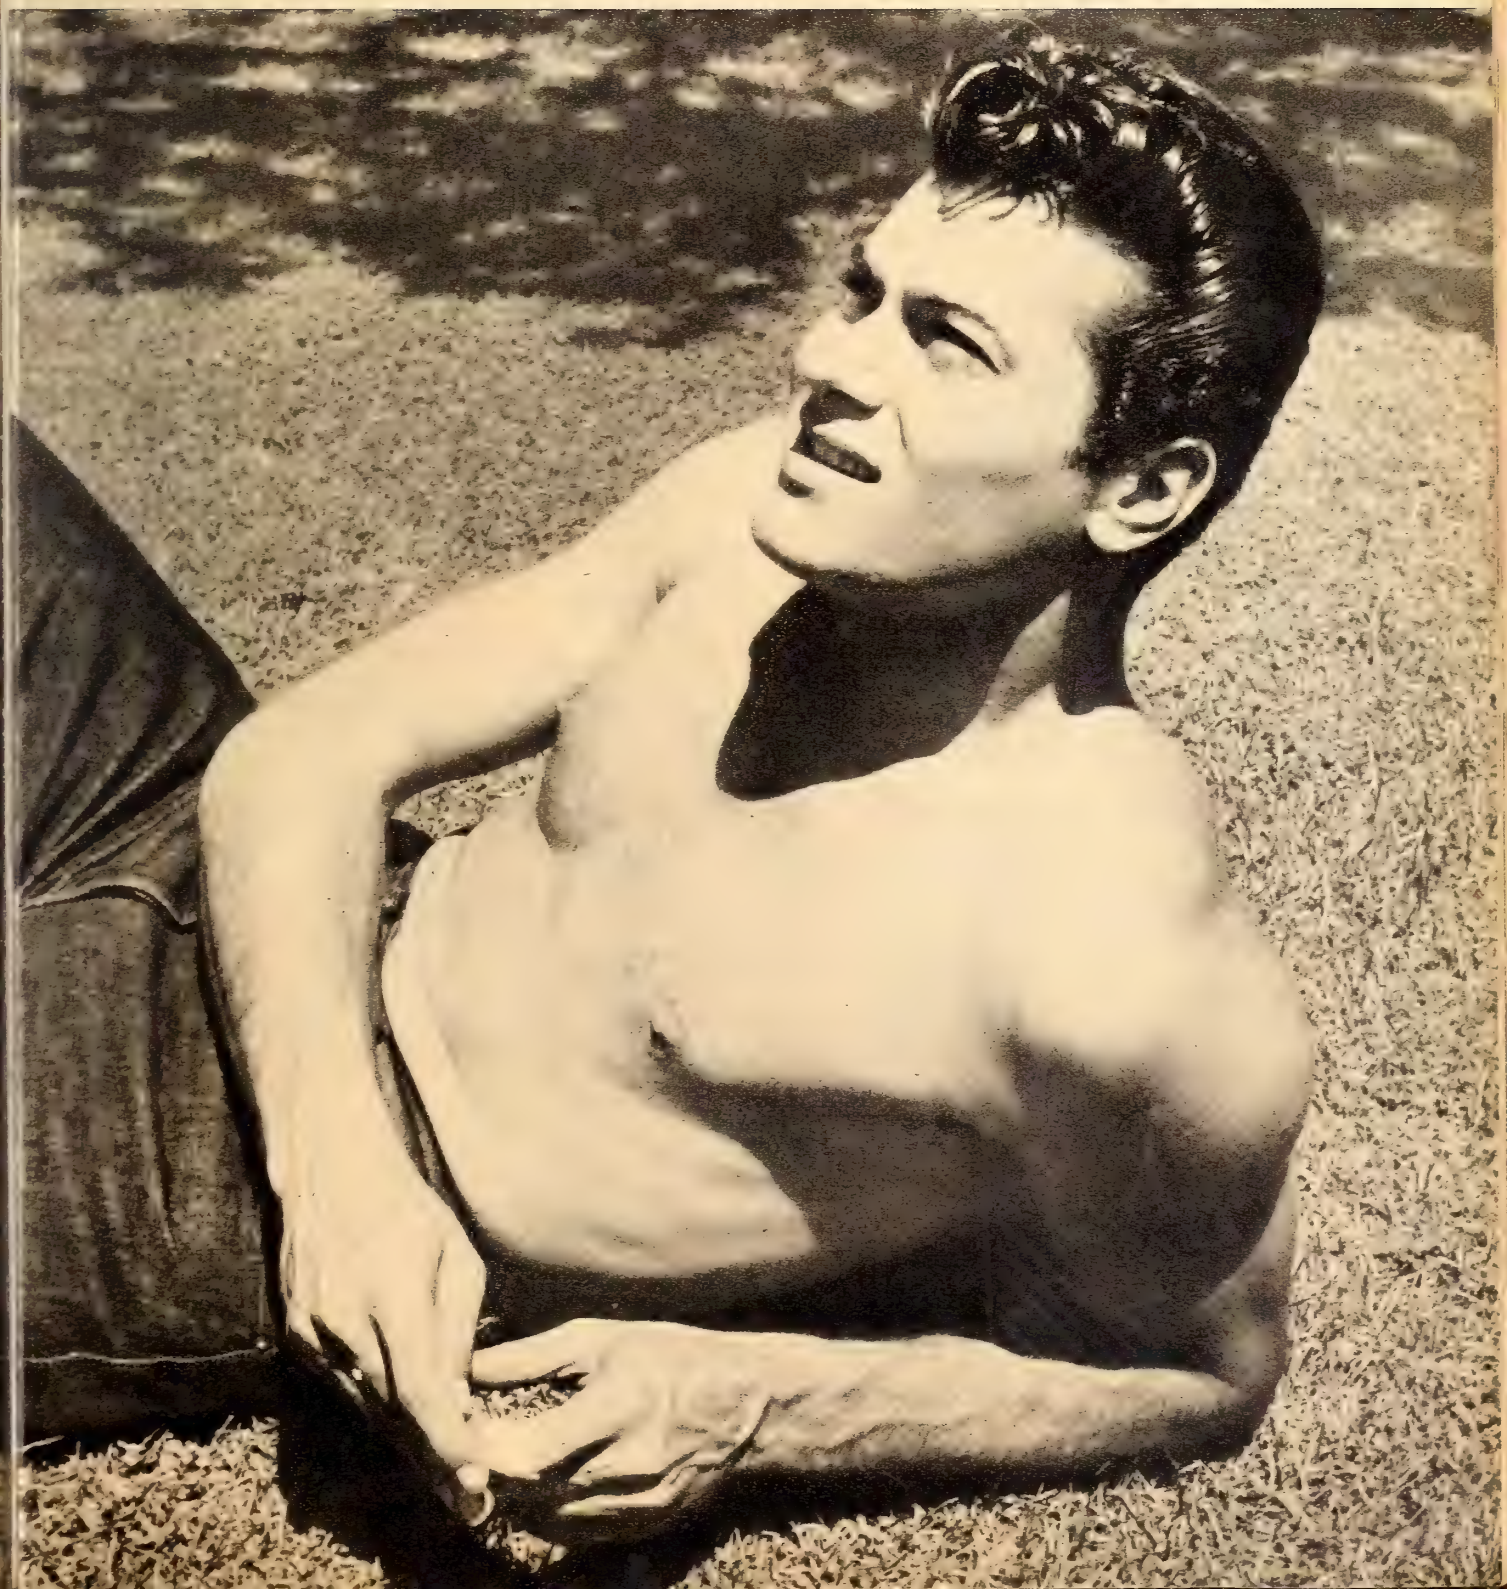
Constantly acquiring new interests, Tony is gathering credits for L.A.'s City College.

Kid brother Bobby worships Tony, who's glad that Bob's youth isn't poverty-ridden.

■ Back in the summer of 1938, a kid named Bernie Schwartz sat in a darkened Bronx theater, watching Errol Flynn leap about the screen in the role of Robin Hood. Bernie nudged the friend sitting next to him.

"Know what?" he said. "I'm gonna be a movie actor."

"Yuk, yuk," said his companion, "Come off the cloud."



"Why not?" said Bernie. "Geez. Imagine kissin' Olivia De Havilland."

"Stop hoggin' the popcorn," said his unfeeling friend.

Today Bernie Schwartz is a movie actor with a long term contract and the new name of Anthony Curtis, courtesy of Universal-International pictures. Executives of that studio are currently tossing Tony Curtis around in their minds like a hot potato. The fact is that his popularity has spread like a brush fire, and at this point demands that he be given star billing in a major production.

Not only the brass hats, but all employees of the lot down to the night watchmen are currently scratching their respective heads in an effort to determine how Tony's popularity got started. People saw him briefly as Yvonne De Carlo's dancing partner in Criss Cross, and the scene concentrated for the most part on the back of Tony's head. Then came a featured role in City Across the River. Four films followed, and in none of them did Tony have more than two pages of dialogue. He was just another cowboy in Sierra and just another soldier in Winchester 73. Not until Kansas Raiders was he (Continued on page 103)

BEWARE OF THE EXPERTS

by Ruth Roman

There's nothing like a bit of good advice, I always say—nothing worse, that is. For if there's one kind of person who taught me to think for myself, it's the guy who thinks he knows it all!

Rumors have Ruth secretly married to Bill Walsh, right, but she denies it. Here they attend a première with Raymond Massey.

■ It has been said that Hollywood is the Mecca of the know-it-alls—but I know from personal experience that people who know everything about everything turn up all over the country.

I have been encountering them all my life. There was one in Boston teaching school and another one there running a tea shop. I found them filling prescriptions in a Broadway drug store in New York and delivering the mail just off Broadway where I lived and occasionally paid the rent on time. I found them, for that matter, directing screen tests in New York for Hollywood studios and I found them filling jobs in Hollywood in which they were actually supposed to be know-it-alls . . . and weren't. They all gave me advice which would have led me exactly to where I didn't want to go, back home a failure, perhaps, or at least at best somewhere in the outer fringes of the show world I wanted to enter.

I aimed for the stage when I was halfway through grade school in Boston. But later when I was attending Blackstone Junior High I entered an art competition that almost cooked me. I painted a still life of some grapes and nearly had my bobby socks unfrizzled when I learned I had won first prize! The dangerous part was involved in the fact that the prize also included (Continued on page 74)

WHEN I WAS SIX, I GAVE MY FIRST PARTY

■ I guess I can blame it all on Louella Parsons. Blame it on her? Bless Louella's big heart, if it hadn't been for her a lot of things might not have happened just the way they did. My happy party, for one thing. And for another, the big climactic moment when Ted and I decided to go back together again so that now I am Mrs. Ted Briskin once more, instead of just plain matrimonially-displaced Betty Hutton.

Parties have always scared me a little

Sue Carol and Alan Ladd added to the romantic atmosphere at Betty's party. Married eight years, they're one couple who never have domestic discord.

The obvious happiness of Diana Lynn and her husband, John Lindsay, helped Betty decide to reconcile with Ted Briskin.

Prettier than her pictures, Janet Leigh wore gardenias in her hair, a pale blue tulle gown. Friends predict marriage for her and escort Arthur Loew, Jr.

Esther Williams and Ben Gage chatted enthusiastically with another guest about the baby they're expecting next December.

FLOP. WHEN I WAS TWENTY-SIX, I GAVE ANOTHER PARTY—ONLY WITH THIS ONE, MY FONDEST DREAM CAME TRUE.

since I was six years old. When my sixth birthday was coming up, I decided to give a party. The trouble with six year olds is that they sometimes get as confused as twenty-six year olds. I was determined to give the party, but I didn't know many kids in the neighborhood so I went around asking every youngster I saw. Then, envisioning the hundreds who might show up, I didn't tell mother about the party. So, on the day of the event only two little characters arrived and the affair turned out to be a dismal flop.

All this I was thinking about one night when I attended a beautiful party Louella Parsons was giving for a visiting potentate. I said to myself, "Betty, you've got to get over this complex about parties. It's high time you gave one yourself." At one and the same moment I decided that of all the people I'd like to have come as guest of honor the only choice could be Louie Sobol, the famous New York columnist who has helped hundreds of young people in all professions along the road to success.

Louie, as he is affectionately known to everyone in show business, was the only one who seemed to know how to spell my name right when I first came to New York. I could write a book about the many times he encouraged me when the going was rough. So I called Louie and asked him if I gave a party would he come to it and be my guy for the evening. He said he would.

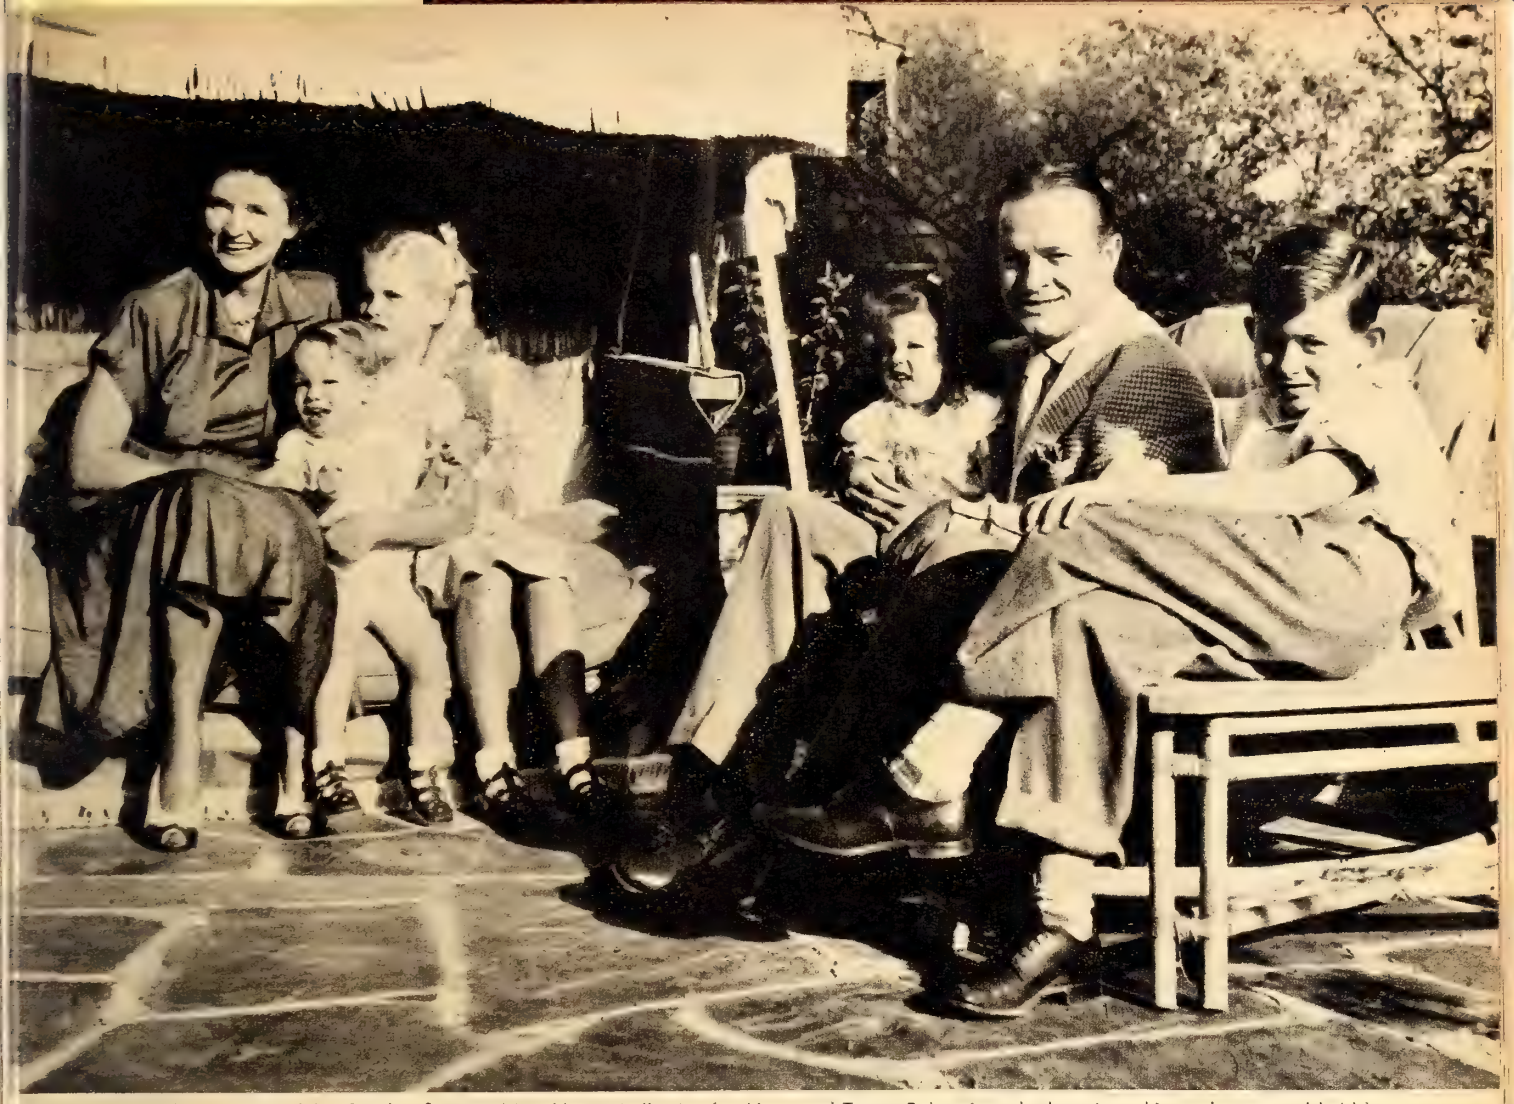
After that, things turned a little frantic. I decided there'd never be enough room in my house for all the people I wanted to come, so I consulted my good friend, the famous fashion designer, Don Loper. He told me to decide what sort of party I wanted and leave the rest in his hands.

The idea turned out to be a Strauss Waltz Party. Don decided that the best place would be the beautiful Crystal Room in the Beverly Hills Hotel and that it should be a candlelight ball so that all the girls would have a chance to look their most beautiful. At the last minute, I said to myself, "Golly, people are liable to waltz a couple of times and then say to themselves, 'What goes on here?' " so we augmented Hal Stearn's fifteen violinists with Freddie Carga's orchestra. I figured that about the time the waltzers wanted real action we'd give them the samba, conga and Charleston.



For awhile I went around assuring people that giving a party wasn't anything to get excited about, really, but the day of the party I sort of went to pieces. A couple of people called up and said they couldn't come. I found tears welling up in my eyes. I imagined myself sitting alone with the guest of honor and all that champagne (Ballinger '37, if you please). Then Don called. "Your gown is almost finished," he said, "and it's a dream." My spirits took a great big bounce. Then Louie Sobol called and asked if I minded a great deal if he brought his girl along. How was I to know when I asked him to be my date that he was about to propose to the beautiful Peggy Strohl?

By 7:00 that night I was a nervous breakdown looking for a place to go to pieces in. At 7:30 my gown still hadn't arrived. At 7:31 the messenger was at the door and seconds later I was dressed. What a Don Loper gown can do for a girl! As he said, it was a dream—a dream in Duchess satin lamé, embroidered in feather motif.

A few minutes later I ran up the steps of the Beverly Hills Hotel. Don whisked me to the entrance of the Crystal Room and placed me under a white spotlight. "Stay there," he ordered. I stayed for a quick thirty seconds. Then I began to feel a little ridiculous. Also, all over again, frightened silly. By the time the first guests arrived I was out of the spotlight and practically at the front door. Don kept asking me to stay in the spotlight, but I just couldn't. I'd come to parties too often and wondered where to put my left foot next. This time I was going to see that everyone met the hostess at least once on the way in.

Then the room began to whirl around me. The guests came in droves—all three hundred of them including the couples who had called with their regrets. The buffet supper was out of this world. I'd been to private parties, banquets and just plain restaurants in which the steaks, when they arrived, were colder than a dowager's first look at a burlesque show. These steaks, filet roasts carved at the last second, were piping hot. I'd told the wizards of the kitchen I wanted the people really fed at my party and they certainly were.

How I found faith

by Bob Hope

I saw two dear ones die in pain, and my belief was shattered— until I learned that suffering exists apart from God.

■ My mother was one of the gentlest, most self-sacrificing women who ever lived. She worked hard for her family of seven boys. She did her best for all of us. She sent us to church, looked after our physical and spiritual needs, and inspired us with her great faith in us.

When I first began to do a solo act on the stage, after I had flopped in a vaudeville act with a partner, she was the only one who had faith in me. That faith was so great that when I couldn't get a single booker in Chicago even to look at my act, she continued to believe in me. She went without things she needed for herself, to send me money to live on.

She was that way about all her boys, and about other people as well. A devout woman, she was the most beautiful exemplification I have ever met of a person who literally lived up to the Sermon on the Mount, the Golden Rule. "Do unto others as you would have others do unto you." That was the blessed spirit by which my mother lived.

All the early years of her life were spent in doing things (Continued on page 75)

For a while she was headed toward a breakdown, a bitter ending not new to Hollywood. But now, there's a happy, gentle Ann...

■ Last spring, work seemed to have caught up with Ann Blyth. She was tired. Even when she woke up in the morning she felt like taking a nap. And when she took a nap she didn't feel like getting up.

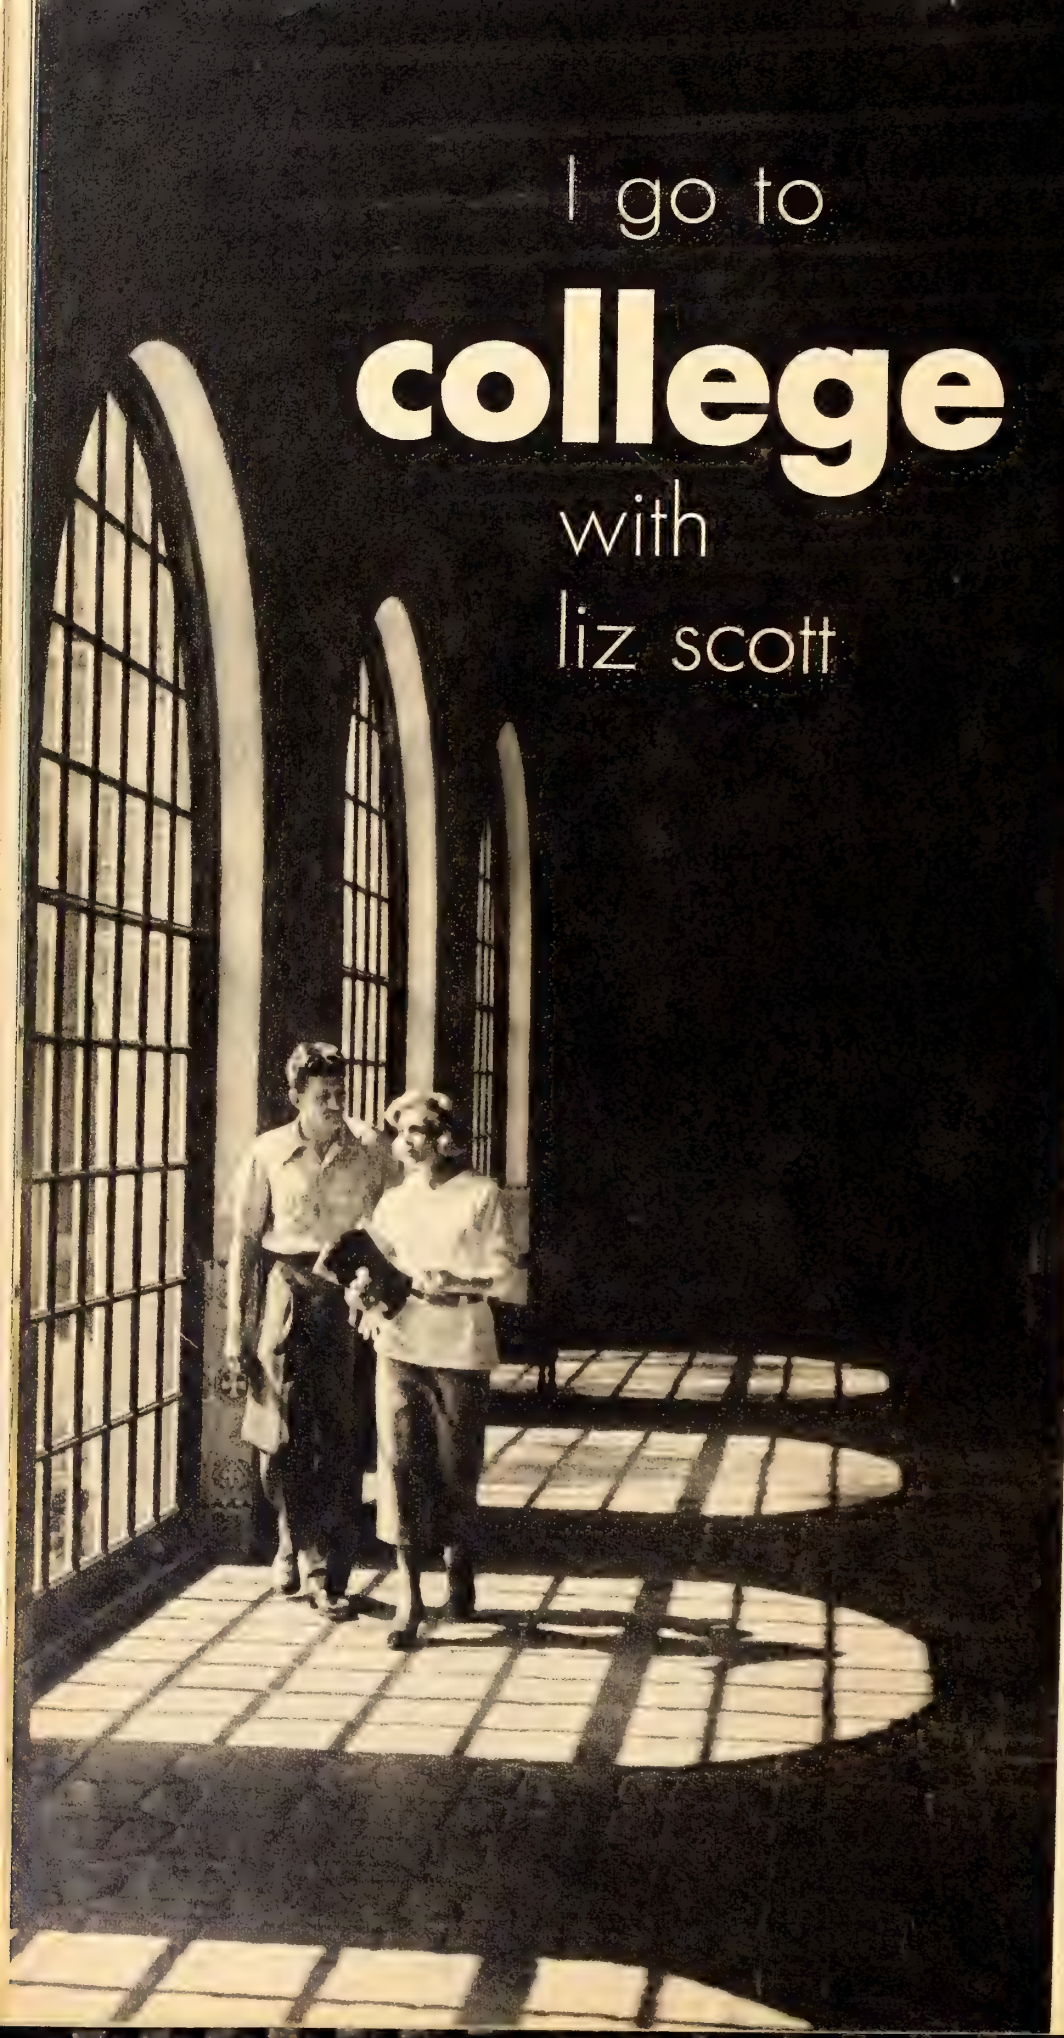
Here she was, just old enough to vote, and already it seemed as if she'd have to retire from public life. From the age of 14 she'd been on the go—round upon round of pictures, radio appearances, promotional tours and benefit performances had finally drained her energy, and now she was faced with the frightening thought that it was over. She was finished.

Before she'd give in, though, she went to Texas on a benefit tour with Pat O'Brien, then to Chicago, then back to Texas. Somewhere in between she got a severe case of laryngitis that kept her from singing for three days. The doctors cleared it up with penicillin, but her throat still pained her. She knew then that she was facing a crisis, but she'd committed herself to singing "My Foolish Heart" at the Academy Awards. And a commitment, to her, is a command.

She sang the song, and no one among the millions who heard her could have suspected that behind this rich, full voice there was nothing but nerve, because almost everything else was used up.

The next day Ann had to face facts. She was standing right at the end of the rope, and she could do one of two things. She could keep going by the use of stimulants, as others before her had done, or she could make a definite change in her way of life, as few had the courage to do. The former course had led many to disaster, the latter had brought others professional oblivion. But Ann knew that somehow and very soon she must regain the vigor she had lost; and her rare good sense told her that there was only one way to do it. She placed herself in the hands of a doctor.

Doctors, however, aren't miracle-makers. If your appendix is sore they'll take it out, and if you have a fever they'll bring it down, but what happens after they've done their work is often a question of luck.



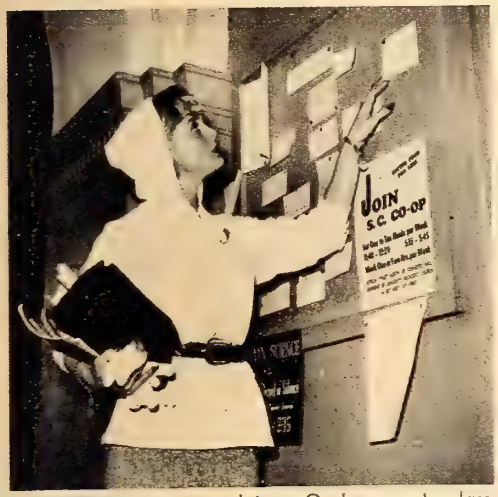
Ann's doctor told her that her tonsils were infected and were discharging poison into her system. Ann had known that her tonsils had been less than healthy (Continued on page 88)

Because of her health, Ann's cut down a lot of activities, but she couldn't resist appearing in the La Jolla Playhouse production of Our Town with Marshall Thompson. Mel Ferrer (left) directed.

Ann lunches at the Valencia Hotel in La Jolla with Marshall Thompson and Millard Mitchell. After a week's run in Our Town, she returned home to play opposite Mario Lanza in The Life of Caruso.

NO WONDER THEY CALL IT

■ When I sauntered into the classroom that first day of the semester, I was prepared for a course, in "Contemporary Political Thought." I expected great things of the University of Southern California—better known to football fans as the home of the Trojans. I envisioned everything from a Master's Degree to a ticket to the Rose Bowl Game, but not that Liz Scott would walk in with an armful of books and sit down right next to me.



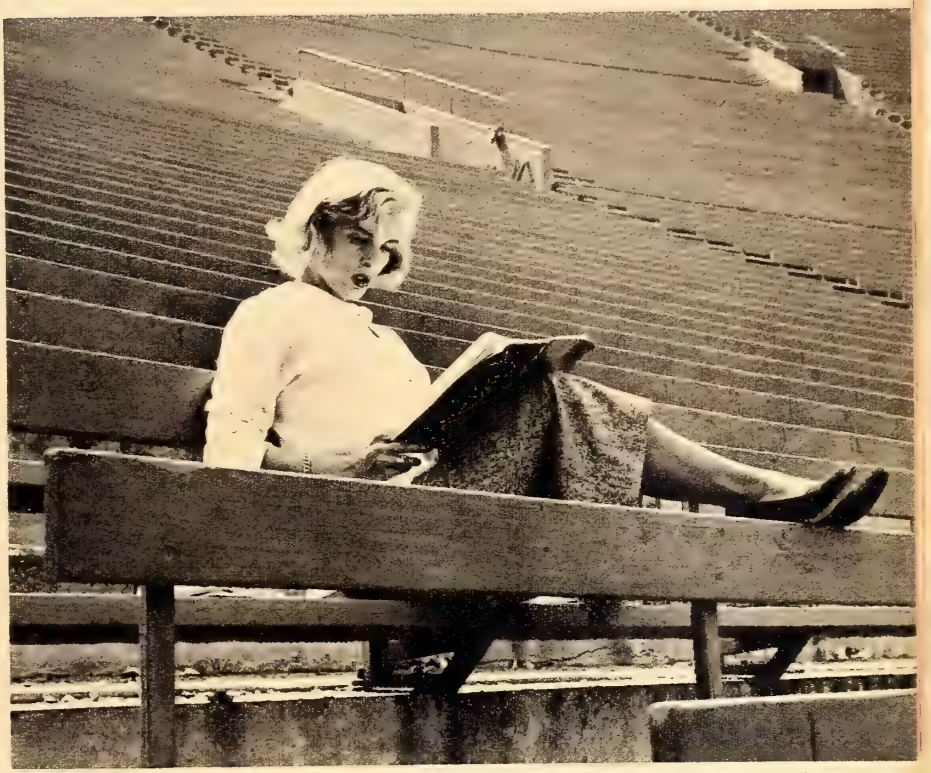
Imagine the effect, if you can. I was still recovering from the effect, when I heard that famous, sultry voice saying, "Is this Poly Sci four-fifty-one?" The words were those that any co-ed would have said, but where oh where can you find a co-ed who can say them the way she did!

Well, being an English major, I flashed back the very witty reply, "Oh . . . eh . . . ah . . . yes." That's what you call getting off on the right foot.

For the first few days she sat rather shyly at the rear of the classroom, but she was soon right up in the front row. Her enthusiasm compelled her to get up where she could be in the thick of it when the class discussion got hot. My enthusiasm compelled me to move up too.

Now you can't sit next to Liz Scott from 10 to 11 every morning five days a week and make like a mummy all the while. Not if you're human. She's real; you think of her as a classmate—well, as a mate anyway. So the days went by and we became acquainted. I soon found that she had another class every morning from 8:30 to 9:50 just before our political science course and that her earlier class was a course in philosophy—which I, being a lover of, quickly registered in. It's the most interesting philosophy (Continued on page 90)

HIGHER EDUCATION. WITH LIZ SCOTT IN THE NEXT SEAT, I'M WAY UP IN THE CLOUDS! by Dan Griffith



Liz is active in campus doings. On her way to class she checks the bulletin board, covered with ads and notices, to see what's going on at U. S. C.

East meets West on the campus. Liz discovers the international aspect of education as Dan introduces her to Vatsala Madkarni, Indian student.

Liz may have been a sultry songstress in Dark City, but she's just one of the gang at the coke sessions at Currie's, the corner ice cream parlor.

Liz finds the empty U.S.C. stadium a perfect place to study. The "Tawny Trojane," as the student paper calls her, is a serious student who works hard. However, she's not a recluse by any stretch of the imagination. She's too interested in people.

Co-ed Scott is in her element in an after-class discussion which may range from materialism to philosophy and back. On the lawn she enthusiastically argues her point with Dan Griffith before starting her 40-minute drive back to Hollywood.

Background for beauty

The Will Prices' Southern Colonial house.

■ Get any two Hollywood cameramen together, and brother, you'll have to pull them apart. "How do you do," they'll say to each other, and the next minute they'll be arguing—about lights and angles and profiles and which star looks best in an artificial rainstorm.

There's one lady, though, whose name settles every dispute. Her name is Maureen O'Hara. Put her in Technicolor and you don't even need a story. All you need is someone to turn on the switch and start the camera rolling.

The exciting thing about Maureen is that she doesn't ignore her beauty. She isn't swell-headed about it, but she's clever. For instance, she turned her Southern Colonial home into a perfect background for her vivid charms. It's as if an architect had studied her and built a house around her, and then as if a decorator went to work with all the subtlety that a cameraman uses to highlight beautiful features.

As it happened, the house wasn't built for Maureen, and she decorated it herself.

All the lanai (Hawaiian for porch) accessories are conversation pieces. Husband Will Price bought the gilt eagle above the couch "as a gentle reminder of my Southern ancestry." He's from Mississippi.

Sea-green, Maureen's most becoming shade, is the dominant color in the master bedroom. She designed the four-poster bed, with matching headboard and spread. The bench is from a Mississippi antique shop.

Six-year-old Bronwyn is proud of her grown-up four-poster bed and desk. The toy house in the corner was a birthday present from the John Fords. Bronwyn's favorite dolls live there with a toy piano.

The crystal chandelier lends an air of elegance to the dining room. Maureen found it in a little store—such a good bargain that she won't tell the price. The mahogany table comes from an Irish antique shop.

If houses could talk, this one would have a brogue. And if houses could think, this one would know it was made to mirror Maureen O'Hara's charms...

Maureen furnished the paneled library with odd pieces from her previous homes. She says it's a catch-all, but it's her favorite place to relax.

sycamores. The exterior is the ideal setting for her reddish hair, her milk-white skin, her blue eyes and delicately chiseled face. When Maureen strolls on the lawn, she resembles a Gainsborough painting.

Maureen must be aware of this, because ever since she married Will Price, she's wanted to own this particular home. Her husband wanted it, too. It reminds him of his old home in Mississippi.

When they lived in a small bungalow some years ago not very far from the home they own today, the Prices used to refer to their present residence as "our" house, even though they weren't living in it. They used to pass by it regularly as they drove to and from work, and almost as regularly, they would check the real estate agent and ask how much "our house" was. It was always too much.

Maureen had practically despaired of ever buying the house—in fact, she and Will had moved out of their cottage and into another place—when the agent phoned one day. "If you two are still interested in that Bel Air place," he suggested, "you'd better come right out." They flew.

They tried not to seem over-anxious. They attempted to study the house objectively and evaluate it calmly. "But it was no use," Maureen says. "We wanted it so badly that we couldn't be analytical about it. We just bought it!"

She used as much furniture from their previous home as possible—"We didn't have any money to throw around on furnishings." And then she began to select colors that would compliment her.

MAUREEN's favorite hue is green. It does wonders for her own high coloring. As a result, it's the dominant shade that appears in every room in the house. One continuous green broadloom carpet, for example, a Bigelow Sanford, extends from the foyer through the living room, dining room, up the stairs and along the second-floor hall.

In the long rectangular living room, Maureen used the same couch and fireside chairs that she and Will bought as newlyweds. She simply had them recovered for the third time in a quilted chartreuse. To this, she added new draperies with a gay print and a new mirror over the fireplace.

Everything else in the room dates from the early years of Maureen's marriage. Will, for example, who likes to collect things, bought their pair of wine coolers. He also found some antique offering plates in a Dublin second-hand store, and at Christmas time four years ago, he gave Maureen the two O'Neils beside the fireplace. One of them is a pastoral of the same Irish fishing village where the O'Hara family used to spend their summers when Maureen was a little girl. "When Will gave me the painting," Maureen says, "it was just as if someone had sent me a piece of my childhood."

Maureen loves every room in her house, but probably the most utilitarian of the lot is the dining room. The Prices eat all their meals here, including breakfast. "Maybe it's (Continued on page 64)

HOLLYWOOD YOUTH on Trial

The defendants are Youth, Talent and Beauty. Every day their dreams are put to judgment before a jury 14,000,000 strong.

BY RUTH SCOTT

■ One night, a few weeks after she married John Agar, Shirley Temple received a special delivery letter from a fan in Dallas, Texas.

"Dear Shirley," it began, "I can't tell you how happy I am, and I owe all my happiness to you.

"I've been in love with Mac for years now, ever since he latched on to my pigtails in grade school, only my folks wouldn't let me marry him. They said I was too young.

"When you got married at 17, however, my parents relented. 'If early marriage is good enough for Shirley Temple,' they said, 'then we guess it's okay for you.'

"Thank you, dear Shirley, for making our marriage possible. . . ."

A few weeks after this magazine had printed the story of Janet Leigh's two broken marriages (she'd entered her first at 15) the editor received this letter from a 17-year-old girl:

"Dear Sir: I thank you with all my heart for running your article on Janet Leigh.

"I am exactly in the same spot she was in. I eloped last year with a young man I thought I loved. It was just an infatuation, and the marriage has been annulled, but somehow I've been going around, convinced that I'm ruined and that life is over for me and that this whole town is talking behind my back.

"Yesterday, when I read about Janet Leigh, I suddenly realized that this sort of thing can happen to any girl, that it does happen every day in the week, that all a girl needs is courage to go on, to forget the past, and work for the future.

HOLLYWOOD YOUTH

"Look at what Janet Leigh has made of herself. I can do the same thing. . . ."

Multiply these two letters by 14,333,523—that's the number of 15-19 year-olds in the United States—and you get some small idea of the tremendous influence exerted in the world by a relatively small handful of young Hollywood stars.

These young celebrities are constantly on trial before the world of public opinion.

Some of them realize this fact. Others don't. Shirley Temple, for example, hated to file for divorce, "because I knew what it would do to the millions of other girls who had grown up with me."

Shirley knew that somehow her divorce would cause many girls to lose faith in the essential beauty and companionship of marriage. "That's why," she says, "I tried so very hard to make it a success."

Shirley has always been aware of the responsibilities of fame and the obligations she has to her fans.

Other stars have not been aware. Deanna Durbin, Judy Garland, Ava Gardner have all become so obsessed with their love-lives that the solution of their personal problems takes precedence over any other matters that enter their minds.

Ava never started out to be a career girl. It just happened. Her brother-in-law sent some photographs to MGM, and the next thing she knew she was out in Hollywood and married to Mickey Rooney. Responsibility to a young public of admirers has never burdened her conscience.

Mickey, himself, undeniably one of the greatest and most versatile young talents in the entire history of show business, would hardly be singled out as a model for the All-American boy. He has been married three times; no one would ever describe him as "refined," and his general (Continued on page 84)

How old is young?

After she finished Harriet Craig, Joan Crawford took her brood—Christina, Cynthia, Cathy and Christopher—to Alisal Ranch.

By SUSAN TRENT

■ You can be twenty-one and feel like a hundred when someone tries to drag you out to the tennis court and all you want to do is sit in the sun. Maybe it isn't normal, but it happens. And there are people of forty-one who are so full of joie de vivre that they'll make you droop like an old washcloth after they've raced you round the swimming pool. Blame it on the metabolism. More than likely, it's just a state of mind.

Joan Crawford, for one, is an example of how much the state of mind can accomplish. Of course, it'll be a long time before anyone pushing a wheelchair will ask Joan if she wants a lift, but even so, there are younger women. Younger women who act twice her age.

Maybe it's her children who keep Joan young—the four of them, Christina, Christopher and the twins, Cathy and Cynthia. Joan's not the kind of mother who sits back and thinks she's having a gay time because her children are laughing. When they're having fun, she's in there with them, sharing it.

Lately she's given up a lot of her extra-curricular activity just to be with them. She cooks, she buys their clothes, she invites Christina's Brownie troop over to her Brentwood home, and she spends her free afternoons in the pool turning her twins into (Continued on page 93)

Joan shares every game, every experience with each of her children. Up at 6:30 a.m. for a set of doubles with Tina, she spins her racquet to choose their side of the net.

Joan Crawford knows you're as old as you think you are, as young as you feel.

Christopher had one cowboy outfit for the morning and another getup for after five. Anxious to show his skill with a lasso, he ropes Joan in—she braces herself as the twins play nearby.

All the Crawfords are expert swimmers—even the twins, whom Joan's been coaching in the pool at home. Here, after their daily horseback ride in the mountains of Alisal Ranch, they take a dip.

Christopher took Joan to a dance, then dreamed with her by a campfire—a nightly custom at Alisal. Joan's dog, Cliquot, came, too.

They were brides too soon

by Sheilah Graham

Rhonda Fleming was a bride at 16, a mother at 18, and a divorcée at 24.

June Haver, teen-age bride, knew unhappiness early.

Esther Williams, married before 20, made a wise choice the second time.

They all married in their

■ How soon is too soon to get married? That of course depends on the man, the maid and the morals of the moment.

In India, for example, it's fine and dandy to marry the toothless baby of your family's choice. In points North, East and South, your relatives prefer you to wait until you can say "I do" without lisping.

In Hollywood practically anything can happen on the impatient marriage age front, and it sometimes does, sometimes disastrously.

Judy Garland was 17 when she sang her way into the Mrs. David Rose title. Shirley Temple was another sweet seventeen miss who wishes she had waited. Ditto Barbara Lawrence, now a young divorcée. Janet Leigh was 15 when she took the plunge that almost drowned her. Lana Turner was a head-strong 19 when Artie Shaw took her to dinner at 8 p.m. one night, wed her before dawn the same disenchanted evening. Deanna Durbin was 19 when she shouldn't have said "I do" to Vaughn Paul. And Rhonda Fleming, who didn't let many get ahead of her, says now, "I was a bride at 16, a mother at 18, a divorcée at 24. A girl is crazy if she marries anyone before she is twenty-something years old." Rhonda wants me to tell you her love story. "It may help some of your readers with theirs." That's what I hope anyway.

"I just about broke my mother's heart," said Rhonda, a sensible woman of 26, "when I ran off to Las Vegas to marry Tom Lane. She knew I was too young. But now I'm glad it all happened. Because maybe now I can help others not to make the same mistake. At 16 you think you know everything. No girl under 20 can possibly know the seriousness of marriage.

"But," continued Rhonda, leaning back in the armchair in my Beverly Hills living room, "the more my mother said 'Don't do it,' the more I wanted to. A couple of my girl friends were married so I wanted to be too. How silly could I get! Apart from my age, we weren't in any financial position to be married. And that's another reason why young people are fools to marry—they don't usually have enough money."

Wanda Hendrix had money. But Audie Murphy made her wait until she was 18 and he was more established as an actor. That didn't work out either. After champing at the bit for two years, their nerves were so on edge, the first angry word after the ceremony and Audie was hollering, "I quit."

Maybe that is the soft spot in young Hollywood marriages. Things go wrong and right away they scram to the divorce courts. What's happened to the old fashioned concept of stay married forever? Here, and in other big cities of course, the marriage plan seems to be "I'll have one husband while I'm a teen-ager, another for my twenties, one more for the thirties, etc." Anyway that's exactly what Bette Davis has been doing all these years. Will she get a new marital deal for her fifties?

"Tom and I," said Rhonda, (Continued on page 98)

my mama done told me

by Anne Baxter

Anne (of All About Eve) now masters life's little niceties which gave her so much trouble as a child. Husband John Hodiak benefits.

■ One Sunday afternoon when I was four, there was a terrible crash upstairs in her room, where Mother assumed I was taking a nap.

She rushed to the foot of the stairs and called, "What happened, Anne?"

I opened the bedroom door and came into view. "Nothing," I said.

Through the open door behind me wafted a traitorous aroma of perfume, which promptly descended to the stairs where Mother was standing. She beckoned to me, and I reluctantly obeyed.

"Anne," she asked gently, "are you sure you didn't break something?"

I shook my head by way of denial.

"But I know a perfume bottle was broken," said Mother, "and you must know how it happened."

"Well-l-l," I conceded, "maybe a little bottle did fall over on the table. . . ."

Mother closed her eyes for a while and then opened them and smiled at me. "We have a long way to go, Anne, haven't we?" she asked. "A long, long way!"

Even then I knew what she meant. There was not only my utter disinterest in speaking the truth or my ability to get my clothes so dirty in one wearing that the dirt had to be sort of bulldozed off before they could be washed; there was my temper, my wild impulsiveness, my disorderly way of thinking and, finally, my genius for breaking things around the house. I was aghast at the difficulties ahead. Would we ever make it?

Well, as Mother knows, we haven't . . . quite. There is still work to be done. But thanks to her wise and gentle ways, "we" have made progress, and I hereby acknowledge her guidance. Most of what a child should know about life, including a lot that some parents still can't bring themselves to tell, was explained to me carefully and even beautifully by her. Later, when I heard this same story from other sources, usually whispered and unhealthily slanted, I was doubly grateful to her.

There is a certain type of person for whom things always seem to go wrong. That was the first great talent I exhibited as a tot and much of this genius still remains with me. I can remember when I was four trying to make a good impression on a little boy cousin of mine who was brought to visit us. I can't recall the details of my campaign, but at the end, while our parents were upstairs in the apartment talking, we were downstairs beating each other over the head with soup ladles. The more I realized I had failed to make him like me, the harder I beat him.

In the "careful planning" department I haven't improved much. There was a Sunday morning not long ago when a writer was due to come for both "brunch" and an interview. I wanted to make a good impression, and I thought it would be cheery if I whipped up some scrambled eggs in a chafing dish right on the living room coffee table. I could just see myself as he was going to see me—a happy little homemaker, adept at everything she does. I even thought of some cute little side remarks I might make as the eggs coddled themselves into appetizing firmness and I gracefully served them to my guests.

Came the day and I found I was all set except for alcohol to burn under the dish. There wasn't time to run out and get some. I started a frantic (Continued on page 100)

Perfectly groomed in public, Anne always gets the eye from John before leaving the house. She'd never forgive his ignoring a flaw in her makeup.

Married since 1946, the Hodiaks attend a gala première at Grauman's Chinese Theater, looking as happy as newlyweds.

Those three little letters that loom so big have put an end to one life of Elizabeth Taylor's—her girlhood—and started her on the sweet, exciting story of another—the life of a woman and a man's wife.

I'm sure no adored star and worshipped daughter ever had a more wonderful honeymoon or a warmer welcome when she got home—and by now her wedding, her tour, her return are memories to Elizabeth, memories surely which will linger with her forever but memories, too, that fade in significance every minute as her new life unfolds and its adult problems press.

Here she is home again and laughing, "Don't everyone stare at me so. Why, I'm just the same Elizabeth, just the same girl!"

We are proud to present this true and poignant story of a rising young actress named Helene London whose movie career seemed to be over before it started. This is a story of how the miracle of modern surgery transformed a heartbroken girl into a poised and beautiful woman. We believe that in Helene's account of her experiences lies the solution of her own problems. However, we do not recommend plastic surgery as a cure-all. This story stands purely on its individual merits. Plastic surgery should be undergone only with the approval of the family physician, and with the selection of a surgeon of unquestioned stature.—The Editors

■ "Now we'll take the profile, Miss London," the photographer said. I turned in my chair until I got the angle he wanted. They set the lights. The hairdresser ran over and brushed a stray lock into place.

"That does it. By the way, you've got a wonderful profile, Miss London."

They started taking down the lights and packing up their equipment. All in a day's work to them, but the excitement was still with me. As I walked back to my dressing room the words rang in my ears . . . "wonderful profile . . . wonderful profile, Miss London . . . wonderful."

Throw that guide book away! Here's a genuine Clift's tour of Europe.

"NEXT time I take a trip anywhere I'll let you have an exclusive story." Montgomery Clift told us. "Yeah," we said, but we knew better. First place, you can never get in touch with the guy. He doesn't have a phone. You want to talk to him, you have to whisper it around, and someday he may step into a pay booth to call you. One thing we just discovered about Monty, though. He'll use up all his nickels to keep a promise. So on these pages we have an exclusive picture story of his recent holiday in Europe. Picture up above is Clift himself, halfway out of a windowsill in Naples' Excelsior Hotel. His socks and Flip McCarthy's diapers are evident. Flip's dad, Kevin, took these photos. (See next page)

Holiday-bound Clift sweats out the Customs bottleneck

ANYONE even vaguely acquainted with Clift can guess the kind of tour he'd take. Monte Carlo? Lido? Cannes? Naw. Too ritzy. Clift's the kind of guy who, when he's in Rome, does what he pleases. Plays with children in the garden of the Villa Borghese, wanders through sidestreets with a camera ready, takes sunbaths on a parkbench (as you can see on opposite page). That way he meets the people. His tour started in Paris where he was to meet the Kevin McCarthys. Kevin almost lost his wife and child on the train trip to Paris. He was sitting in the dining car which was suddenly switched and sent to Switzerland. But they all got back together again. After Paris, came Italy. Monty saw the movie studios in Milan and producer-director Vittorio de Sica, and developed a new respect for movies.

"This one," Monty says, "might be titled, 'It didn't come out on the negative.'" Too bad. There must have been something about Amalfi to warrant that angle shot.

After inspecting the famous Duomo built in 937 and restored in 1861 (which accounts for its half-Arab, half-Romanesque architecture) Clift basks in the Florentine sun. His latest movie is A Place in the Sun.

Monty wasn't idle all the time. In Milan he makes it clear to director Vittorio de Sica (left), of Bicycle Thief fame, that any time he needs an actor, Clift'll gladly oblige.

Comparing experiences with a character actor on the set of de Sica's Miracle in Milan, Monty came away impressed with the skill and seriousness of Italian film-makers.

A little known side of Clift's character is his interest in children, particularly Flip McCarthy (above with his mother). Here they tour the winding alleys and arched passageways of Amalfi, once ruler of the seas.

Monty loved matching wits with the local sharpies. The cab driver got a bang out of the repartee involved in bargaining for an American Parker pen—which Monty bought.

It was fun leaving their high perched hotel (the Capachini seen in the background) to explore ancient Amalfi. Next, Clift and the McCarthys left for home on the Queen Mary.

The rains came, and stayed for two days at Ravello, the famous romantic spot above the gulf of Salerno. However, nothing could dampen Augusta McCarthy's interest in the place of Bergman's Italian idyll.

"I MET a very interesting fellow in Florence," Monty says. "A movie fan who couldn't speak a word of English or French. I couldn't speak Italian. So we talked furiously for almost an hour." Monty talked furiously with anyone who approached him, and a couple of sharpies (whom you can see up on the left) somehow talked him into buying a Parker pen.

Over at Ponte Vecchio, the only bridge left standing in Florence after the war, he made friends with a man who operated an outdoor photography shop. The photographer had pictures of his customers clipped onto billboards for passersby to see. This idea appealed to Monty. "Nice place to browse around for a couple of weeks," he said. But he didn't browse that long. He had to get on to Amalfi.

(Continued from page 46) an old-fashioned custom," she says, "but I like a well-set table with silver and glassware and placemats and all the trimmings. Even on Sunday nights when we have an impromptu barbecue and start calling up friends, we end up in the dining room.

THIS mahogany job was bought by Maureen in an Irish antique shop several years ago. She likes to mouse around furniture shops in her spare time, and every so often, she comes up with a good buy. The crystal chandelier is a good example. Maureen discovered it in a little Los Angeles store near Chinatown. "And I won't tell you what it costs," she says.

Like everything else in the house, it's consistent with the dominant one-color decorating theme. So, too, are the draperies and chair sets in the dining room which boast green and white-striped chintz.

When Maureen wears a hostess gown to one of her own dinner parties, she makes sure that it blends with green. Many actresses, in fact, know the trick of matching their clothes to their environment.

Another popular spot in the Price house is the lanai (an Hawaiian name for porch or patio). When the Prices first bought the house, this spot was simply an open porch. It gets pretty cold in California during the nights, so Maureen finally decided to enclose the porch in glass. Then she furnished it with the same fabrics used in the living room.

All the lanai accessories are conversation pieces. The huge gilt eagle that hangs over the couch is known as "The Confederate." Will picked it up somewhere "as a gentle reminder of my southern ancestry." The framed documents on either side of the portrait of Will's grandfather are Confederate bonds that belonged to grandpappy. Around the household, they're jokingly referred to as Bronwyn's inheritance. Bronwyn is the Price's six-year-old daughter. She loves to ramble around the pine-paneled library which her mother insists is "a catch-all for the furniture that didn't fit anywhere else." Actually, this judgment is too harsh. The furnishings are hand-me-downs, and the plaid draperies come from Sears, Roebuck & Co., but they harmonize with the old furniture.

WHEN it came to decorating the master bedroom, Maureen and her painter decided on a sea-green for the walls and a sea-green bedspread. The color is restful and warm. It doesn't show smudges, yet it's soft enough for a woman's room.

It was also Maureen's ingenuity that devised a four poster bed out of what was originally a box spring and mattress. "After the bed was finished, I simply didn't like it," she recalls. "I knew something was wrong but I couldn't put my finger on it. One day I was rummaging around the storage basement and I came across four solid bedposts and a needlepoint bench that Will had picked up in a Mississippi antique shop. My first impulse was to use them with their mahogany finish. But Will didn't like it, so I had them painted green!"

Down the hall from her parents' quarters is Bronwyn's little-girl room. Whenever guests call on the Prices, Bronwyn waits for a lull in the conversation and then says, "Wouldn't you like to see my big bed?" Once she gets visitors in her room, she shows off her grown-up desk and her shelf for religious figurines.

And when the proper time comes, you can bet that Bronwyn will be equipped to create a background for herself as fitting as the one Maureen created for her incredible, natural, Irish beauty. THE END the time of my life

(Continued from page 38) time that I didn't have a moment to think how much feminine beauty there was around with which a girl had to compete. I hadn't planned on a show, figuring I'd just get up and thank the people for coming, but Milton Berle came up like gangbusters and the place broke into a riot of fun with Georgie Jessel and a whole gang of others staging impromptu skits.

Bob Hope got up and said, "Where did she get the money to give a party like this?" After the roof fell in with laughter I found myself at the mike saying, "I've worked a lot of parties like this, but I never thought I'd be able to give one." I tried to run away but Bob wouldn't let me. Singing at your own party, I thought, was real corny. Somehow I got through "Blue Heaven." I "got off" on "There's No Business Like Show Business" with some help from Dinah Shore who then slayed them with "Falling In Love Is Wonderful."

I don't remember much after that, except Louie Sobel with tears in his eyes, gazing at the girl who was to be his bride . . . the Charleston contest with Mitch Leisen and Connie Moore really doing the town . . . dancing with all the handsome men in the place . . . then standing at the door, saying goodbye to the last guest, happy about my party but feeling all alone like I never had before.

Now I'll have to be really serious. The truth is that for two weeks before, Ted and I had talked about a reconciliation. I had seen him in Chicago and we'd about decided to go back together again. On the night of the party I could hardly sleep. I reached for the phone in the morning to call him in Chicago. It rang just as I did. I was talking to Ted, and in the three words we each said to the other our decision was made.

It wasn't just that I gave a party and went home alone without a beau. It all seemed to add up. Somehow I realized that the party was the climax of all the fun I wanted in my lifetime and that the real values in friends, family and fame all blended together.

A few days later Ted and I flew down out of the clouds. There, waiting at the airport, were Lindsay and Candy, with Kirshey, the nurse. The children grabbed Ted around his knees, shouting joyously. It was a matter of minutes before he could walk down the runway. That night my two darlings completely ignored me while Ted read them their bedtime stories. The next day, as we had dinner at the Brown Derby, Ted was so busy feeding both of them that I felt like the uninvited guest.

But was I happy? Am I happy? You're darned right I am! THE END clothes sense without dollars

by connie bartel, fashion editor

■ Have you got that certain wonderful something called "clothes sense"? That instinct that makes you invariably pick the right costume at the right time—and add the right accessories?

If you feel hopelessly that you never look the way you want, no matter how you try—take heart. For clothes sense, thank goodness, has lots to do with taste, and little to do with money.

It's a matter of knowing your type, and sticking to it. It's a question of insisting on perfect fit, and taking advantage of the many proportioned size ranges available today. It's the practice of spending as much care in selecting the right girdle as the right suit.

To illustrate: opposite Arlene Dahl offers a bright example of dressing to type. She's vivid and colorful, and so's her gay Swedish skirt and blouse. On pages 68 to 69 we prove our point about the right underpinnings with a hand picked collection of girdles and bras. On pages 70 to 71 we illustrate the wonderful job designers are doing to fit you personally and properly. And on page 72 we wind up with a little lesson in dressing to type with two date dresses, one sophisticated, one young.

Every one of these fashions, as always, bears the gentlest of price tags.

Arlene Dahl beautiful swede in swedish cotton

■ Arlene Dahl, the Swedish redhead (Minnesota division) you'll soon see in MGM's Three Little Words, outshines the harvest moon in a wonderful blouse and skirt adapted straight from the Swedish.

The blouse is cotton broadcloth with two-timing buttons, push-up sleeves and the longest cuffs in the world. The patchwork skirt is a wonderfully heavy cotton called hambo (a Swedish dance to you). It's a natural for fall dates (square dances, maybe)—but we think you'll want to wear it all winter and right straight through next summer—it's the kind of costume that can become a habit!

Skirt comes in tangerine-russet-plum combination shown; or gold-navy-rust-green. Blouse comes in white, mauve, gold, beige, dark green, tangerine, navy, black. Sizes 10-16. Blouse, $8.95. Skirt, $8.95.

(Continued from page 35) a three-year art scholarship to the Museum of Fine Arts in Boston and everybody insisted that I would be crazy to pass it up. "But I don't want to be an artist!" I insisted. "I want to act!"

Nobody listened; or, rather, they said I didn't know anything about it and should pay attention to those who did—the experts. It's not easy for a young girl to fight against opposition like that. I did it but I didn't make friends in the process. I turned the scholarship over to the boy who had won second prize and today he is a well known commercial artist in New York. Secretly I liked his paintings better than mine anyway. Today I still paint—things like my porch which I have just bedecked with vines and Pennsylvania Dutch figures. This job will never win a prize but for a girl who didn't have a three year art course it ain't bad.

AFTER I joined the Elizabeth Peabody Playhouse in Boston I went to work in a tea shop. I was hired as a waitress but rehearsed dialects as I worked, which promptly incurred the criticism of the manager who told me that if I would pay attention to the art of toting a tray and lose my "high falutin'" ideas I'd be better off. I didn't neglect my patrons but I would try out different voices on them. Sometimes I would adopt a Back Bay accent, sometimes I spoke à la Katharine Hepburn or Bette Davis, and he even caught me once talking like Laurence Olivier in Wuthering Heights. He didn't know it was Olivier. He accused me of talking like Arthur Treacher!

When I was sixteen and had appeared in about fifty amateur and semi-professional shows in and around Boston I decided it was time to try Broadway. The combined vote of friends and the people with whom I had played amounted to a staggering "Nay!" but just to show you what silly little girls are made of I went anyway. I was scared and nervous but I just had to fulfill the urge within me. Not six weeks after I arrived in New York something happened that I was sure would make me one of the youngest successes in the history of show business—Sam Goldwyn wanted me for a test. It was made and not ten days afterward I was practically the youngest flop in the business. Mr. Goldwyn ruled against me. I don't blame him. Not only he, but I, had been double-crossed by the know-it-alls.

Mr. Goldwyn had asked that the test be made without makeup and under conditions that would show my hair whipping in the wind as I recited some lines . . . any lines. He had already sensed something that I wasn't sure about for years to come; that my features were too sharp for accentuating make-up, I looked better with just a softening touch or two of the pencil. But he got ill and had to leave for California before the test was set. I was placed in the hands of a local director. The latter, when I showed up, announced I was to do a scene from Street Scene, which he had selected, and what is more, I was to be made up for it and play the role in a sophisticated manner.

"We're really going to impress Mr. Goldwyn with you," he told me.

"But I thought Mr. Goldwyn didn't want me made up," I protested.

"Look, you're nothing but a child," he replied. "What do you know about it?"

There was nothing I could say; I was just a child. The test was made and the only word I got was that it was negative. Mr. Goldwyn, I suppose, was disappointed. came very close to going off the deep end.

IT's funny, but history repeated itself a few years later with my first formal test in Hollywood. I knew by this time what sort of things I did well and what I didn't, and I also knew the kind of make-up that helped me and the kind that hindered. But again I had nothing to say. A studio was making the test, which had been obtained for me by my agent, and the studio had its know-it-alls who were out to defend their reputations.

The shooting took place only the second month after I had come West and the report on it was so bad that I felt as if I had been blasted out of show business forever. It was a flat verdict that read, "Just not motion picture material."

"What are we going to do now?" I asked my agent.

"We? . . ." he asked, and he didn't have to say another word. He was impressed by the experts. He was dropping me.

I suppose I did about the same thing any girl would do in a spot like that. I went home to my room, carefully lowered the shades, decided not to kill myself just yet, took one look at myself in the mirror and fell on the bed weeping. Two tests . . . and both bad!

I thought of what I had done in New York after the Goldwyn test. I had worked as a cigarette girl, as a hat check girl and a model. After a while I had gotten up courage and gone after a show part again. I had tried out for the lead in Junior Miss and had failed; my body was too mature and my face too young, they told me. And just to make sure I got the idea one of the coaches took me aside and said, "You're a nice girl—why don't you go home and forget about show business?"

"Why don't you go home . . .?" I'd been told that a thousand times. "Why don't you get married and have a family instead of trying for the stage?" That one, too, has been fired at me again and again. And the other one was, "Look, kiddo, with all the tens of thousands of youngsters trying for the spotlight what chance have you got? Didn't they teach you any mathematics in school?"

Which shows you how crazy you have to be sometimes to get anywhere because as soon as I saved up $200, I spent half of the money for a railroad ticket to Hollywood.

SOMEHOW I recovered from that heartbreaking Hollywood test and for nearly four years I plugged away steadily, and only towards the latter part of this period did I begin to confound the experts. I began to get bits in pictures with here and there a better part sandwiched in. And then began further tests, one after the other, until I had had eighty of them—count them, eighty!—with some of the most provocative and generally unsatisfying results imaginable.

For instance, another girl and I were tested for the lead in a serial picture, Jungle Princess, at Universal-International. I won . . . but did I? Yes, I got the role of the serial queen but the other girl got the star part in a Walter Wanger feature! The name of the picture was Salome, Where She Danced. The name of the girl was Yvonne De Carlo.

I was tested for Crossfire. Gloria Grahame got the part. I was tested for The Killers. Winner—Ava Gardner. I tried out for That Wonderful Urge. Jane Meadows got it. Again I did my stuff, this time for Good Sam. Joan Loring got what I was after. I got the smaller role. At 20th Century-Fox I made what I thought was the best test of my life, a Technicolor scene for Burlesque. After seeing it I was sure I was in. I wasn't. The contract was handed to Jean Wallace.

I tested and tested and tested, and when I got through all I had was a long list of fascinatingly uninteresting verdicts:

"Not contract material." "Not beautiful enough." "No name (meaning at the box office)." "We'll let you know in about three weeks (translation for three weeks is 'never')." "Don't call us, we'll call you." "Too tall." "Too short." (This makes sense all right because you can be either too tall or too short, depending on who the leading man is to be in the contemplated picture.) "Don't do a thing until you hear from us."

I couldn't do anything about the too tall or too short business, nor about the not beautiful enough decisions. But there was one test report that did guide me. "Can't understand this girl's speaking voice," the report read. "Where does she come from?"

I came from Boston and while in New York I had picked up a little bit of Brooklynese. I decided that I needed the help of a phonetician and found one who put me to work rounding out syllables so they would sound more pleasantly and understandably on the ears of the directors and producers.

AND in the meanwhile, because nothing too sensational was happening, and I was experiencing those long waits which make you feel completely useless and unwanted, the experts got busy with me again.

"You should circulate more . . . go out to night clubs and be seen around."

I passed that one up. I don't like night clubs to the point where I don't have to think of any reasons for not liking them. It's just instinctive . . . like I don't like rutabaga, croquet, writing with chalk on the blackboard, or mountain climbing.

"Maybe it's because you're a brunette. You ought to bleach your hair."

Well, I had so much time on my hands that I did. I was a blonde once and a redhead twice. As a blonde I looked awful, as if I had a yellow pot inverted over my head. As a redhead there was more hope but not enough to stay that way. I tried it the second time only to make sure I was right about the first time. I was. I am quite sure I will never be anything but a brunette from now on.

"Do something crazy to attract attention."

I thought about this but decided it was not for me. There was the girl who picketed one of the studios in briefies; I realized I had never heard of her again once she gave up. There were a dozen other attempts by kids to break into the limelight and they only succeeded in breaking their hearts.

"Be more confident about yourself."

I tried. In one of my first picture bits I was supposed to walk up to George Brent, say "Hello, Darling!" and kiss him. I walked up, spoke my line and then froze. It was the closest I had ever been to a star and I just couldn't take it.

"Well?" barked the director. "Do you want him to beg for it?"

"Do I really kiss him?" I whispered.

The director threw himself back on his deck chair and the company howled. I would have run away never to come back if George hadn't caught me and talked me back into some command of myself again.

"There's nothing to it," he told me.

Nothing to it! He should have been where I was, looking up at him, my throat so dry that I could feel it crumbling and my breathing re-circuited so that the air was pumping into my head and making my ear-drums pop instead of flowing into my lungs where I needed it.

We made the scene all right but I learned then that confidence is something that becomes instilled gradually, as you learn your trade and gain command and power over yourself. You don't just say "I have confidence." You work for it.

AFTER I got my first real role, in The Window, I knew I was started, but only started. Shortly afterward I had to choose between going into Champion, which was made on a comparatively modest budget, or taking a top role in a million dollar-plus picture at one of the biggest studios. The pressure from the experts to choose the second of these was terrific but it was no effort at all for me to combat it. The reason was that over the years my anti-expert resistance powers had just naturally developed. Today, if there is one thing I am immune to, I am happy to say, it is the expert!

THE END

how I found faith

(Continued from page 39) for others. We knew that she wasn't looking for any reward for her self-sacrifice, but we seven boys vowed to ourselves that if we were ever successful, we would make her later years—and my father's, happy ones, and give them all the comforts they'd been denied while struggling to bring us up.

There came a day when it looked as if all those rosy dreams would be fulfilled. I made good in Chicago, where I'd finally been booked as master of ceremonies at the Stratford Theater. The act was supposed to run for three days, but it ran for six months. After that, I never had any trouble getting bookings.

Things looked so wonderful I knew that my mother and father would never have to worry financially another day in their lives. After I became successful, they were able to get a really lovely home in Cleveland.

I was a happy guy. I had faith in people, faith in myself, and faith in a Higher Power. The world was pretty wonderful.

Then suddenly the bottom fell out of my world.

ALL her life my mother had had one idiosyncracy. She hated to go to doctors. "I haven't the time," she'd say. If she had a headache or a backache, she'd laugh it off. She had frequent backaches, but she would just put a piece of plaster on the spot that bothered her. "What do I need a doctor for?" she'd laugh. "There's nothing serious the matter with me. I'm too busy to bother with doctors."

One day when the ache in her back was particularly severe, I finally talked her into going to a clinic in Cleveland. When she walked out of the consultation room, I had a talk with the doctor. The sight of his face sent my heart plunging.

"Bob," he said, wasting little time on preliminaries, "make sure she's happy. We can't do anything for her. It's too late." Then he said simply, "She has cancer."

"Make sure she's happy," he'd said, and of course I tried. I was appearing in Roberta in New York at the time, but I flew back to Cleveland whenever I got the chance. I wanted to be with my mother as much as possible.

In a year's time, after going through terrible suffering, she died. I hit the lowest moment of my life that day. She never knew the name of the enemy that had taken her life. But I did. And at that moment my faith in life and in justice hit its lowest ebb, too.

In church we had learned about a great Friend who was kind, just and merciful. In one of his sermons, the minister had spoken eloquently of how not even a sparrow could fall without God's noting it and suffering for the anguish of that sparrow. "Fear ye not therefore, ye are of more value than many sparrows," he had read from the New Testament.

I had grown up believing that this was a world of justice and fair play; that if you always did that which was right to the best of your ability, you would get your reward. But look at the reward my mother had gotten in return for years of self-sacrifice: pain and anguish at the end.

DIDN'T the Bible say, "Give, and it shall be given unto you; good measure, pressed down, and shaken together, and running over, shall men give into your bosom. For with the same measure that ye mete withal it shall be measured to you again."

My mother had given only goodness and kindness. So why should He who was supposed never to miss the fall of a sparrow, have allowed her to suffer such a fate?

What sort of justice was being dealt out in a universe where a wonderful woman, who had made sacrifices for her children all her life, died, just when they had reached the kind of success where they could take care of her? Why hadn't a merciful God spared her this suffering? Or was much that I had learned in church untrue? Was this a world in which one couldn't count on either mercy or justice?

In those bitter days following my mother's illness and death, that was the way it looked to me.

Years later, I hit another low. My younger brother, Syd, was dying of the same illness that had killed my mother. I thought he didn't know what was happening to him—that at least he would be spared that much. Then one day he sent for me. "Bob," he said, "I just want to ask one thing—take care of my five kids when it happens."

I knew then that he knew. Again my faith faltered. Syd, like my mother, had been a good, kind person. He had loved his family and done everything he could for them. Sure, I could take care of his five kids financially. But kids need and want their own father—and he was such a wonderful father. Why should he be taken away when they needed him so much?

No sermon I had ever heard in church answered those questions for me. My brother had done his best to lead an upright life. Yet he had been struck down by cancer.

Most of the things I had been taught in the past seemed like a hollow mockery of the truth. My mother and brother had believed these things. They had believed in a kind and merciful God.

But here was the spectre of injustice haunting my own family. No wonder I asked myself: Are we all pawns in a game of universal chess? Was there an unkind and malignant Fate which put the finger on people who were good and kind with the same impartiality with which it struck down others? In that case, there could be neither justice or mercy expected from an Unseen Power.

One day Fred Williams, one of my writers, and I were discussing this as we drove from Palm Springs in a driving rain, along roads that were rather greasy, for they were smudging the orange groves near Beaumont. Suddenly the car swerved and hit a ditch. It turned over, ran into a tree, and I was thrown through the door.

I remember seeing little sparks; I remember how my neck jerked and how I thought, "This is it. I'm going to die." I remember everything that happened till I got hit on the head and blanked out.

WHEN I recovered consciousness there was a lump as big as an ostrich egg on my right shoulder. I was half delirious with the shock of the accident. Fred Williams started waving frantically for someone to stop. A car finally did stop, and the driver took us to see Dr. McCarthy at the Riverside Mission Inn. He looked me over, and said he'd better take me to a hospital.

I should have been dead or seriously injured. Instead I emerged with nothing worse than a dislocated shoulder. I was put in a cast for ten days till I begged to be let out. Then I was put in a harness.

It started me thinking. Why had I been spared? My narrow escape certainly made it seem as if there is a good Friend in heaven looking out for us—One who would be conscious of the fall of every sparrow and to whom we are of more value than many sparrows.

This isn't the only narrow escape I've had from death. I've flown about a million miles under all kinds of conditions, in have you seen page 8?

all kinds of planes. Once I was in a Navy plane in Australia when the motor conked out. It was a sea plane, and we were high over the mountains. The pilot, Lt. Ferguson, had to get near some body of water. Making his way over strange territory on one motor, he hit the water, skipped 100 feet, skipped another 50 feet and ran into a sand bar, making a magnificent landing. If we had hit the sand bar first before we hit the deep water, the plane might have gone up in flames.

I thought a lot about that. Certainly we had a great pilot. It turned out he was a kid who lived just around the street from me. He couldn't have made that landing without help from an even greater Pilot.

When one escapes from death by a narrow margin, as I have so often, one has to say, "Hello Friend." You say it reverently, not quite understanding how these miracles work. But I do know that to go through the things I've faced, I had to have the best of help from every angle.

My own narrow escapes from death helped me regain my faith. But I still couldn't understand why the great Friend who had spared me so many times hadn't spared my mother and brother their suffering. Then still another narrow escape from a serious injury gave me the clue.

IT happened about a year ago, when I was making Fancy Pants at Paramount, and was thrown off a prop horse. At first a counter-balance had been used for the prop, but the director had decided there wasn't enough action and ordered the counter-balance taken off. When I was six feet in the air, I flew off the horse, exposing my back to the hard concrete.

Everyone on the set thought I must have broken my back. For two days doctors X-rayed me. They found that by a miracle, I'd fallen on the right muscles and not one vertebra in my back was broken.

The doctor added one more statement. "It's lucky," he said, "that you were in such wonderful physical condition, Bob. If you hadn't been, you might have been killed or seriously injured."

With those two sentences, he helped me find my way out of the morass of doubts that had clouded my faith in life, in the universe and even in God. Like a flash of lightning, those two sentences revealed to me why my life had been spared, and why, in spite of a Father who looks after His children with love and devotion, my mother and brother had suffered.

God meant us to take care of ourselves. There's an old saying that goes "God helps those who help themselves." We have to protect our health. We can't count on miracles, except one of the greatest miracles of all—the fact that people—most people anyway—are wonderful.

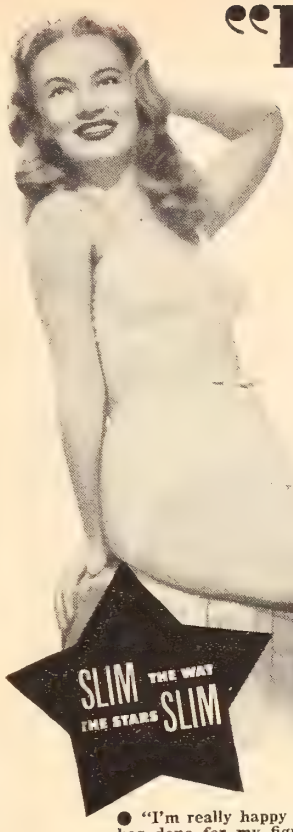
Among those who work as the instruments of a divine and merciful providence are doctors, most of whom are sincere and honest. When I was in Bizerte in 1943, I saw doctors operating on the wounded on seven tables at once. The way they pitched in and worked to save kids gave me a lot of faith in mankind.

Now to live happily and well, you have to have all kinds of help. Help from the great unseen Friend of us all. Help from our fellowmen, including those professionally trained for the job of guarding our health. And help from ourselves, for we must cooperate with our doctors to maintain ourselves in the best health.

If my brother had looked after his health, he'd have been spared much physical suffering. A doctor had told Syd to come back for an operation needed to remove a small growth. "Come back in a week," he'd said after examining my brother. But Syd was afraid of doctors—afraid of operations. He thought maybe he'd get better without one. I can't blame him. I know how he must have felt. None of us likes the thought of being operated on. But that little operation, done in time, might have saved his life. When he finally saw a doctor again, it was too late.

My mother's backache was nature's warning that she needed some medical help. If she'd gone to a doctor in time, he might have saved her. My mother meant well. She was wonderful.

But you can't defy nature and survive. You can't ignore nature's warning of trouble ahead.



My mother and brother paid with suffering for their sad mistake. But I believe that somewhere in an even better world than this my mother and brother are reaping some great reward for the kind of lives they lived. THE END

When Farley Granger was in Ohio for the première of Roseanna McCoy, the Albee Theater was jammed with teen-aged worshipers. Farley came out and the girls oh-ed and ah-ed with delight. Finally they quieted down and an interview began, only to be interrupted by a very young admirer, about three or four months old, who began to squeal in the balcony. Farley looked up, grinned and said, "If you're having trouble up there, maybe I can help. I used to be a baby-sitter."

You a teen-ager? Then read this—
a monthly feature especially for you.

So you want to get in the movies, do you? Goodness knows, hundreds of letters from both boys and girls tell me that you do and ask for my help. When I began this fascinating job of trying to answer teen age problems I didn't know how big the desire to go into the movies was.

Anyhow, I'm kind of glad that that's the pressing problem this month, because I do know a few of the answers.

A lot of your letters asked me how I got into this exciting profession. I'm sure it will come as a shock to the Samuel Goldwyn publicity department to learn that there's anybody who doesn't know. But it seems there is.

My break was sheer accident. I'd had only four weeks experience in summer stock playing the little girl in Guest in the House, a play written by my father and Hagar Wilde. Then a little over two years ago when I had just turned fourteen, William Selwyn, at that time Mr. Goldwyn's executive casting director, was in New York looking for a girl to play Roseanna McCoy. He telephoned an actress friend of his, Katharine Willard, who was living on Cape Cod, to ask if she had seen any promising young girls. She'd never seen me in stock but we knew each other. She suggested that he get in touch with me which he did. He sent Mr. Goldwyn a test of me. Mr. Goldwyn wired back, "Bring her out." And here I am.

Lucky break? You bet. It doesn't happen? It doesn't happen—but it did. Yes, I'm the lucky one and I know it and am grateful. Now let's talk about you and your chances of getting in the movies.

First of all you have to ask yourself a very important question. Do you want to be just a movie star or do you want to be an actress? Now that's a very serious question and you must answer it honestly or what I have to say is not going to do a bit of good. A great many wonderful actresses are also movie stars. It should go hand in hand but a lot of times it doesn't. Here's how you can tell the difference.

Is it the glamor of being in pictures that appeals to you? Is it wanting a swimming pool and beautiful clothes and fame and lots of money? If that's all—give up right now and concentrate on something else.

None of the kids in pictures can afford a swimming pool. And all of us have to watch the clothes budget. We girls in pictures must have quite a lot of clothes because we get photographed so much and people complain if we wear the same thing all the time.

I buy a lot of clothes from advertisements in magazines. You know, the mail order places. The things are very reasonable and very nice indeed.

As for fame—what's it worth, really? To have people sincerely admire your work on the screen is fine. But as for the people who just stare at you because you're in pictures—well, that kind of fame you can have. About the fortune. These days there's no such thing as a real fortune. So if it is for these reasons that you want to get in pictures—forget it.

If you sincerely feel that you want to be an actor or an actress—you still have a problem. How do you know you have talent? And believe me, your friends can't tell you.

I had a letter from a girl who said, "All my friends tell me I look like Lana Turner and that I'm a wonderful mimic. I can act out anything I see in the movies and copy the way anybody acts." This girl has not passed the real talent test.

Looking like Lana Turner or Elizabeth Taylor or Susan Hayward is wonderful. But it will hinder your getting in pictures.

The producers don't want carbon copies.

The reason Mervyn LeRoy wanted to make a star out of Lana Turner was because she didn't look like anybody else in pictures. She was unique. Same way with Elizabeth Taylor and the rest.

The same thing goes for being a mimic. To be a professional imitator like Elsie Janis was or Florence Desmond is, is an art in itself. But when you go around just imitating what you see on the screen or copying the mannerisms of the stars it shows you haven't a real creative flair for acting. (Unless, of course, you do burlesque imitations as a parlor stunt, for laughs.)

Dressing like the stars, doing your hair the way they do (especially if it's not becoming) looking like a star, being able to imitate—that isn't enough.

So how do you know if you have talent? First of all you have to know it inside you. Know that you must express yourself by acting, know that this is the only way you can be happy, know that you're not just stage-struck or screen-struck.

Then ask your high school dramatics teacher for help. Learn a scene from a play you like. When I work with my wonderful dramatic coach, Bob Paris, I do scenes from plays I may or may not be suited for, just for the experience. I've done Born Yesterday (and I'm certainly not the type), Voice of the Turtle and Ethan Frome among others. Get a boy who is interested in acting and prepare a scene from a play. Do it all yourself, give it your own interpretation—right or wrong. Then ask your dramatics teacher to look at the scene and answer the question, "Do I have talent?" Beg for honesty to save yourself headache and heartache.

You must remember that your dramatics teacher may be prejudiced in your favor, or may not even know. But this is an honest step in the right direction. Then you must ask yourself these questions: Are you willing to work from early morning until late at night? Are you willing to give up all social life if necessary? Are you able to control your temper? (This is so important and one of the hardest things I had to learn.) When you are being shouted at and pushed around and told you don't know anything about anything, can you smile sweetly and say, "Yes, sir, you're right?" Are you able to accept the opinions of others, even if you know perfectly well that they're wrong?

And now where do you go? It seems a shame to me that there are so few places where you can really learn to act. If a boy or girl wants to be a lawyer he can go to any number of law schools. If he wants to be a doctor he majors in medicine. There are very few good dramatic schools and very few parents willing to put out money for training in a profession that is so precarious. If you can go to a New York or Hollywood dramatic school, and that's where most of the good ones are, that's fine. If not, do everything you can in school theatricals, Little Theaters and Community Theaters.

See as many legitimate shows as you can and as many movies. Try to see all the good movies and when (Continued on page 81)

BANISHES "TATTLE-TALE GRAY"

Monty Clift browses through Florence, stopping to visit a photography shop on Ponte Vecchio, the only old bridge left in the city since the war.

Flip McCarthy and Monty head into the wind on the homeward voyage. The Queen Mary's busy ports were full of interest for both of them.

Monty and Mrs. McCarthy are demon tourists. Their guides told them everything about Amalfi, the city in the cliffs; and they want more.

The Italian fans keep up with Hollywood. Everyone recognized and greeted Monty. But he has a tough time reading the headlines in Italian.

wanted to take him there. "I don't remember which of those gentlemen got the job," Monty reports. "All I know is that we drove to Amalfi in what looked like an old Pierce Arrow which miraculously carried as much luggage as you could get in a freight car." We were willing to bet that the luggage belonged to the McCarthys and that Clift himself carried all he owned in a beachbag.

Anyway, there are a lot of picturesque spots in Amalfi, a city which is built right into the cliffs, and once ruled the seas.

"What I like about Italy," he says, "is that most places there are timeless. The people, many of them poor as they are, have a graceful, mellow zest for living. They are more proud of tradition and antiquity than they are of ambition and their modern postwar buildings."

The more than century-old churches, the winding alleys, the horse-drawn carts, the white roccoco buildings piled one on top of another like a fortress against the sea captured his imagination, and with the McCarthys, he wandered through the city.

But as all tours do, this tour came to an end. And three months after he'd landed, Monty boarded the Queen Mary for home. It turned out to be the worst crossing in 30 years, due to the persistence of a hurricane. At one point, Monty packed his little bag, posed dramatically before a porthole and declared to his friends that he'd walk the rest of the way. No one believed him and he wasn't going to show off for a bunch of Doubting Thomases so he unpacked again and came home the ordinary way—fortunately for us, not only because we love him, but because he was carrying all these pictures in his pocket.

tell it to joan

All this you can do in preparation but, and this is most important, don't try to get into pictures or on the stage while you're in your teens. I didn't try. It just happened to me. And already I've found out about so many parts that I have been dying to do but haven't been offered because of my youth. Yes, work toward your goal but don't try to force it until you're older. Because by the time you're 20 you might not want to be an actress at all. I know you won't believe this, but it could happen. You might meet some wonderful guy and discover that the only kind of acting you want to do is to act like a good wife. So hold the dream and wait.

HERE are some letters on other subjects:

"Dear Joan: I am 13 years old. I like this boy, but he doesn't even know I'm alive. He lives right next door to me. How can I get him to like me?—M.A.H., Barrowsville, Mass."

Did you ever consider that his not "knowing you're alive" might be shyness on his part? Ask several of the kids over for cokes after school some day and ask him, too.

"Dear Joan: I have a fat face and do not like it. Is there any way I can make it appear thinner?—J.W., Milton, Del."

From what you tell me about your weight, you're about five pounds too heavy. If you reduce, your face will become thinner, too. Cut out heavy desserts, cream, breads and butter.

"Dear Joan: I am very shy when I'm around boys. I just don't know what to say to them. —M.M., Toledo, Ohio."

Don't try too hard to be bright or clever. You're not shy around girls, are you? You have plenty to say to your girl friends, I'll bet. Just tell the boys any little item that you would tell the girls—even as simple a question as "What did you do today?"

"Dear Joan: How old should a girl be to have a date?—M.J.L., Scales Mound, Ill."

Gee, what a problem. That depends on the girl and the girl's parents. Some girls have much more common sense than others. It is really a matter of common sense. And it depends on the common sense of the parents, too. I think you should discuss this with your parents—who probably know you better than you know yourself. And that's it. I've tried to do my best this month because the subject is really dear to my heart. I hope I was of help. By the way, a lot of letters asked questions that have already been answered in previous issues of MODERN SCREEN, so I didn't repeat them here. Be seeing you.

Editor's note: Do you have a teenager problem? If so, tell it to Joan. Write to Joan Evans, Box 93, Beverly Hills, Calif.

i had my nose fixed

(Continued from page 58) the biggest thrill for me had been the sound of those magic words: "You have a wonderful profile." He must have said the same thing a hundred times to a hundred different people. How could he know the exhilaration I felt?

For a moment it was difficult to hold back the tears. You've had the feeling. Sometimes it happens when a military band plays "The Star-Spangled Banner"; or when you see a particularly moving scene in a play; or when a spectacularly beautiful sunset catches you in a nostalgic mood. You feel as though you could cry or burst for joy.

As I looked at myself in my dressing-table mirror, my thoughts flashed back to that momentous day when, tortured by doubt and fear, I walked into Dr. Robert Franklyn's office. I wanted to run. Every instinct rebelled against the coming ordeal.

I was about to undergo plastic surgery.

It had taken years of unhappiness and frustration to bring me to the point where I finally decided to have my nose remodeled.

Since I was born in Hollywood, and my father's business connections were mostly with movie people, I unhesitatingly made up my mind at the ripe old age of six that I would be nothing but a motion picture actress. My nose was to be a great stumbling-block. The exaggerated flare of the nostrils, the prominence of the bone on the right side, which made my eyes seem close-set—these were definitely not photogenic.

At six a nose is important because you breathe through it. Beauty is an adult idea. Whenever we played in the back yard, dressed to our baby teeth in borrowed finery, I got the biggest part, announcing solemnly, "I must be the star because I'm going to be an actress."

It wasn't until I entered Fairfax High School that the full impact of my facial imperfection hit me. To begin with, I was now a contender in the game of "dating." From the moment you reach high school age, life becomes one gigantic "popularity contest." Being "different" is fatal. The important thing is to be like everyone else; as much like the most popular boy or girl in the school as possible. Careful attention is paid to wearing your hair like the other girls do; getting your saddle shoes just as dirty; achieving the same degree of sloppiness with your overlarge sweaters.

As far as my scholastic standing was concerned I had nothing to worry about. Not that I was a genius, but learning came easily to me and my grades were well above average.

It was in my social activities that disappointments first began to crop up. My acute awareness of the fact that my nose kept me from being as "pretty" as the other girls made it impossible for me to fully enjoy dances and parties. I dressed carefully; worked as skillfully as I could with what makeup a high-school girl is allowed, and yet I was never satisfied with the results. Alone in my bedroom I would survey myself and decide I looked all right. But when I finally arrived at the party the inevitable comparison of myself with the rest of the girls invariably ruined the evening for me. My hair was just as pretty. My dress was smart and becoming. I danced as well. And yet, without being unduly facetious, I can truthfully say I always lost by a nose.

The driving force in my life was, of course, my ambition for an acting career. I was very active in the drama club, and the only time I completely forgot the handicap of my nose was when I was doing a part. True, I was never given the romantic leads. The prettier girls got those. But, somehow, I didn't mind too much. I was an artist. I told myself; an artist practicing my trade. I was learning, and that was all that was important.

Then I suffered a defeat that destroyed all the self-confidence I had managed to build up. Suddenly and cruelly I was plunged into a despair that only a 17-year-old can experience.

The Drama Club was putting on a play for the weekly morning assembly. I had been given the lead. A character part, yes, but the largest part in the play. I was ecstatic. And to add to my elation, as I stood in the wings waiting for my cue, the captain of the football team approached me and asked me to go to the senior dance that evening. If ever there was a girl walking on air, I was that girl.

I went through the day in a dream. My last class was gym, and I hummed to myself as I changed into my shorts and middy. Suddenly through the thin partition of the locker dressing-room I heard voices. I stood transfixed with horror as their words struck me like a slap in the face:

First Girl: "Sure, Bob asked me to go, but I had a fight with him and turned him down."

do you want a star to visit your home?
see page 8!

Second Girl: "Who's he taking?"

First Girl: "Well, who could he get at the last minute except the kid with the nose . . . you know . . . Helene."

This amused the other girl and she giggled

I felt sick to my stomach. The only thing I could think of was to get away—fast. I threw on my clothes with desperate haste, the tears running down my face. ". . . at the last minute . . . the kid with the nose." The kid who was not wanted. The kid who couldn't get a date. My thoughts were wild and unreasonable.

I stumbled home. How I got there I don't know to this day. All I remember is that Mother met me in the hall. She could see I was distraught, but when she asked the reason, I withdrew into the shell that was to encase me for months, even years to come.

"Nothing," I replied stiffly, summoning all the self-control I possessed. "I'm just a little tired. Have a headache."

As I started up the stairs I paused, and turning said: "Mother, I have a date with Bob Smith tonight. Would you call him, please, and explain that I don't feel well enough to make it?" And before she could question me further I ran on up to my room where I threw myself sobbing on the bed.

I must have cried for hours, and when I finally stopped I made up my mind that no one would ever hurt me that way again. From then on I lived in a coccoon of misery. Because I was so afraid of ridicule, I rejected friendship, and took refuge in being aloof.

You may wonder why I didn't resort to plastic surgery then. I thought of it. Believe me, I thought of it. But with the perversity of youth, it seemed to me foolish vanity. I didn't want people to think that I was concerned with physical beauty alone. I (Continued on page 86) open letter from judy garland

(Continued from page 29) American in Paris in Hollywood, and since he is directing that picture and plans shortly to direct the sequel to Father of the Bride, we all plan to remain in California.

I love to work, I love to sing, I love to act—I get restless when I don't—and it's entirely possible that I will do a few broadcasts with Bing Crosby or Bob Hope before six months are up.

My health is fine. As I write this, I've just returned from a vacation in Sun Valley and Lake Tahoe. I'm sun-tanned, I weigh 110 pounds, and my outlook on things is joyful and optimistic.

Many of you have written and asked what was wrong with me in the past.

The honest answer is that I suffered from a mild sort of inferiority complex. I used to work myself up into depressions, thought no one really cared about me, no one outside my family, that is.

Why I should have ever gotten depressed, I certainly don't know. You people have proved to me that I've got thousands of friends the world over, that you care about my welfare and my career.

It's perfectly normal for people to have their ups and downs. I know that now, but a year or so ago, these depressions of mine used to worry me, and the more I worried about them, the lower I felt.

Anyway, all of that is gone and done with. The slate of the past is wiped clean. Insofar as I'm concerned, the world is good, golden, and glorious. My best years and my best work lie ahead of me, and I'm going to give them everything I've got.

Many of you have asked if I realized how closely you followed my career and behavior. I certainly do, and that's why I want all of you to know, especially the youngsters, that I'm not in the slightest embittered about Hollywood and that I still think a motion picture career is one of the finest ambitions any girl can have.

It means hard work and it has its pitfalls but so has every other occupation.

If my daughter, Liza, wants to become an actress, I'll do everything to help her.

Of course, being a child actress and being raised on a studio lot is not the easiest adjustment a young girl can make. You don't go to baseball games or junior proms or sorority initiations, but every success has its sacrifices, and these are the ones a very young girl must make if she wants a career at a very early age.

The girl who finishes her schooling, however, and then wants to become an actress is facing a thrilling, rewarding career.

If I had to do it all over again, I would probably make the same choices and the same errors. These are part of living.

A lot of fanciful stories have depicted me as the victim of stark tragedy, high drama, and all sorts of mysterious Hollywood meanderings. All that is bunk.

Basically, I am still Judy Garland, a plain American girl from Grand Rapids, Minnesota, who's had a lot of good breaks, a few tough breaks, and who loves you with all her heart for your kindness in understanding that I am nothing more, nothing less.

Thank you again.

start your mother using Tampax —right away!

Keep your mother on the young side. Help her to stay in sympathy with young ideas and both of you will be the better for it! The adoption of Tampax (for monthly sanitary protection) is a fairly good test of a mother's youthful attitude. So start her using Tampax—right away. You will do her a real service.

Tampax is a revolutionary product (it's used internally) but is thoroughly scientific. Invented by a physician, it consists of pure surgical cotton compressed into slender, white applicators for dainty, convenient insertion. When in place, the Tampax is conforming in shape and you cannot feel its presence. It causes no odor and is readily disposed of.

With Tampax you need no belts, no pins and no external pads. Being used internally it absolutely cannot make a bulge or ridge or wrinkle to "show through." You may take your tub or shower without removing the Tampax. A month's supply fits into a purse.... Sold at drug or notion counter in 3 absorbencies—Regular, Super, Junior. hollywood youth on trial

Deanna Durbin sounded her own death knell careerwise when she insisted that Universal, the studio she had almost single-handedly rescued from bankruptcy, place her in suave, sophisticated filmfare.

Deanna wasn't thinking of her fans—at least not enough to stop her from trying to give them what they didn't want.

"Look, child," one of the executives told her, "to the American public you represent a typical, normal, healthy girl who sings like an angel. Why do you want us to dress you up as a slinky nightclub siren?"

"Because I'm not a child any longer," Deanna pointed out. "And I can't go on playing one forever."

But she couldn't make that transition to adult roles and as a result, she is no longer in Hollywood. After two divorces and one child, she is searching for happiness in Paris. And no one knows if she ever stops to think of the millions of young girls who used to hang on her every note and who tried to pattern their lives after hers. But everyone knows that because the pattern could no longer serve as a model, Deanna, herself, faded out of the picture. Does Judy Garland realize how her behavior has affected the legions of youngsters who love and admire her? Judy, of course, has been ill for several years, and during those years she continued to work. Many times she unwittingly made life pretty rough for many of her colleagues.

Success goes to young heads pretty quickly, but where there is no family restraint, as in the cases of Rooney, Garland, and Durbin—the success frequently diminishes into tragic nothingness.

FORTUNATELY, Hollywood's bright new youngsters seem to be making none of their predecessors' mistakes. As a whole, they've learned much from the experiences of others.

Take the crooners, Gordon MacRae, Mel Torme, and Vic Damone.

Unlike Frank Sinatra, not one of them has yet stepped out of line. MacRae attends every civic function to which he's invited. Torme is a settled family man, and Damone when he was thrown a Hollywood cocktail party recently, insisted that trays of cokes be carried outside to the kids who were waiting on the pavements.

As for the young leading men, not one has yet pulled a Peter Lawford—playing the nightclub circuit with a different well-known actress every night, although lately Peter himself steers clear of too many entanglements.

James Whitmore who played the lead in The Next Voice You Hear and has made six other pictures for MGM in a little over a year, is a Yale graduate, the father of two children, and a settled, intelligent young actor who works hard and has never had the inclination to date so-called society girls.

Marlon Brando, Charlton Heston, Tony Curtis, Gene Nelson, Howard Keel, Keefe Brasselle, Ben Johnson, Lyle Bettger, Rock Hudson, and David Wayne, the best of the 1950 newcomers, are all solid, straight-thinking young men who look upon acting as their lives' work, although Brando is admittedly an eccentric.

To them, Hollywood is no perpetual lark of dames, drama, and drinking. To them, Hollywood and acting are hard work.

The same holds true for the 1950 crop of young actresses.

Sally Forrest, Mala Powers, Marilyn Monroe, Jean Hagen, Peggy Dow, Nancy Davis, Cecile Aubry, Vera-Ellen, Nancy Olson, Piper Laurie, Judy Holliday, Jan Sterling, and Micheline Prelle—these girls know Hollywood first-hand, and knowing it first-hand, they realize that one false move, and they're gone.

Marilyn Monroe, for example, was once under contract to 20th Century-Fox but was let out. After John Huston gave her another chance in The Asphalt Jungle, Marilyn was re-signed by 20th.

Sally Forrest had a similar experience. Metro dropped her; she was picked up by Ida Lupino for an independent production, and now she's a potential MGM star again.

NEVER before in its history has Hollywood been more avid than in its present search for young talent, but it wants youngsters who know how to behave themselves, who won't go off the deep end with a little success.

"It may well be," one studio executive recently pointed out, "that we're expecting too much from these youngsters.

"After all, take a kid like Peter Lawford. A few years ago he was parking cars in Westwood. Now he's dating the ambassador's daughter. It's tough for a kid like that to retain the same sense of values.

"Or take his sidekick, Robert Walker. This guy was living with his wife and two kids in a New York tenement. All of a sudden, Selznick signs his wife, brings her out west, changes her name to Jennifer Jones. Walker gets a break, is tested and signed by MGM, and follows her. When he gets here, he finds his wife has fallen in love with Selznick, or is about to.

"No wonder the kid blew his top.

"Hollywood isn't Middletown, U.S.A., and there's no sense in making believe it is. We take young kids and because they've got talent and ability, we pay them well. We try to start them off at 50 and 75 bucks a week, but after a couple of years, they're making $500 or $750 or $1500 a week, or once in a while, like with Van Johnson and Sinatra, $5,000 a week.

"That kind of dough isn't conducive towards a settled kind of living. Some kids can't take it. Others like Esther Williams, June Allyson, and Jane Powell take it in stride.

"Esther owns a filling station, a restaurant, a resort settlement; she has interests in bathing suit companies. She knows how to spread her money around. She was married and divorced when she was a kid, and she knows the score. A lot of these kids don't.

"As a matter of fact, I think the industry has been very lucky in the relatively few unstable youngsters we've turned up.

LOTS of times, you know, girls come out here who've been married and divorced. When they become stars, people blame the divorce on Hollywood living. I mean kids like Janet Leigh, Vera-Ellen, Shelley Winters, even Esther Williams—they were divorced before they made names for themselves out here. Yet, Hollywood catches the brunt of the blame.

"This is a real tough town for youngsters to live in—the stakes are high—the competition is rough—the temptations are everywhere.

"Personally, I'm real proud of the current crop of newcomers. For the most part, they're level-headed professionals."

● DO YOU KNOW

what is "different" about your hair? (No two heads of hair are alike.) Can you tell exactly how LONG to process your hair— by judging its elasticity... diameter... tensile strength... and porosity? If you can't, you'd better see a beautician.

● DO YOU KNOW

what type of waving solution is best for your hair? (No single solution works equally well on all hair.) Only a beautician has different solutions for each type of hair... and only she knows which is right for yours.

● DO YOU KNOW

exactly WHERE to put each curl ...and what SIZE it should be? For a permanent that holds its set ...and arranges the way a permanent should—see a beautician. She alone has the special training ...the professional materials... the skill, taste and experience to give you a lovelier permanent.

You'll be stunning with a new

lists reveals that this executive knows whereof he speaks.

At Columbia, for example, the two bright hopes are Judy Holliday and Lola Albright. Judy has been a Broadway star for years —she played the lead in the stage version of Born Yesterday. She is a professional down to her very toes.

Lola Albright, currently in love with comedian Jack Carson, got her big break opposite Kirk Douglas in The Champion and is trying to prove that she's no flash-in-the-pan. This girl has been around Hollywood and knows all the angles.

Over at 20th Century, there are at least a dozen newcomers who are behaving perfectly. Best bets for stardom according to producers on the lot are Marilyn Monroe who is being given a Lana Turner buildup because she is single and extremely sexy, Debra Paget who's been under contract to the studio ever since she was 14 which was three years ago, Cecile Aubry, the French cutie who played opposite Ty Power in The Black Rose, Joyce McKenzie, who showed loads of sex appeal in A Ticket to Tomahawk, and Barbara Bates, a happily married beauty who's been featured in Cheaper by the Dozen, Quicksand, and All About Eve.

As for the new men at 20th, there's Gary Merrill, Bette Davis' new husband, and David Wayne, both 35 and both experienced Broadway actors. Gary gave the studio a few frights when he fell in love with Bette on the set of All About Eve, but everyone relaxed when they married.

Hugh Marlowe is another experienced Broadway hand under contract to Zanuck. Also with Zanuck is Robert Patten, who can develop into a real glamor boy à la Farley Granger, Lee MacGregor, Zanuck's office boy who was given a role at the insistence of the studio secretaries, and Craig Hill, a tall handsome kid with an inordinate amount of box office draw.

Across town at MGM, Leo the lion is really loaded with newcomers. Phyllis Kirk, Paula Raymond, Debbie Reynolds, Teresa Celli, Sally Forrest, Nancy Davis, and Jean Hagen are the ladies.

Heading the male neophytes are Howard Keel, James Whitmore, Keefe Brasselle, and Carleton Carpenter.

Universal also has a long list of first-termers: Jeff Chandler who was so good in Broken Arrow, Rock Hudson, Vera-Ellen's boyfriend, who did a fine job in Winchester 73, Tony Curtis, the bobby-soxers' new heartthrob, Jimmy Best who used to pose for Arrow collars, Piper Laurie who eats flowers, and Peggy Dow whom you'll see in Harvey.

Warners hold great promises for Suzanne Dalbert, the French girl starring opposite John Agar in Breakthrough, and Gene Nelson, the singing dancer of Tea for Two.

The only new western star of note is Ben Johnson who did such a sterling job for John Ford in Wagonmaster, and She Wore A Yellow Ribbon. Ford, who is the most outstanding director of westerns in the world today, insists that Ben, within three years, will be one of the great western stars of all time.

The other big star-maker of Hollywood is, of course, Howard Hughes. This year, Hughes is taking the wraps off Faith Domergue, Jack Buetel, whom he's also had under contract for ten years, Joan Dixon, and Charles McGraw.

Paramount's best bets for stardom are Jan Sterling, Paul Douglas' fifth wife, and Nancy Olson, who did so much to make Sunset Boulevard a fine picture.

In all these names, you will find none that has caused the slightest trouble, either to the studio that has them under contract or to the whole movie industry.

Except perhaps Gary Merrill, and certainly, he is not to be blamed for falling in love with Bette Davis. When he did, he followed the honorable course. He went to his wife, Barbara Leeds, told her what had happened, and asked for a divorce. Apparently, they hadn't been getting along.

Whether all these youngsters will follow the straight and true path, no one knows.

Certainly some of them will fall by the wayside and will never be heard of again. Others will get married and divorced, maybe once, twice, three times. An unfortunate few will find themselves mired in scandal.

Most of them, however, will marry, raise children, and lead the same kind of respectable lives as do Gene Kelly, Jane Powell, Jeanne Crain, Gregory Peck, Alan Ladd, and Esther Williams, all of whom were yesterday's beginners.

Fortunately, every Hollywood newcomer realizes at this stage of the game that the eyes of some 14 million teen-agers are focussed on him and his career. This being the case, his behavior is impeccable.

Let Sam Goldwyn ask Joan Evans to make personal appearances throughout the country in an attempt to popularize her picture, Our Very Own, and Joan Evans makes personal appearances till she drops.

Let him ask the same of Farley Granger and Teresa Wright, and they both refuse. They are both full-fledged stars. And stars are never on trial.

The newcomers, however, are always on trial. Only the future will tell which of them shall reap the rewards of stardom.

The End

i had my nose fixed

(Continued from page 82) wanted them to accept me for my talent and personality rather than for a pretty face. I wanted to be liked or disliked on the basis of myself.

A short while after I graduated from high school my father came home one evening very excited. A good friend of his who was quite an important producer was having auditions the following week for a feature part in his next picture. My family wanted me to go to the studio and try out, but I was reluctant. My fear of rejection returned in full force. They pleaded with me just to try it and see what would happen. At last I agreed to go, although I had no confidence that I would be successful.

I went to the audition, and my fears were confirmed. They finally narrowed the choice down to me and another girl. Before the decision was announced I knew what the outcome would be. She was more attractive, and photogenic. It was no surprise to me when they gave her the part. It was just another blow to my already battered ego. The producer, however, was a kind and discerning man. He must have sensed my disappointment, because as I started to leave he called me back.

"Miss London," he said, "you have a great deal of talent. A really fine voice. Have you ever thought of trying radio acting?"

RADIO acting had never entered my mind. Still, radio might be a stepping-stone to that great and glamorous world I was determined to make my own. Before I could start out for a job, though, my father became involved in a business deal which necessitated our moving to Waterloo, Iowa.

Waterloo, Iowa! The end of the world as far as I was concerned. No stage. No pictures. The only glimmer of hope was that I could go ahead with radio.

We hadn't been in Waterloo long when I heard that Gloria Swanson was sponsoring a radio contest. Naturally I entered at once. For the first time I was confident that I had an equal chance of winning. This would be behind a microphone, not a camera. The voice was of paramount importance.

I won the contest, and for a number of months I was satisfied with the importance that being a disc jockey on the local radio station gave me. And occasionally I had an opportunity to do dramatic roles on some of the shows. It was sufficient for a while. Then I began to feel the old restlessness. I was miles away from the only place I felt I could really pursue the career I longed for.

Unexpectedly something happened which gave me the chance I'd been seeking. A telegram from Hollywood arrived. The magic of the name made my hands shake as I tore it open. It was from a studio talent scout. He had heard me on the air and asked me to send him some photographs. My heart sank. Pictures. My doubts surged up again. How could I send him . . . but wait. This would get me back to Hollywood if everything went right. Certainly, I'd send him pictures.

I tore madly down to the local photographer's shop, explained the situation to him, and together we cooked up a scheme. He would take pictures of me. The left profile would be all right, and the full-face ones he would retouch. Yes, I was going to fake it. I'll be honest about it. But bear in mind that I wanted desperately to get back to California; back to real, honest-to-goodness acting instead of an occasional fifteen-minute radio part. I would have done almost anything to assure my return.

I mailed the pictures and the next week was miserable. One moment I was sure they'd send for me, and the next I was certain they would see through my ruse and I'd never hear from them. I haunted the mailbox. But the news came in another telegram. Oh, those beautiful, wonderful words: "Pictures fine. How soon can you be here?"

HOW soon? Would immediately be too soon? I could have flown there under my own power the way I felt. I wired back that I would arrive the following week and broke the news to Mother and Dad. They were reluctant to let me go at first, but I talked so hard and so fast they finally consented.

The train was hardly twenty miles out of the Waterloo station when it hit me. Sure, I'd fooled them with the pictures, but I wasn't going to fool anyone when I walked into the studio. In the back of my mind was always the hope that once I got my foot in the door I could make good on my ability. If they'd just give me a chance to act for them, to talk to them. But they might be so angry at my deception they would throw me out immediately. All the way across the country I worried and fretted and planned strategy after strategy.

I had imaginary conversations with Mr. Big.

"You can't do this to me. You thought I had talent when you sent for me. You brought me out here on the strength of my voice and ability, and now you turn me down because I don't photograph well. You know all about cameras and tricks with photography, why can't you use some of them?"

In spite of my solitary bravado the palms of my hands were damp with nervous perspiration as I got off the train in Pasadena to meet the studio representative. Once at the studio the reaction was what I had feared. Raised eyebrows. Shrugs of the shoulders. But since they were committed to the test, they made it. All the way through I was in an agony of self-consciousness. And when it was over, despite my imaginary brave talk on the train, I was out in the cold again without having laid eyes on Mr. Big. Shades of Fairfax High. But now I was older. My experience with radio in the past year had shown me that I could overcome my inferiority complex.

I no longer accepted defeat passively. I was ready to fight for what I wanted. They didn't want me at the studio. Well, I'd show them.

I GOT myself a small apartment and started out to find a dramatic school. Now that I was here I had to be acting, and I would not go back to Iowa a failure. I went to the Geller Playhouse; auditioned for them, and was given a scholarship.

It seemed incongruous that I could win a scholarship at one of the best drama schools in town and still be turned down by the studios. But I didn't let myself become morose. I worked like a demon instead of brooding.

The third night after the initial play opened, a short, dark man with intensely blue eyes came backstage to see me. He introduced himself.

"I'm Solly Baiano, Miss London, from Warner Brothers." I hate to admit it, but I'm afraid I was just a bit snide.

"Here we go again," I jeered. He looked so taken aback that I softened my remark by adding, "I don't mean to sound rude, Mr. Baiano, but your studio will only laugh at you if you bring me in. I photograph very badly."

His reply startled me.

"I know you do. I've seen you on film."

"Then what do you want from me?" I asked in bewilderment. "If I don't photograph well, how can you use me?"

"Right now I can't use you. But I'll tell you something. You have real talent. If you'd have your nose fixed I'd sign you, but fast."

"Nose fixed," I echoed. "What do you mean? I don't quite understand."

"Plastic surgery," he replied patiently and then smiled indulgently. "It's being done every day, you know."

Five years ago his bluntness would have crushed me. Now I had learned to take it. Without fully realizing it I had discarded my belief that changing one's appearance was falsifying the facts. The transition from juvenile stubbornness to adult reasoning was complete. It had begun with my success at the Waterloo radio station, where I had sold myself to a blind audience on merit alone. The self-confidence I had gained through this conquest of my defeatist complex had been of a lasting nature. It had been shaken, yes, but it never completely deserted me again.

Now Mr. Baiano had suggested plastic surgery, and I knew even as I listened to him that I would have it done. I could hardly wait to make arrangements for the final step in my metamorphosis.

THE thrill I felt when I first saw myself after the surgery is indescribable. It was as though I had at last been released from a heavy burden. I was free to reach out without fear of rebuff for everything I had ever wanted. Free from the prison of insecurity I had lived in so long. No more ridicule. No more humiliations from those I was striving to please. At last I was on equal footing with everyone else.

Nothing startling happened immediately.

I didn't have every producer in town pounding on my door demanding my name on a contract. In fact, my first big break came in an odd and unexpected fashion.

I had told a girl friend of mine that I would pick her up at the office of a casting director for whom she was reading. I arrived a few minutes early and sat down in the outer office to wait for her. When the reading was over she and the director came out of the office. As I rose to meet her he suddenly caught sight of me and said:

"Say, she could play the part of the nurse."

He thrust a script at me and I found myself reading the part. When I finished he grabbed me by the shoulders.

"Great. You'll be great. Are you available?"

Not a word about my nose, or photographing. Just "are you available?" If there was anyone in town more available than I he must have been hiding under a rock. When I say I accepted with alacrity, I am guilty of gross understatement.

This was the end of "the kid with the nose," and the beginning of Helene London, actress.

From then on I started to do well. The parts were small at first, but they got bigger and fatter, and I have just finished working for Milton Simon in Race Horse at Nassour Studio. You can understand my pride in the fact that I have the lead in the picture.

I SHALL be forever grateful to Mr. Baiano, for none of this would have happened if I hadn't undergone plastic surgery. It has changed my life, and when MODERN SCREEN asked me to write my story, I jumped at the chance.

I'm not ashamed to admit that I had my nose remodeled.

When a girl is born with straight hair, her life is an unending battle with bobby pins and permanents to achieve curls. If she has crooked teeth, on go the braces. And on they stay through months of discomfort until the teeth are straightened. If hips have a willful way of spreading, they're confined in a girdle and pounded into submission.

I could go on for pages listing the devices and dodges in common use to improve what one has, and disguise what one has too much of.

Plastic surgery is a great and wonderful science. It worked miracles during the war and every day proves itself again.

I won't try to practice amateur psychology. I haven't sufficient knowledge of the field. However, I would like to quote a paragraph from Dr. Harold M. Holden's book, "Noses," which embodies for me the whole philosophy of plastic surgery:

"If one conceives of life as a long movement toward a far-off point of embarkation, one must concede a need for thoughtful facilitation of the way. Everything that blocks or inhibits passage to personal fulfillment should be at least the object of careful study and removal wherever possible."

If you have a "nose problem," or any facial defect that can be corrected by a plastic operation, I urge you to do something about it immediately if it threatens your happiness. For you, there will be no long years of heartache and frustration.

Autocrat of the dining room table

Yes sir, when he calls for his favorite meal by brand name you had better serve it—or else. And when he lisps for that prepared dessert he's so fond of you'd better not try any switching or there will be a rumpus, sure enough.

We start learning brand names almost as soon as we can say "Dada," and from then on we depend on our brand language to get us exactly what we want. Every advertisement we read—every radio program we listen to—prepares us better to make the most of America's wonderful system of producing and distributing goods identified by Brand Names.

And by the way—from the high chair on—every time we choose or reject brand names we keep industry on its toes—trying with all its know-how and resources to give us what we like best.

ann blyth's story

(Continued from page 41) for many years, and only her late mother's objections had prevented an operation when she was five. The operation had been continually postponed because there was a chance that the scar tissue resulting from a tonsillectomy might impair her singing voice.

Now again, a decision had to be made. If Ann submitted to an operation she might be finished as a singer. If she refused, she'd have her voice, but she'd have to fight the poison in her with constant medication.

Exactly what went through Ann's mind as she faced this dilemma is her secret, but her decision is public knowledge. She rested in the hospital for one week to build up her strength, then she was operated on. A week more of lying in bed and she began a systematic routine to restore her former health.

The luck of the Irish was with her. After the initial soreness disappeared, Ann's voice seemed better than ever.

ANN doesn't talk about her religion as much as she lives it, but it is apparent to those who have observed men and women of different faiths—and of no professed faith—that she receives a great help from her devotion to the tenets of the Catholic Church.

Ann's regimen of rest, good food and reasonable relaxation in exercise built her up so swiftly that four weeks after she left the hospital she was strong enough to go to work at her studio (Universal-International) in Katie. Her remarkably swift recovery was due, in a large part, to the careful, wise and loving care she has received from her aunt and uncle, Cis and Pat, who have lived with her in Hollywood since the death of Ann's mother in 1946.

This jolly yet thoughtful Irish couple could take no better care of Ann if she were their own child.

Ann's routine while working on a picture is almost entirely in Aunt Cis's hands. She's awakened about 6 o'clock, and immediately is served breakfast in bed by her aunt—usually orange juice, cereal with fruit and a soft-boiled egg.

"When Ann is home for lunch," says Aunt Cis, "she almost always wants a salad with cottage cheese, but for dinner at night she can down a steak with the best of them. Steak with mushrooms on it will keep her happy."

Ann doesn't eat often with the family when she's working. By the time she gets home, it's usually 7 o'clock. Her first concession to comfort is a tub bath in which she likes to soak for several minutes.

After this she goes to bed, and Aunt Cis brings her dinner, and after Ann has eaten, she reads or studies scripts for a while, dropping off to sleep about 9:30.

"It takes food," says Aunt Cis, "and it takes rest if you are after doing your best work. You lose if you cheat yourself on either."

Ann was aided in her quick recovery by the fact that she neither smokes nor drinks. She has, as her Irish Uncle Pat put it, no bad habits except the inability to say no to those who ask her to make benefit appearances. "But," Pat contends, "the 'old lady' is learning to say no to at least some of these."

Uncle Pat's affectionate reference to Ann as "the old lady" stems from the time when Ann was about four years old—and she'd dressed herself in her aunt's hat and high-heeled shoes, making a dramatic appearance in the manner of a diva at the Met.

Uncle Pat's reference to Ann's new ability to say "no" grew from a rather painful experience.

"One night after a performance," Uncle Pat relates, "Ann was called to the telephone in her room. We watched as she talked, and it would have hurt your heart to see the expression that came to her face. Finally she hung up and came back to us, crying.

"It seems that some spalpeen had refused to believe Ann when she told him her doctor did not permit her to make personal appearances while in a show. This man had asked our Ann if she never did anything for charity, and her with a room filled with plaques, ribbons and emblems from charitable organizations to which she has donated her time."

IN Ann's search for better health, she has developed a routine of exercise and relaxation that could serve as a model for any girl her age. When weather and work permit, she plays golf every day, a sport to which she was introduced by her friend, Bing Crosby. She plays well enough to win the women's division of the tournament at her studio (her score was 101), but is no match for Bing, although they do play together now and then.

Ann also is proficient at riding and swimming. Her love for the water has helped her through at least one tough studio assignment. In Mr. Peabody and The Mermaid, Ann was obliged to spend many hours in the water. This was a particularly exhausting experience, for she had to wear a large artificial tail which encased her body from the waist down.

It was while working in this picture that Ann made a lifelong friend of Bud Westmore, head of the makeup department.

An incident occurred during the creation of this makeup that still sends chills up Bud's spine. In order to have a precise replica of Ann's body on which to construct the mermaid's tail, it was decided to make a plaster cast. One day Bud forgot to grease the edges of the lower half of the cast as he poured the plaster for the top half.

To a layman the solution would be to beat the cast off Ann with a hammer. But Bud knew that the molecular action of setting plaster would create great heat along the edges of the cast, and by the time he discovered his oversight, the plaster already was getting warm.

It was a frightening minute for Bud. It seemed he was about to cause a serious injury to a personal friend.

"I lived a year," says Bud, "in the several minutes it took me to pry off the cast that was getting hotter and hotter. Fortunately, Ann was not burned, and although we had to make several casts before we finished, she showed no fear of the ordeal."

Bud thinks that Ann's good disposition, her lack of star temperament and her consideration for others all have a bearing on her ability to get so much work done.

"What other star," he asks, "will show up on time every morning, facing a difficult task, and still sing so lustily that we have to ask her to quiet down when we

Charley Feldman, of Famous Artists, called Marlon Brando in Chicago to find out when Brando was going to report for tests on Feldman's Streetcar Named Desire. Brando asked when he was required by contract to report and Feldman told him Aug. 30. To the surprise of nobody who knows him, Brando answered, "I'll be there 11:59 August 29th."—Milton Epstein in The Film Daily.

answer the telephone? It is a pleasure to work with her."

ANN's complete lack of selfishness is immediately apparent in the reaction of her friends on the studio lot. They virtually swarm about her, passing the time of day and wishing her luck on whatever project is at hand.

Nor is it only fellow-actors who know her. A gateman who became an admirer has quit the studio to drive a sightseeing bus. Ann knows he is on the job, for every day he stops in front of her house and spends several minutes telling his fares that this is the home of one of Hollywood's greatest actresses, and the honorary mayor of Toluca Lake.

The regard and esteem Ann receives from her fellow-workers is not unearned, for she is always willing to squeeze time from her busy schedule to do a favor for a friend.

Not long ago, when Ann was busy finishing a picture, she helped Tony Curtis in a film test.

This was a very important event for Tony, since he never before had a chance for a star part. Ann could not profit by the test, but because she is always eager to do a good turn for a fellow human being, she appeared in the test with Tony. And when he won the lead in The Prince Who Was a Thief, no one could have been more pleased than Ann.

Even though she's been restricting her personal appearances and benefit shows these past few months, Ann's new buoyancy and obvious good health will soon permit her to give more generous contributions of her time to charity.

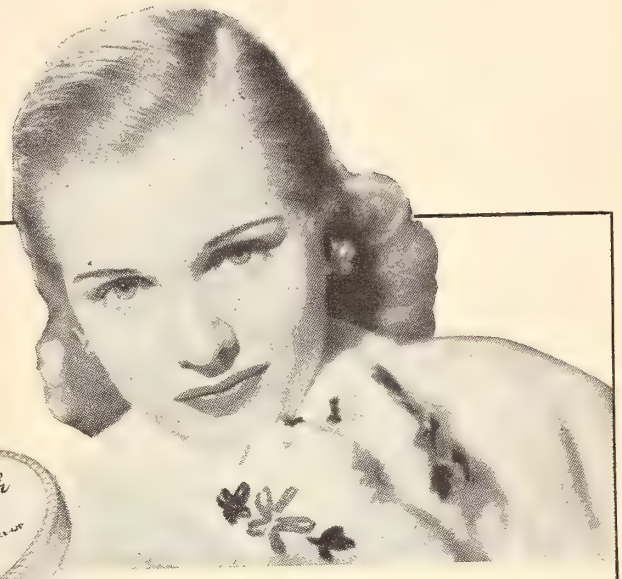
Although she's still working on a less hectic schedule, her recovery has been so rapid that she not only did an excitingly good job at the La Jolla theater, but she was well enough to be called back to Hollywood at the end of a week's run. Her studio is loaning her to MGM to play the role of Caruso's wife opposite Mario Lanza in The Life of Caruso.

Ann probably won't sing in this production, but one of her ambitions is to play the lead in a musical.

Whether or not her own studio will cast her in such a picture is a question still to be settled, but as far as Ann is concerned, nothing would suit her better than to appear in a fast-moving, well-plotted vehicle which would give her a chance to sing, dance and act.

ANN also is in the market for suggestions for a series of phonograph recordings. "I would like," she says, almost wistfully, "to make an album of Irish songs."

Ann comes naturally by her wish to sing these lively airs. Not only was her mother born in the South of Ireland, but Aunt Cis was born there, too.



"But Pat," says Aunt Cis with the air of one who bears a cross bravely, "Pat was born in the North of Ireland—poor man."

Uncle Pat, with his usual good humor, decided long ago that North or South, Ireland is a very good place to be born in—"provided a man can be after livin' in America and growing a few flowers when the weather's right."

Ann enjoys the flowers Uncle Pat grows, and is particularly proud of the asters and chrysanthemums which bloom so gaily almost everywhere about the place. These flowers, and her aunt and uncle's cheerful nature, have helped create the environment at the modest home in Toluca Lake which has aided Ann so greatly these past few months. It seems to be, as Pat often says, "You just can't keep a good Irishman down."

i go to college with liz scott

A QUESTION was gnawing at me—namely, why was this glamorous movie queen attending college and studying philosophy and political science of all things? After class, as we would walk across the campus with ten or twenty thousand other students—I eventually found out. We'd sit by the fountain in front of the library while I pretended to be discussing books and authors with her. She'd talk intelligently, and in that intense way of hers, on topics that ran from Thomas Aquinas to the Korean situation and the new concepts in nuclear physics. But somehow I couldn't seem to concentrate.

The subjects that intrigue her hungry mind are basic and ultimate. She will abruptly interrupt one of her thoughtful lulls and burst out with some really profound idea. It startled me the first time she did it.

"The pendulum has swung clear over!" she exclaimed.

"Really?" I managed to say—scanning the Tower clock for some sign of a pendulum, but in vain.

"Yes," she went on excitedly—completely oblivious to the fact that I was making eyes at her—"Remember how they once said that Mind is Matter? I never made a very good Materialist. Now the Mechanistic attitude is breaking down and has been. The analogy doesn't stand up under the new inferences drawn from modern science with its vastly improved and greatly multiplied 'pointer-readings.' That's what Eddington called the scientific procedure, you know. There's the crux of it—science can know more and more of the structure of reality but nothing more of its nature than was known by the pre-literates. It is even held now by some that a concept of energy, and energy is considered to be the basis of matter, must include free will in it. So you see—from 'Mind is Matter' to 'Matter is Mental.' Does that lead to Solipsism?"

"Boy!" I mumbled fervently, "I'll say."

When I got home I looked up "Solipsism." I tossed and turned all night thinking about Mind and wondering what was the Matter? It's just as well that all women don't have eyes like Liz Scott. I'm considering a petition to compel her to wear dark glasses. I won't have her eyes haunting my house. I just won't stand for it.

No, Lizabeth Scott isn't out of her element here among the Trojans of U.S.C. or any other campus, not with that alert and questing mind. She'll always be in the pursuit of knowledge. She doesn't wear a learned veneer, but once she gets started she's electric. I could blow a fuse just watching her.

I remember well the first day we walked down University Avenue after class. I had anticipated the envious glances of friends, and the way I would casually nod to them. But, honestly, by the time we got out of Founders Hall, I was so immersed in an animated discussion on the failure of Materialism that the campus might as well have been deserted. Liz has a fine sense of values; she can't make small talk. Yet she has a sharp sense of humor and rapier-like wit.

And her laughter—that's the greatest—rich and free with a sort of thrilling quality to it.

I admit without shame that I've had the urge to lure her to Currie's (the corner ice cream parlor) where we might share a Coke on one straw. Okay, so it's juvenile—so who cares?

"Who's your favorite movie actor?" I couldn't resist asking during one of our coffee sessions.

Her answer was immediate and sincere: "I've learned something about acting, some technique or attitude, from every leading man I've worked with. I believe in seeing people in the light of their virtues, not that it's kinder, but it's more practical. After all we all have faults. It reminds me of the Pharisee in the Bible who said, 'Thank God that I am not like other men.'"

She glanced at me and laughed. "Don't look so sober—the sermon's over."

GIRLS, listen to this. Liz and I lunched together one day at Ted Owens', an intimate little cellar cafe here on campus. While I dined heartily in rugged male fashion on a grilled cheese sandwich and cup of coffee, Liz daintily nibbled on bacon and eggs and fried potatoes, toast and jelly, topped off by peach pie, with whipped cream, and two cups of coffee. If you're envious of that slim smooth Scott figure, don't say I didn't give you her secret formula.

There seems to be understanding among the students here not to pester her or cause her any discomfort. They haven't mobbed her with fluttering autograph books. They do stand around in the hall before and after her classes, of course, but then a guy has to stand somewhere, so why not where he can get a glimpse of our "tawny Trojane," as the Daily Trojan calls her.

There have been a few episodes with brazen student-fans. Like the day we were sitting on the campus lawn and Liz, outdoor gal that she is, was soaking up a little sunshine. Some character wriggled over and coiled up right beside us.

"Whatcha doin' this week-end?" he hissed.

Now I'm six feet two and played football in my youth and there's something about Liz that makes you see yourself in a leopard-skin suit taking on lions and tigers singlehandedly. I was about to give out with my best Cro-Magnon growl when Liz restrained me. She handled the situation neatly and courteously. It was my initiation to one of the common pitfalls that celebrities must always keep in mind. If they aren't tactful in such matters, the rumor-mongers soon have it that they "made a big scene" or they are "snobbish" or "temperamental." Liz asked for no special favors and she appreciates the treatment she has received here from students and faculty alike.

"I'm just a girl," is the way she put it. That's the biggest understatement of the year.

AN incident occurred in class one day that illustrates how the fans often know more about their favorites than the movie stars know about themselves. The professor was warning us about the fallacy of the "Two-valued Orientation" and he remarked that a thing was seldom all black or all white and referred in his lecture to the song title "Either It's Love or It Isn't" as being an example of such faulty reasoning.

Immediately after class, one co-ed classmate darted over to Liz and said breathlessly, "That song 'Either It's Love or It Isn't,' you sang it in Dead Reckoning!"

"No," replied Liz, "I sang it in I Walk Alone." The gal didn't seem convinced however, and the next day she was quite thrilled when Liz told her, "You're right! I did sing that song in Dead Reckoning."

Liz was supposedly on vacation when she came to U.S.C., but she couldn't pass up well, what do you know?

this chance to study and learn. When she finished making Dark City, she was promised that her next film wouldn't go into shooting until she finished the semester here. She's looking forward to it since it's to be a different type of film from what she's been doing. It's a Western and Burt Lancaster will have the role opposite Liz.

"Wait'll you see me in calico," she laughed.

I might as well try to imagine Venus in burlap. Calico never had it so good.

It takes Liz and her black Oldsmobile convertible about 40 minutes to drive to school every morning from her home in Hollywood.

"I don't have to get up until 6:30 to make our first class," she gloated. "That's an hour more sleep than I get when I'm making a picture."

I had heard that movie people are early risers, but I was skeptical until now.

Most of the students drive their cars in from all over the metropolitan Los Angeles area, and parking space around here is at a premium. Liz wrestles with the parking problem every morning—oh, to be a parking problem and wrestle back! One morning as she was frantically circling and searching, I thought for a moment that she was going to break down and cry. I was all set to whip out my hankie and rest that lovely blonde head on my shoulder, when some kill-joy pulled out of a space and my dreams were shattered. You can imagine my disappointment.

Liz is a girl who lives every moment; she's the personification of enthusiasm. Whatever she's working on she throws herself into wholeheartedly. She's remarked several times, "I didn't get enough sleep last night. I got so engrossed in the book I was reading that I simply had to finish it."

When she studies she really studies. You're likely to find her in some secluded spot like the stadium, or a deserted corner of the library reading room, or an empty classroom.

She's a paradoxical creature. Even though she often seeks solitude, she's no recluse by any means. Liz is too interested in people—all kinds of people. People like the elderly lady who sells "popsickles" on campus, several of our foreign students, waitresses at campus cafes, classmates. Her natural friendliness is disarming; people can't help but respond in kind. They all like Liz.

It would indicate a dangerous lack of interest, of course, if there were no reasonable displays of admiration. Even that austere statue of the Trojan warrior, known affectionately to the students as "Tommy Trojan," has been reported to have given a low whistle of approval when Liz walks by. He no doubt thinks that Helen of Troy has been reincarnated.

We fortunate few who have been sharing classes with Liz, while we don't have the slightest idea what the classes were about, are really sorry to see the semester's end stalking us grimly. We're all in agreement that the classrooms have never been so well adorned. There will be an emptiness when Liz goes—since the whole male student body may be inclined to follow her. But seriously, I hope she comes back. I'm sure she'll come back.

She'd better come back!

if i should lose you

(Continued from page 30) long ago, the Steffens sat down to discuss their future. A happy year of marriage was behind them and what was in front of them they couldn't say. But they're not the kind to sit around and worry. They're not going to change their plans for anything.

If he should leave her, though, he'd leave the house they've just bought "at a very good price"—the two-story Cape Cod home which formerly belonged to Ilona Massey. It has two bedrooms, two baths, a den, a living room, kitchen, breakfast nook, service porch and maid's quarters. It's a wonderful place for children, with a swimming pool in back and a badminton court, and flowers everywhere. He'd leave with the memories—of the spinet in the living room (which Jane's had since she was ten) where she plays and sings for him; of the frilly dressing table that reminds him of her gay and feminine ways; of the hours they've spent at auctions and in antique shops buying lamps and figurines with such care. And all the wedding gifts that helped to furnish the home, and the fifteen candy dishes and two dozen lighters scattered about will come again to his mind.

But until he goes, their life will be the same. There will be dinner parties no more elaborate than before. They live on a budget which allows 20 dollars a week for food. If a party uses up most of the food money, they skimp a little, or Jane prepares left-overs like chocolate tarts out of chocolate pudding, and vegetable salad and chicken croquettes. Geary eats anything she cooks, except beets and cakes. So far he's gained 16 pounds.

Maybe it's the candlelight that did it, or the soft music that Jane wouldn't serve a meal without—although once she forgot the food.

At her first party after she became a bride, Jane planned the menu very carefully. There were to be sandwiches, salad, a luscious dessert. Jane shopped for everything at the Farmers' Market. When all the guests had arrived, and were getting hungry, Jane excused herself to make the sandwiches, and found that she'd forgotten the meat she was going to put in them! Geary can remember that, if he ever has to look for a memory.

Or if he wants a happier one he can think back to the farewell dinner Jane gave for themselves just before they moved into the new house. The Marshall Thompsons were there, and the Jerome Courtlands.

The theme was fish. Clam chowder was served in shells, baked crab and fried shrimp were tastefully arranged along with french fried potatoes. There was a tossed green salad and strawberry tarts for dessert. This time Jane didn't forget anything. She even covered the table with a fish net and had a centerpiece of shells filled with flowers. The table mats were silver and shaped like fish.

After dinner they went dancing at a beach resort called Ocean House, and he can remember the way the moonlight shone on Jane's lavender chiffon dress, and touched her hair with silver. Everyone complimented her on that dress. "It isn't new," Jane told her friends. "Geary doesn't want me to buy more clothes for a while. He says I have enough, and he's right!"

The budget for clothes still varies, but Jane's careful about selecting a wardrobe. She loves casual peasant skirts for daytime wear and wispy, feminine gowns for evening. She designs most of what she wears and sometimes even sews for herself. But if Geary should go, Jane would never be sure how she looked, because he wouldn't be there to tell her, "You have too much powder on your nose," or, "Why don't you wear that blue gown I love?" or, simply, "You look so beautiful . . ."

If he should go, what would be the use of a budget for entertainment? Usually, they save for dinner out and a show or dancing, and it's always more fun when you've planned and saved together. Sometimes they spend a weekend water skiing at Lake Arrowhead, or camping out in the mountains at Idlewild where Geary's sister lives. Whenever possible they try to go skiing. They haven't been ice-skating since their marriage. Geary, who was formerly Sonja Henie's skating partner, has given up skating even for recreation. Or they stay home, and buy recordings to add to Jane's collection of 5,000. They both like all sorts of good music, either classical or jazz. Geary likes the songs Jane sings in her movies, especially the ones from Royal Wedding, her seventh Technicolor musical.

Sometimes Jane stays home to clean the house. There's a maid only while Jane's working, other times Jane wraps up her hair in a kerchief and attacks the dust.

Mostly, Geary will remember the evenings the two of them spent sitting in front of the fireplace, reading aloud to each other, or talking and planning.

They want to have children as soon as possible, three or maybe four. Jane was an only child and has always wanted a large family. As soon as the children are old enough, their parents will teach them how to swim and skate and play tennis. They've even gone so far as to plan the insurance policies they'll take out for the family, to provide for their education and to finance them later in business or whatever they choose to do.

As far as all finances go, Jane and Geary have settled on a fifty-fifty basis. Everything that Jane puts to the account, Geary matches. It works fine.

If he should leave her, she'll spend her days waiting for him to return so that they can travel together to the places they dream about—to Sun Valley, to Mexico. But Janie doesn't want to go too far away for too long; she'll begin to pine for California.

To make these plans come true, Geary's working toward a brokerage company of his own, and Jane is helping him. She's his secretary; she prepares his graphs; she's even going to take a course at USC to learn how to sell insurance. Geary appreciates this; he knows he's found a rare partner, and because of that he'll never interfere in her own career.

"Why should she give up what she likes and loves, when I don't give up what I like and love?" Unless he's forced to. Unless something stronger than both of them will make him.

Meanwhile they work together and enjoy it. Geary doesn't want to be an actor; he doesn't even want to be a movie producer. He isn't bothered by career jealousy. Neither one of them is bothered by in-law problems, either. Their two families are very close. On Father's day Geary and Jane take their fathers out, on Mother's Day, they take their mothers, and in between, they're always visiting one or the other or both families.

Parting will be harder because they're in love; because they're in love little problems of living together have been easier to solve. Geary, for instance, likes large breakfasts. Jane doesn't. So they've compromised. Jane makes breakfast, and Geary eats it.

Sometimes Jane just likes to sit around and loaf. Geary has to keep busy all the time. So they've hit a happy medium.

Jane used to be nervous. Geary never was. Being near him has calmed her down. Through Geary, Jane has come to love sports. Through Jane, Geary has come to love music.

If she should lose him, she'd lose the head of the family; the man who lives to make her happy; the one who gave her a surprise birthday party when she was twenty-one last April, and gave her a pair of real pearl earrings. (As a wedding present he'd given her a pearl necklace.) He's the man who insists on celebrating when the fifth of each month comes around, because it was on the fifth of January that they became engaged, and on the fifth of November that they got married.

If she should lose him, she'd lose the husband she'd wanted even before she knew him. The husband she'd written about in a magazine.

This is what she said: "First of all, I would want the man I marry to be kind, considerate, and have a happy disposition. He would have to be fond of animals, like people, and enjoy parties. I want him to like to dance and attend night clubs occasionally. He must enjoy music and not object to my career. He must love children. I want him to share the happy side of marriage as well as the problems. I want a man who treats his wife as a partner in everything. Looks are not particular, just so he's neat and athletic looking. I like the outdoor type. And most of all, he must think I'm the most important girl in the world."

This is the man who would leave her if Geary left. And even if it were only for a while, there would be no joy until he returned.

This summer, right after she finished Harriet Craig, she gathered her brood around her to make vacation plans.

"How about going to Lake Arrowhead?" she said. "We can take boat rides there and hike and swim. What do you say?"

The children didn't say anything. Then Chris spoke up.

"Mommie," he said. "Let's go someplace where there are cowboys and horses." The other kids nodded their heads vigorously. Cowboys and horses it had to be.

That afternoon they all went down to San Fernando Valley and cleaned out the wild west department of a clothing store —cowboy boots, levis, broad-brimmed hats, dazzling plaid shirts were swooped off the counters for the Crawford kids. Christopher, being a boy, had the edge on his sisters. He got a Hopalong Cassidy outfit for the mornings, and a Roy Rogers getup for the afternoons. He could have walked up to a bronco right then and busted him with a stare.

There was nothing left for Joan to do but produce the cowboys and horses. Fortunately, there's a place called Alisal Ranch situated in the Santa Barbara Mountains. It's one of the largest working cattle ranches in Southern California and a couple of years ago, Lynn Gillam, the owner, decided to make it a guest ranch as well.

While the kids slept Joan called up for last minute reservations and then she started packing. Bright and early, Chris hopped out of bed and into his new boots. He raced out of the house to the car where Joan was already loading luggage into a tiny trailer. "Let me help," he urged, and Joan let him. Soon the twins came out with Tina and there wasn't enough for all of them to do.

By nine, they'd picked up Joan's mother, and all six of them, plus Cliquot, the poodle, were headed for a week at Alisal.

THEY arrived at noon, and there were more horses on those 10,500 acres of land than Chris could have hoped for. "Let's go riding," he said as they drove into the ranch yard.

"Mommie, can I go swimming, please?" asked Cynthia.

"Me, too," said Cathy.

Joan was saved by Mr. and Mrs. Gillam, who came out to greet them as if they were members of the family arriving home.

"I'll need an ironing board," Joan said. "Keeping these four in clothes is going to be the biggest job."

Mrs. Gillam smiled understandingly, and half an hour later, while Joan was unpacking, a cowboy delivered an ironing board to her cottage door.

"Now can we go riding?" asked Chris.

"Now can we go swimming?" asked Cynthia.

Another mother might have given up there; she might have thrown up her hands and moaned, "Do anything, but leave me alone." Not Joan. Joan sat down and they talked out what they'd rather do. Turned out to be swimming. The horses were promised for the first thing tomorrow.

They all went down to the pool and Joan took her knitting along to busy herself in between racing with the kids. Joan is a frantic knitter. During her spare moments on the set she turned out a huge collection of sweaters for friends, socks for grips, ski caps for the snow-happy. A couple of months ago, when the children's nurse had to leave suddenly for her home, Joan and her family discussed what they'd give her as a going-away present that night.

"Why don't you knit her a sweater, Mother?" asked Christopher, confident that his mother wouldn't need more than an hour or two to turn out a first rate job.

IN no time at all, the afternoon hopped over the hills at Alisal and disappeared beyond them. Clean and sparkling as sterling silver, the Crawfords came to dinner. Joan asked for the largest table.

"I'm sorry," the waiter told her. "Bob Crosby's party has that. They outnumber you by two."

Joan waved across the room to June Crosby, Inc., and meekly settled for the second largest.

After a cowboy-size dinner, the twins insisted they were wide-awake as they dozed off in their chairs.

Her big daughter Tina turned toward her with a dreamy, slightly glazed expression. "Mother," she said. "Can we go riding in the moonlight?"

As it happened they went riding in their dreams. By the next morning, though, the children were used to the change in atmosphere, and took to ranch life with a vengeance. They bounded out of bed almost before the sun was up, and ran out to play. For a moment, Joan wondered sleepily if they'd disturb the neighbors, but the voices of at least a dozen other children drifted toward her in the early air. All the neighbors, it seemed, were already up.

As soon as Joan came out of the cottage, Chris ran over to her and started talking about horses and when would they ride them. In a way, this was a question Joan dreaded. Ten years before Joan had loved to ride. She'd owned two frisky ponies and worked them out on the trail near her Brentwood home. One day, though, she was thrown in a complete somersault over her pony's head and spent the next few weeks in bed. After that she wouldn't go near a horse. But now, here was Chris, expecting her to leap with joy onto a saddle, and here were the twins, waiting to be afraid or daring as their mother's own feelings would dictate.

Right after lunch, Joan and the children put on their riding clothes and sauntered down to the corral. Joan hoped they'd give her an old nag, a horse who'd be happiest in front of a flower cart, but Alisal doesn't have that kind of horse. Anyway, when the animals were saddled, Joan climbed aboard, and smiled gaily at Chris and Tina who were too excited to notice the way she clutched the saddle-horn.

A few miles down the trail, Mr. Gillam rode up. "Having fun, Miss Crawford?"

"If you can enjoy yourself and be scared to death at the same time . . ."

"I thought you were a little uneasy," he said, "though you sit a horse beautifully. Just relax. Your back's like a poker."

Joan tried to relax. She noticed that the horse didn't mind. He clopped along very contentedly, and suddenly Joan began to notice the scenery, the trees and the mountains beyond, and the good damp smell of greenery. She was enjoying herself, and her children were enjoying themselves, and it was nice that they were all there together.

By the third day of their stay, the ranch had them in its power. They were up at 6:30, finished with breakfast at 7:00, and ready to play. Even the twins had become horse-mad and rode two hours a day. They wore their boots so much that both of them had blisters on their ankles, but that didn't stop them.

Chris was out of this world, and who would suspect, seeing this small blond boy on a big horse, that he was really Hoppy or Roy Rogers or a whole battalion of the Canadian Mounties?

Pedro was his horse's name, and that's all Chris talked about, until Joan came to think of him as a member of the family.

"I guess Pedro's about the fastest horse alive," he'd say. "He's just holding back."

"I guess so," said Joan, not wanting to break a dream.

SATURDAY rolled around faster than it ever had. There was to be a dance and campfire that night, but Joan didn't have a beau to take her—that is, she thought she didn't. Chris was willing. He was so willing that he polished his boots until he could see his face in them, and he looked slicker than a dime store whistle. Joan walked into the dance on his arm, and they were easily the handsomest couple there. After the dance, they went out to the campfire and sat around talking cowboy talk with Les and Bill, the wranglers, until Christopher's eyes were heavy with sleep. Joan almost had to carry her cowboy to bed.

Then, one morning, they woke up, and it was all over—the week, the vacation, the life of Riley. The children had one last ride and presented their horses with carrots. That afternoon, though, as Joan was packing, she heard Christopher crying in the next room.

"What's the matter, Chris?" Joan said.

"I forgot to give Pedro his carrot," Chris sobbed. "He won't remember me."

Joan smiled at the enormity of this problem, but her voice was gentle. "Tell you what," she said. "You and I will go down right now and give Pedro a carrot."

So they walked down to the corral hand in hand, and Joan stood watching as Chris picked out his pony from the several dozen in the yard and handed him the carrot. Pedro ate it quietly, and then Chris hugged him and walked back to Joan with the suggestion of more tears.

"Thanks, Mommie," he said, and was ready to go home.

All of them piled into the car, plus Cliquot, the poodle, and as they rode out of the ranch yard they had the feeling everyone has when a good time is over. They didn't know whether to be happy or sad. But as they neared home the children started talking about the winter, and school, and the next summer, and the summer after that, and looking at their faces, Joan knew that as long as the kids were with her there would always be so much to look forward to, so many pleasures to be enjoyed over again. THE END

I was eagerly waiting at the back door of Shea's Buffalo Theater for John Agar. When he failed to appear after a few hours, I started to leave, cold and discouraged. Bumping into someone, I politely excused myself and walked on. Not until the crowd started pushing toward the spot where I'd been standing did I realize that it was John Agar whom I'd bumped into.

when a girl marries

When a girl marries, a subtle alchemy occurs. Even at the fateful, precious moment when her honeymoon began, Elizabeth Taylor was already a different person. Even as she snuggled down in the seat of Nicky's green Cadillac and reached for his arm, she reached for the new wonders that lay before her—the new wonders and the new worries, and the new responsibilities, too. Even as Liz headed for Pebble Beach and her honeymoon lodge—a destination oh, so secret then—I saw her eyes shining eagerly ahead, not wistfully back. Even when she returned a week later to pack for her European tour and fly away again there was a new wisdom in those eyes and new confidence in her voice. She was on her own. That little girl I knew was gone as she should be gone, when a girl marries.

She'd crossed the Atlantic a dozen times or more before the Queen Elizabeth glided her out of New York harbor for her Continental honeymoon. But on all those trips she'd never had her own cabin, never sat proudly at the captain's table with her husband by her side, never could enter into the fun and the social life of the voyage. Always Elizabeth had been the guarded girl who must wander about under watchful eyes, out of things. On this trip, there were the Duke and Duchess of Windsor, Richard Rodgers (who wrote the score of South Pacific) and his wife, other glamorous, interesting people to dine, chat and dance with. There was being a woman of the world herself, belonging.

Elizabeth had been to Paris before—lots of times. But she'd never spent a honeymoon week free as the air to stroll the Rue de la Paix and windowshop, sit at a sidewalk cafe and sip an aperitif with her man. She'd never peered into the pungent bistros and the gaudy cafes of Montmartre to watch the saucy sin with adult eyes which understood. She never had a Paris couturier create an evening gown just for her, to her own taste, for a grand charity ball. She'd never been invited to the Windsors for a formal evening which began at ten with dinner at midnight. Heavens—if Elizabeth ever dined after 8:30 in her life anywhere before she'd have felt wicked and guilty.

And England—certainly that's no unfamiliar place to Elizabeth Taylor. She was born there, in Hempstead, and raised nearby on the Kent estate of her godfather, Victor Cazalet. But at the Savoy this time, Mama didn't register, her husband, Nick, did; and Elizabeth didn't sit fretting around the hotel watching other grown-ups have fun. She had it herself. She'd made Conspirator in London only a year before. But she hadn't rolled out to Ascot for the races in her Ceil Chapman organdie with the big Rex picture hat dripping sweet peas around the brim and Nick dressed to kill in gray topper and stock, hobnobbing with royalty. She hadn't been invited by the Rodgers as their honor guests for the opening of their show, Carousel! Nor had she faced with her new found assurance the sea of London fans crying, "Bless you, Elizabeth," just as they did their own Lillibet, at the London premiére of her own picture, Father of The Bride.

There was such a big difference this time. Freedom and independence and a new status which had locked the sheltering door of girlhood behind her and opened new doors to new worlds every day. Elizabeth felt it as she flew back to Paris, bustling through the crowds at the airport, fencing with customs officials, ordering dinner with Nick from airy waiters, prodding porters. She felt it rolling south to Cannes, alone together, just she and Nick, in the big Cadillac they'd shipped across, through the lovely hills and vineyards, stopping at ancient inns and seeing the friendly peasants not as curiosities but for the first time as people, people with lives and loves and secrets—like herself. She felt it in Venice when they met their friends, the John Bigelows of New York, and spent lazy hours with them on the beach at Lido. And it was a delicious feeling to call her own shots as the days stretched into weeks, and the Hiltons themselves stretched out on the sands, to say luxuriously, with her first independence of option, "Nick, these are the best days of our honeymoon. Let's don't travel all the time. Let's stay here and enjoy ourselves. Sweden and Norway and Spain and Holland—we'll see them some day later."

Elizabeth has grown up—more in those four wonderful months than in all the 18 years of her young life. Time is a fiction anyway and how can any calendar measure the changes of heart and spirit, outlook and interests that pack maturing years into days, when a girl marries?

True, to watch Elizabeth burst into the big Spanish home on Elm Drive, that homecoming day, see her kiss her mama, hug her dad and ruffle her brother Howard's curly head, chattering a mile a minute, you might think she was still just their darling little girl, back from a holiday and sick to get home.

It was just like Elizabeth to fret anxiously about Howard's 1-A classification with war blazing in Korea, to flood with tears when she learned the carefully withheld news that "Butch," her beloved poodle, had died, to hurry sentimentally over to the V-Bar-R in Griffith Park, where her aging King Charles nibbled hay with the Hilton horses, and feed him carrots. It was like her to race at once across the street to see Anne Westmore, about to leave any minute for Stephens College, and tell her everything, everything, because Anne was her best friend since childhood and had caught her bridal bouquet. It was like Liz to keep the telephone wire smoking "catching up" with her bridesmaids, to hug all four of the Culverhouse family, English servants who have worked for the Taylors since before Elizabeth was born.

It was like her to rave over the new blue Cadillac convertible her mother had bought for her only a week before Elizabeth came home, to call the family living room, done over completely in modern gray green, "just dreamy," and to bound upstairs for a look at her own room, with its new periwinkle blue walls and dubonnet carpet, which her mother had labored over night and day to have ready for her return. It was the old Elizabeth who called it "the best party ever" when her mother gave a homecoming dinner next day, with her new in-laws, "Connie" Hilton, Nick's brother, Barron, and Marilyn, his wife, Mara Reagan, Howard's girl friend, the Wally Westmores across the street and, of course, Anne, with a menu designed especially to Nick's taste—fried chicken, mashed potatoes, corn, peas, Caesar salad

Elizabeth meant every word she uttered so warmly then, and every homecoming thrill at Elm Drive was deeply felt, I'm sure. She's always been a family girl and as sentimental as a tipsy Irishman. But no matter how attractive Sara Taylor makes her girlhood home, it isn't Elizabeth Hilton's home any more.

So let's look at the new life Elizabeth faces—its setting and setup, its promises and its problems, as Elizabeth and every girl must look—forward, not back, when they marry.

Home to Elizabeth and Nick Hilton is Suite 159-60 at the Bel-Air Hotel (where Nick is half owner and vice-president). It's the most delightful hotel in Southern California and the newlywed Hiltons have its finest suite—at the south end, ground floor, with vine draped arches leading out to Chalon Road, so Liz won't have to walk through the public lobby.

Inside there's a big living room with a fireplace, done in Elizabeth's favorite gray. There are yellow and gray striped sofa and chairs, a black table and coffee table. Off that's the bath and bedroom, with the same decor, twin beds—but not too far apart. Already Elizabeth has moved in some keepsakes from home, but her wedding presents are still in storage.

But in spite of what Elizabeth tells me, that "we're going to live here a year or so and look around before we buy or build," I don't believe her. She argues that she and Nick are too busy to make a real home yet. They're busy all right. Elizabeth's picture, Father's Little Dividend, was prepared while she was in Europe, she has a waiting list from here to Texas for gallery sittings, interviews, Heaven knows what all to catch up with. Nick's not exactly twiddling his thumbs, either. Besides handling business promotion at the Bel-Air, he's a big wheel in his dad's hotel empire, and with the new Beverly-Hilton slated to rise soon, he'll have his hands full.

Yet—when a girl marries—she wants and she needs her own house to anchor her life, and knowing Elizabeth, I can't believe she'll be satisfied with anything short of that—for more than a few weeks.

There's a whole room jammed full of wedding presents, beautiful presents, enough to fill the great living room of the Taylor's, wall to wall, with just two tiny aisles where I walked to view them. It took six men and two moving vans from dawn to dusk just to pack and cart them away! If you had a store of fine Irish linens, Steuben crystal, sterling, Sheffield plate, table settings for forty-eight places of Gorham Melrose silver—wouldn't you itch to use them? If you had wedding gifted paintings by Augustus John, Angna Enters and Benton Scott, wouldn't you be spoiling for wall space of your own to hang 'em? I would!

So—you can bet on it—the hotel suite won't last long. After all, Nick's not the manager, he doesn't have to live there. The young Hiltons will be looking at house plans or for houses somewhere. Elizabeth tells me, "Not pretentious. Not Bel Air—Heavens," she says wisely, "that's starting at the top—that wouldn't be fun!" But when a bride takes over a home of her own, there's more to it than being carried across the threshold and watching it run itself. There's responsibility. There's a heap of know-how to learn and much more in Elizabeth Hilton's case than baking biscuits.

Elizabeth has always had everything done for her. She's been raised with servants at her beck and call. She can't fry an egg or sew on a button. She's always stepped out of her dresses and left them where they lay. She sailed off on her honeymoon with a huge, square trunk carefully packed with 30 custom-created hats, by Sally Victor, Rex, Mister John. The trunk returned in a jumble. "I'll be months," sighed her indulgent mother, "catching up hems, sewing on hooks and buttons, mending rips and tears on Elizabeth's whole trousseau." That's a loving job she welcomes, but she can't do everything for Elizabeth from now on.

Elizabeth will have to learn the graces and arts of a hostess—how to plan a dinner party, how to stimulate conversation, spark good times with friends and influence people. She'll have to charm as well as be charmed and that's a new line of work. Heretofore all the flattery and attention has been bent Liz's lovely way. Now she'll have to bend some back.

Already Elizabeth, back home, is wailing, "Hedda, I owe simply everyone!" Of course, she does, including all her friends and Nick's who gave them pre-wedding parties. They understand, they're old friends—even "Pete" Freeman, who introduced them, understood when from the whole long honeymoon he got just one picture postcard, scribbled hastily with "Having wonderful time. Wish you were here." (Chuckled Pete, "Yeah—I'll bet!")

Elizabeth's girlhood chums, Anne Westmore, Barbara Thompson, Marjorie Dillon, Jane Powell, Betty Sullivan and the rest will demand no more of her now than they ever have, but Mrs. C. N. Hilton's circle will expand, and she'll have to develop herself and her wits to fill it. Luckily, Elizabeth couldn't have more solid support for the job.

Money, for one thing, is no problem, and I can't imagine that unless an A-bomb flattens the widespread Hilton Hotels and MGM too, it ever will be. The modern-traditional house they'll eventually have (Nick has already switched Liz's ideas from early American), even if modest, will be perfectly appointed with all that money can buy, although Elizabeth will have to reveal her good taste in creating it. But never mind, she has a precocious lump of that, and Mother can help. As for family backing—the minute she married, and even before that, Liz gained a big cheering section of in-laws. When a girl marries, it's "thy people shall be my people," as the Bible said long ago, and Nick's people worship the very ground their beautiful new member trips on.

Nick's every bit as close to his dynamic dad as Elizabeth is to her doting mother. Sara Taylor used to sigh to me, "I always have to stay dressed up even when I go to bed the nights Elizabeth goes out." Because, no matter what time she came in, Liz raced right upstairs—usually bringing her dates along with her—to tell Mama all about the evening. Nick never misses a morning coffee with his dad to talk things over, too. I suspect that Mama's bed will still be perched on by Elizabeth and Nick with problems and that the Hilton coffee klatch will continue too—with a new member added. There'll be more warm family liaison with Barron and Marilyn, and Liz will find she'll have so much that's intimately in common with her sister-in-law, besides being "Aunt Elizabeth" from now on to their darling kids, Bill and Hawley. And—this is important—there's not a Hilton around who isn't as supremely proud of Elizabeth Taylor's star fame and glowing career as are her own mother and dad—and rooting solidly for it to continue, bigger and better.

And what about that career, now that Elizabeth is back after a long time out for her marriage and honeymoon tour? There's an old Hollywood saying that a girl has to live and love before she can really deliver great performances. It's a corny cliché but there's truth in it, too. I think Elizabeth will be a better actress for what has happened to her, and right now she's doing very well thanks, anyway. Father of the Bride was her most popular picture in years and there's the much heralded A Place in the Sun with Monty Clift ready for release.

Already, she's knee deep in Father's Little Dividend, and the first thing she discovered when she ran out to MGM the second day she was back in town was that they'd loaned her to Warners and then to Hal Wallis for two others to follow, drawing, by the way, Jane Wyman and Burt Lancaster, no less, for the exchange.

Elizabeth herself hasn't lost any of her acting ambition. On the contrary, she itched even through the dreamy days of her honeymoon for the thrill of making pictures. When she and Nick visited the Quo Vadis set near Rome, Mervyn LeRoy was herding a thousand extras in a scene where Christians were being rounded up for torture in a Roman arena. Elizabeth just couldn't stand there and watch.

"Oh, Merv," begged Lizzie, "please let me be a Christian and get in a scene!" Mervyn did, and if a girl who was supposed to star in Metro's super-special begs to be an unbilled extra, how lonesome can you be for grease paint, a costume and hot lights?

All in all, Elizabeth Taylor's career outlook could not be rosier right now. But there are some prickly thorns hidden underneath those plushy petals. There always are, when a girl who's a star marries in Hollywood.

Up until this minute, Elizabeth has not been called on to play the cautious cutthroat game of watching her p's and q's in Hollywood. She was sheltered like a hothouse flower at home and MGM protected her like a regiment of marines. She was everyone's beauteous ideal, mama's, papa's, daughter's, son's. Every day there throbbed the thrilling question: Whom would Elizabeth Taylor fall in love with, whom would she marry?

Well, that question has finally been answered. From now on real front page news of Elizabeth will be hard to get, as it is on all happy Hollywood wives. So don't be surprised if some is cooked up. That's what publicity departments are for.

From now on, and I told Elizabeth so, she won't dare look at another man sidewise. Like Caesar's wife, she must live so as to be above suspicion. Every move of the Hiltons' private life will be analyzed, sifted and weighed for what can be made out of it. If there's the tiniest opening for a rift rumor, one will edge in and pry—like that. If I were Nick Hilton I'd never for one minute fly off, say to Puerto Rico, as he did during their courtship, and the Caribe-Hilton on business, not this time without my pretty bride at my side. But he may have to—the Hilton interests are scattered all over and he's a busy young executive. Elizabeth is a busy Hollywood star. He may have to leave her at home a time or two. And suppose an important première comes up about then where Elizabeth Taylor's presence will help put over a million dollar picture? And maybe the pressure's turned on and some rising young MGM boy beautiful escorts her—oh my! It could happen. So can a hundred other innocent smokes without fire puff up—and in Hollywood smoke can be dangerous, too.

I told her to find the smartest, wisest woman in this city, who knows the Hollywood score from A to Z. "Have her run your publicity, answer your mail, manage your servants, supervise your house, lay out your clothes and—yes—chaperone you every hour Nick's away from your side. Never mind if she costs you a fortune—you can afford it."

"Well—" demurred Elizabeth—thinking I'm sure that she'd just shaken herself loose from something like that when she left her mother—"I'll think about it." I hope she thinks good and hard. She can't be too careful. Besides, she will need professional help. Her greatest shortage from now on is going to be time, time and energy. She hasn't one career now, she has two. She'll have to ration herself.

From now on she'll be battling to keep her screen life from intruding on her life with Nick Hilton. She'll need time and peace and strength to live her life with her husband, time to talk over his problems, to be interested, sympathetic, not frayed and jittery and impatient.

And she'll want time and strength for a third career which—wouldn't surprise me a bit—may come her way any day. Elizabeth has been mothering things ever since she was barely bigger than a bunny—dollies, chipmunks, cats and colts, pups and parakeets—and she's told me time and again how she longs for a family—"But not yet," she keeps repeating every time I ask her, "not until we've had time to catch up with ourselves." But I never knew a stork yet who gave any foolish ideas like that a snap of his silly old beak.

I'm no believer in omens, but it is true that Elizabeth will have a baby boy—on the screen, of course—in Father's Little Dividend, and if she has a little dividend of her own, say, about the time that picture is released—wouldn't Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer love that! And wouldn't Elizabeth too—but for another reason. And wouldn't old All-American Grandmaw me—for just no reason at all, or every reason in the world! And why stop now—wouldn't everyone?

Because Elizabeth Taylor, like another Elizabeth across the sea, who has just set her a wonderful example, is princess royal to us here in Hollywood, and like young Mrs. Mountbatten, she will be worshipped and watched. I know them both and while Liz doesn't boast the coronets that Lillibet does, she has the same class and courage. It takes a lot of that—in any set or circle—when a girl marries, because there's plenty of truth in that old jingle,

"Needles and pins, needles and pins,
When a girl marries her trouble begins."

Nobody, not even Walt Disney, really believes that Cinderella lived happily ever after, and if Elizabeth and Nick Hilton maintain the state of story book bliss, they won't be human—or even interesting. But they can be happy, and I believe they will be, if they work at it night and day, now that they've both discovered that, East and West, home is best. THE END

The editors of Modern Screen were aware of these rumors long before they reached the newspapers, but have continued to hold their silence because of their belief that this young couple deserves every chance for happiness.

they were brides too soon

Errol Flynn did a turnabout on this situation. He invited ex-wife Nora's stepmother to live with them. He lost Nora, kept the stepmother. Sometimes I think Errol is 16—romantically.

"My in-laws were sweet, but if a young couple wants to be happy and married, living with your husband's family is not the best way," Rhonda went on.

John Agar didn't exactly live with Shirley's family, but it was the next worst thing, right next door within eye-view of Mama and Papa Temple. You can bet now that Charles Black will move the little lady of his delightful dreams to a location where in-laws will have to knock before they look.

"YOU'RE inclined to be confused when you are married too young," said Rhonda. "But look at Elizabeth Taylor," I told her. "I've never seen a girl so poised in her marriage as 18-year-old Lizzie." "Maybe she's different," Rhonda replied. "She's been sheltered all her life. The decisions have all been made for her. But I still think even Elizabeth would have insured her chance of being happily married if she had waited a little longer."

Some girls of course can't wait. They want to set records—like Arline Judge and her six husbands. Some girls like to live happily ever after, every few years. They shed husbands like snakes shed skins. But these are exceptions of course. Most intelligent girls enter the stage of matrimony with the fervent prayer that "This is it."

"A girl friend of mine," Rhonda told me, "asked my advice a few months ago. She's 19 but she wanted to know if that was too young to get married. I didn't say 'No' because I remembered my mother saying that. Parents have to be very careful with their children when they have an urge to get married. So I said to the girl—'I'll tell you my story. If Tom and I had waited, we wouldn't have married. When you marry so young, you miss so much fun. You see your girl friends running around having a good time while you are so settled. Of course, if he has a good sound job with money in the bank that helps. If not, don't let anyone fool you—love can fly out of the window'."

"So what did the girl do?" I wanted to know. "She married the guy," giggled Rhonda. "And they seem to be happy. But I'll tell you what happened with Tom and me. I was only 15 when I met him. But I thought I was quite experienced. I'd worked as a show girl in Ken Murray's Blackouts. I nearly won a 'Gateway to Hollywood' radio contest from Jesse Lasky. I came in second. I'll never forget how I cried and cried backstage, and Jean Hersholt said, 'Some day you'll see that losing was the greatest blessing that could have happened to you.'

"I WAS pretty developed for a girl of 15, one year I was a child, and the next I looked like a woman. I met Tom on a New Year's Eve. I'd been going on and off with a boy in the Beverly Hills High School. We quarreled a lot. Girls would ask me—'is it on or off this week?'

I SAW IT HAPPEN

When Betty Garrett and Larry Parks were in Cleveland on a personal appearance tour, they were asked to have their pictures taken with some children at my neighborhood playground. Betty and Larry sat in swings and called the children to them, not caring that some were poor and even dirty. I saw Larry hold a little boy on his lap and later slip some money into his hand. "Run home," he told him. His face couldn't have looked happier as he watched the little fellow run off.

Mrs. L. Pikul
Cleveland, Ohio

This particular night we went to a party, had an argument. I looked for him at midnight, but he had disappeared. I never did find him. I was crazy about him. Another boy said 'Come on—I'll take you home'. I was crying. My life was ruined, but I let him take me to a drive-in for some hot chocolate. In those days I was so sensitive, if anyone said 'Boo' to me, I started to cry.

"Next to us in the drive-in there was a long convertible Buick. 'I want you to meet Marilyn,' the boy with me shouted to the man in the car (Rhonda's real name is Marilyn Louis). 'Tom Lane has a fourteen piece orchestra and he's looking for a girl singer,' he whispered to me. I was still sobbing and I guess I attracted Tom because I didn't pay any attention to him." Do I have to tell you that Rhonda landed the girl singer job? "I was never really swept off my feet by Tom. I always have to know a person well to like them. But as I told you, the excitement of getting married was too hard for me to resist.

"Tom was like a big brother to me. My sister was married, my parents divorced. I needed someone to talk to. We were married seven years." The only good result, apart from the experience, was their son Kent.

After the marriage Tom, for some reason Rhonda couldn't remember, gave up his orchestra and began interior decorating.

"I found I was earning more money than Tom and that's bad, too. I was under contract to Fox, but to save the marriage I gave that up and sold jewelry and luggage at Coulters. Then when my figure came back after the baby, I modeled at the May Company and Magnins. Then Henry Willson said I just had to see Selznick. I was wearing a little peasant blouse and skirt, but he signed me the same day."

"How did Tom like that?" I asked Rhonda. "He didn't," she replied. "I was now nearly 19 and growing up faster than Tom. He was a few years older by actual count but a boy of 21 is a baby compared to a girl of 19.

"I was beginning to know what I wanted to do. Until then it was just wonderful to dance with Tom—we went to Catalina one time and won a cup for a waltz. And we had music in common. But even that wasn't enough. I wanted to do more important things."

CAME the war, Tom went into the service, and when he returned, he and Rhonda, like millions of other war separated couples, were strangers across the breakfast table.

"I didn't run around while he was away, as some other war wives did," said Rhonda. "I used to get phone calls, but I always said 'no.' I stayed with his family during the war. If a call came from the studio, I'd rush with Kent to my own mother, then pick him up late at night. I wanted so to do the right thing. After the war, we took a studio apartment on La Cienega Boulevard. I worked for every piece of furniture we got. There was only a couch to sleep on, and no room for Kenny.

"I'm a Mormon and I started to do a lot of church work. I went to Sunday School to talk to the children about the importance of faith in God. A husband and wife, I think, should share the same religion."

After the divorce Rhonda's name was bracketed with A. C. Lyles', then with John Hilton's. She almost married John, who is an actor, but then she remembered one of the causes for the bust-up with Tom—financial insecurity. Now she is going places with blond, 34-year-old, very handsome Doctor Lew Morrill.

"Is it serious?" I asked, adding, "I've always wanted to marry a doctor myself." "It takes a special kind of woman to marry a doctor," replied Rhonda. "Lew's been married twice. During the first marriage he was away in the war and like me and Tom got a divorce when he returned. He says if he ever marries again, he'll choose a woman who works." This is another switch. Most successful men like the little woman to concentrate on them.

"I always said I would never marry a doctor." Rhonda revealed. "But Lew must be quite experienced at being married by this time. After two failures, maybe the third will take." One thing is sure, whoever Rhonda does marry will have to be successful at something.

"How about a very young girl marrying a successful middle-aged man?" I asked Rhonda. "I'm thinking of Lauren Bacall and Bogart, and June Allyson and Dick Powell, and Gene Kelly who isn't middle-aged, but was considerably older than Betsy Blair—he married her when she was 17." "No, I still think she should wait. And no matter what, no one should rush into marriage. There's no such thing as love at first sight. You have to grow on each other. It takes at least six months to know a man well."

OF course, that doesn't always work out, either. Jane Wyman and Ronald Reagan were engaged about a year and Jane was in her early twenties, too. She was only 18 when Myron Futterman, Ronnie's predecessor, took her for better or worse. It turned out worse for them both.

I don't know how long lovely Doris Day waited to wed first hubby, Al Jordan. But it wasn't long. She was 17. Husband number two, George Weidler, brother of Virginia, was a snap decision of 1946. But fate has forced Doris to wait a year to marry Marty Melcher, until he gets his California divorce decree from Patti Andrews. Doris is now 26. Perhaps she is not too young to marry now.

Nearly every star you can name was married once before she was twenty years old—Esther Williams, Elizabeth Taylor, June Haver, Joan Blondell, Paulette Goddard, Ginger Rogers, Vivien Leigh, Ruth Roman, Gloria de Haven. Some of the hasty-hearted lasses have married again, and again.

But who can really say when is the right age for anyone to marry? You can wait until you're forty, like Jimmy Stewart—and he's supremely happy. You can be married for forty years like Edward Arnold, then tell the judge it was all a mistake. But for the record I'm stringing along with Rhonda. I believe that if you can wait until after you are 21, the odds are in your favor for a happier marriage. At least your eyes are open.

my mama done told me

(Continued from page 55) search of the house wondering, as I have a thousand times in such jams, why I hadn't checked everything well before time. Upstairs in the bathroom I found some scented stuff tucked away on a shelf and breathed a sigh of relief when I read the word "alcohol" listed as an ingredient. We sat down when he came and I started breakfast. My emergency fuel took a long time lighting, but finally a flame flickered over the surface of it and I put on the chafing dish. Then I broke the eggs and started stirring them. We talked and I stirred. I stirred and we talked. Finally my talk went completely mechanical because a horrible suspicion was dawning on me . . . the eggs weren't cooking. "If something doesn't happen soon. . . !" I thought—but nothing happened. The alcohol wasn't a high enough concentrate to keep burning once the dish was over it. Instead of a gracious hostess magically producing a delectable dish, I must have looked like a dope sitting there stirring up a greasy, yellow mess! I know I felt like one.

WELL, anyway, that will give you an idea of the sort of person Mother had to contend with in me. But not a complete idea. Mother is the sort who can go through a room and almost in the passing leave things straightened up so everything looks attractive. I was the kind of child who could wreck a room in the same length of time.

But Mother persevered with me. Sometimes she had to be a bit drastic. When I failed repeatedly to keep my own room in order, she walked in one day, emptied every drawer in the place onto the floor, and then took the drawers away with her. She said I could have them back if I intended to use them as they were meant to be used, as places for things put away neatly. Otherwise the floor was all I needed. To this day I am not too good at keeping my things in order. There is always something I miss.

Mother is visiting me now. After all, I am married and mistress of my own home, but just the same, before she was due, I went over my room from top to bottom. When I was through I was certain it would pass the most critical eye, as I knew it would have to pretty soon. Sure enough, shortly after she arrived, Mother wandered upstairs by herself and I knew she would wind up in my room. I sat back on my chair in the living room complimenting myself on my foresight. But in a minute I heard Mother calling me, and I knew I had missed somewhere. There was that tone in her voice that all mothers use when they "discover" something.

"If you'll just come upstairs I want to show you something," she said.

I went up, running over everything in my mind. I was certain nothing was out of place. Yet when I went into my room there was Mother standing in front of my open wardrobe and pointing to something on the shelf. I looked closer and to my horror saw the long ash of a cigarette which had fortunately burned itself out after I had carelessly forgotten it there!

THERE are other little faults. I seem to spend half my time looking for things and the other half not finding them. If I have some people coming over I either overlook any number of important preparations or else rush around so getting things ready that before my guests come I wish they would go home. And rarely do I, as Mrs. John Hodiak, step out of an evening with Mr. John Hodiak, without his having to say, "Dear . . . the seam on your left stocking . . ."

Mother and Dad tell me that I did my first acting when I was three years old. Somebody had torn all the flowers off in the garden and that somebody they knew must be me. I was brought up and questioned about it. With both of them standing there I gave them separate answers. I told Daddy, "Yes, I tore them off." I told Mother, "No, I didn't tear them off." They said it was a very convincing, if not satisfying, performance.

I was permitted to carry on a general "make believe" existence. When Mother would have guests I might greet them at the door as a French maid, serving cookies and tidying up afterwards. Not a word would be said to break me up in the character I was playing, not by Mother nor by her friends, whom she would warn to accept me for what I was pretending to be.

IT was about that time that Mother began to understand that my dislike of the unembroidered truth was somehow mixed up with my love of acting, and she sought to straighten me out on the difference. When I was Anne I must tell the truth, she said. And when I was portraying someone I could give full rein to my fancies.

"If you've broken a plate and you come and tell me so," she explained, "why it's just a broken plate we have to worry about. But if you aren't truthful about it, there's much more than a broken plate to worry about. There's no compromise with honesty—ever!"

The next thing I broke was not a plate and it wasn't in our home. It was a China lady jar which contained cookies and stood in the home of my grandmother, whom we had gone to visit. I didn't mean to break it. I held on to the handle so hard, for fear it would break (while I was snitching a cookie) that it cracked off in my hand. There was nobody around, but I went right to my grandmother and told her about it.

She told me not to worry because she would mend it with some special glue she had. As I stood watching, she fitted each little fragment back into place and then stuck the handle onto the jar again.

"Nobody will even notice it," she whispered.

And she was right. When Mother and Dad returned they didn't once look at the China lady, which was something I couldn't understand because I could see nothing else but that in the room. I decided I had better tell them and start up some of the excitement a situation like that deserved!

Eventually I learned to treasure the truth. Mother and Dad both saw to it that my wild imagination was directed into dramatic channels—very wise, I think, and invaluable in my later career as an actress.

WHEN I was seven my curiosity turned on myself in a very personal way, and for my answers I went to Mother. She had no intention of stalling off any explanations. She had a book called "Growing Up," and using the illustrations she answered not only my first questions but all the others her replies prompted. I remember a picture of just a dot and the caption on the picture that identified it as the human egg and went on to say, "You were like this once, only this is 200 times larger than you were when you started to grow."

Why, I was all athrill. That was me . . . so tiny?

Downstairs in another apartment lived twin boys about my age. The first chance I had I took that book and went right down to them. I showed them all the pictures and word for word told them exactly what Mother had told me. That was how they learned about life. But, of course, they had to run and brag to their mother of all they knew, and that lady, with horrified mien, lost no time calling on us.

I will never forget how Mother handled this as far as I was concerned. It proved to be one of the most important parts of the new revelations now opened up for me. Later that evening, she took the book and went over everything again with me. Then she put the book away and talked to me gently.

"But this story of life is so beautiful, darling, that it is also very personal," she told me. "Some day you are going to share it with someone, but until that day comes along it is just like something sacred that you keep to yourself."

On me, at least, the effect of this was, I think, perfect. It was as if something most important were entrusted to me and involved in me and my romantic future, and I certainly could never thereafter be casual about it. Much of this is instinct with every girl, of course. But it certainly did no harm to have the knowledge as well.

I know that Mother felt more secure about me as a result of this, particularly when by the time I was thirteen I was already acting on the professional stage. This was about the time I began to seriously worry about my looks, and pester her—as what daughter does not—with the age old question, "Do you think I am beautiful?"

ONE day we went to see Our Town and before we knew it we were watching the scene in which Emily asks the same question of her mother. You know, it goes:

Emily: Am I really pretty? But am I beautiful?

Mother (firmly): You are pretty enough . . . for all normal purposes.

Well, from then on, that was Mother's answer to me!

Along about this period, too, I started bringing boys home, some of them very unusual specimens I realize now. But there was never an objection to any of them from Mother, never anything but an acceptance that if I liked them she liked them, too. Just the same, she was feminine enough, and you might also add clever enough, to let me see some of them with her eyes if they didn't strike her too favorably, provided I asked her. She volunteered nothing.

"How do you like Joe?" I would inquire.

She would wrinkle her brow. "Joe? Now which one is that?"

I would try to describe him and then Mother would know.

"Oh, yes," she would say. "That's the one I always feel I'd like to use some Dutch Cleanser on."

"Oh, Mother!" I would cry. But afterward I would think to myself and it was true about Joe. He was a bit grubby, at that!

Mother and Dad did some practical things about my theatrical career, things which they figured out themselves as being phases of my training which neither the drama school nor my other coaches could supply as well. And they were right.

They began taking me out in the public a lot; to restaurants, shows, parties. They would let me order my meals, spend a lot of time with people as they are on parade in contrast to the people as I knew them when I would see them at home. Up to that time my views of life had been sheltered. They saw to broadening them out. Little by little I was getting the answers to the many questions all young people have about society. I wasn't being told. They were being demonstrated for me and I was absorbing them, consciously and unconsciously.

I think it was Mother's inspiration to do this because it gave me, painlessly, a sense of social responsibility. But the greatest thing Mother ever did for me (and Dad!) I think, she did before I was born: she got herself happily married. There was love in our home—and behind everything Mother ever told me was the force and security of this love. I knew I wanted such a home for myself when I grew up, and since Mother had been successful she must really know the secret of a full and happy life. So I listened to her. And I am still listening.

crosby's the name

Gary, who plays fullback for Bellarmine, says, "We have a cattle ranch in Nevada, you know, and it's a little early for me to know what I want to be, but I sure like animal husbandry and agriculture and stuff like that. Maybe I'll study ranching and agriculture.

"Making records with Dad is a lot of fun, and I like music. I play the trombone, you know, and I like being on Pop's radio show, but as I said, it's too early to tell what I'm gonna do when I finish school. I like a lot of things."

When asked if that included girls, Gary nodded his head vigorously and smiled. "You bet."

According to his mother, "Gary is shy with girls." According to his schoolmates, however, "He's shy with girls like a fox."

Gary started dating last year when he was sixteen, and according to Hal Kanter, one of Bing's ace script-writers, the youngster's so-called "coming out" into the world of the opposite sex served as the basis for a very funny radio script.

Matter of fact, Gary was put on Bing's radio show to re-enact a scene which had purportedly taken place in the Crosby home. It went something like this:

Gary had his first date and didn't know how to break it to Bing. "Thought I might go out for a bite," he ventured.

Bing slapped his hands together. "Say," he exclaimed. "You might have something there. We might very well do that."

Gary: "We?"

Bing: "Yes, we!"

Gary: (sort of stammering): "Well, Dad, would it be okay if you didn't go?"

Bing: "You mean you're going out to eat with one of your school pals?"

Gary: "Kinda."

Bing: "What do you mean—kinda?"

Gary: "Well, Dad, what I had in mind was something more like a girl than a pal.

Bing: "What are you talking about?"
Gary: "It's a pal. But you wouldn't exactly say she's a fella."
Bing (surprised): "You mean that you asked a girl for a date?"
Gary: "It was inevitable, Dad."
Bing: "This comes as rather a shock to me. You're an athlete, a football player. You shouldn't be thinking about girls."
Gary: "Well, girls are more fun than football. Besides, they're not so seasonal."
Bing: "I guess that's right. But I always thought you were so bashful. I always thought of you as being timid around girls."
Gary: "That's good."
Bing: "What do you mean?"
Gary: "A shy guy does a lot better than a wise guy."

THERE's always a lot of good-natured bantering around the Crosby home among Bing and the four boys, and supposedly on another occasion when Gary was going out, he asked the Old Man for an advance on his allowance.

"I don't want to play the stern parent," Bing's supposed to have said, "but if you want extra money, you can do what I did when I was a kid."

"But Dad," Gary insisted, "I don't want to stand on street corners and sing."

All six Crosbys are known for their sense of humor. Probably the sharpest of the lot is Linny, the youngest, who is 12.

Several years ago when all four boys were enrolled at St. Johns Military Academy, they were like most young kids, a little boastful. "My father could buy this whole place out in three minutes," they'd tell their little friends.

Perturbed at their attitude, so the story goes, one of the instructors at the school phoned Paramount, got hold of Bing on the set, and told him that his boys were bragging a little too much.

Bing got down to the school in a hurry. He lined his offspring up and began to let them feel, one by one, his big fat palm on their backsides. When finally he got down to Linny, the youngest Crosby said, "Don't spank me, Pop. I didn't say a word. Honest, I didn't. I didn't say a single word about how rich you were. I even said that the government took most of your money, and what the government didn't get, Uncle Everett stole."

BECAUSE Gary—his full name is Gary Evan, the Gary for Gary Cooper and the Evan for Bing's maternal grandfather—has developed into a personable, talented young man, Bing has been on the receiving end of a lot of praise. He's been congratulated for not spoiling Gary, for bringing him up correctly, for having himself developed into a good father.

As Bing himself says, "Most of the credit goes to Dixie. She raised Gary, she raised the twins, she raised Linny—heck, she even raised me."

Dixie has modestly stayed in the background where Bing and the boys are concerned, but Bing will make no move involving any of his clan without first consulting his wife.

During World War II, the U.S. Army asked Bing if he and the four boys would appear on a command performance to be broadcast to the troops overseas.

"I'll appear on it," Bing said, "but I can't say for the boys. You'll have to ask their mother."

Dixie gave the okay, and for the first time, the boys appeared before a microphone.

Even as a youngster, Gary showed great stage presence. He was never nervous. He read his lines beautifully, and he seemed always to have an instinctive sense of timing. Best yet, he photographed and still photographs exceptionally well.

Five years ago, Gary made a picture for Paramount when he was 12. Bing and the other three boys were in it, too. It starred Ed Gardner in Duffy's Tavern, and it wasn't much of a film, but the boys liked it, and Gary remarked at the time, "This isn't a bad racket."

Over at Paramount, the studio bigwigs say that show business is in Gary's blood and it's just a question of ten years before he supplants his old man as filmdom's number one attraction.

"Matter of fact," one executive recently said, "I was speaking to Bob Hope only the other day. He heard Gary's latest recording and wants the youngster to appear in his next picture."

When Bing was told about this and asked if he would give his okay, he shook his head and broke into that wonderful grin of his.

"Gary with Hope?" he repeated, simulating the outraged parent. "Absolutely not. We've tried to keep that boy in a good environment."

THANKS to his parents, Gary Crosby is today a level-headed young man who knows the value of money, family, education, and religious training.

Bing and Dixie sent him to a Catholic military school as a youngster, and Bellarmine is a parochial school where Gary's religious faith is an integral part of his schoolwork.

He mixes well with the other fellows in school, and like his mother, he's quiet, reserved, and well-behaved. He takes no liberties because his name is Crosby, and his recordings are selling like mad.

He thinks this is more of a fluke than anything else, and would rather make the varsity football team at college than the first-string star list at Paramount.

Every summer, along with his brothers and father, he heads for the Crosby cattle ranch at Elko where his 185 pounds hold him in good stead and Bing pays him a regular weekly salary.

Even though the royalties he's earned from his recordings probably make him the richest of the four Crosby kids, he doesn't think too much of that accomplishment.

What pleases him most is what Bing told newspapermen last summer. "Gary is just about the best haying hand I've got on the ranch," Bing said.

"Coming from Pop," Gary later admitted, "that was sure sweet music to my ears. Pop isn't a fast man with praise."

he's nobody's pretty boy now

(Continued from page 32) given another featured role, and long before the release of that picture, Tony's fan mail was flooding the studio, outstripping by far the mail of the established stars on the lot.

In the vernacular of show business, Tony is the hottest thing in Hollywood, and he himself is even more puzzled than the studio. Recently, he went into the office of Al Horwits, publicity chief, and flopped into a chair.

"I can't believe it," he said. "I just can't believe it. Yesterday I was collecting black eyes in the Bronx, and today I have a car and I'm living in a house. A real house!"

These material things, while astounding to Tony himself, are not the real miracle of the boy's career. His childhood gave him every opportunity to end up in the world of crime, and the fact that he got off the streets of New York is in itself the miracle.

TONY'S parents were born in Hungary, met and married in New York City. In Budapest his father had been an actor, but difficulties with the English language prevented such a career in the United States, and Manuel Schwartz became a tailor. Tony was their first-born, and being people of great sensitivity and great faith, they blended their efforts and their prayers to keep the boy on a straight path. There was little else with which to accomplish their goal. Money was scarce, and the job of tailoring kept them within the confines of the city of New York. Manuel Schwartz set up many tailor shops, selling them when they became established, and moving on to another place. Tony's childhood was lived in thirty different apartments, most of them in neighborhoods that were taut with poverty. Bums slept in the halls, and the buildings reeked of stale food odors. For Tony, the air in the street was better than that of the tenement houses, and the alleys, fire escapes and vacant, sagging houses afforded opportunity for adventure.

When he was seven years old he was playing one day in a condemned house near the East River. His companions were two boys of his own age, and of Czechoslovakian parents. Their play was interrupted by the sudden appearance of a much bigger boy, a lad whose red hair and pug nose marked him as a son of Ireland. He approached them threateningly.

"What's yer name?" he asked one of the Czech kids.

The boy was no fool. "Murphy," he said.

"Yours," said the big boy, pointing to the second kid.

"Sweeney."

The intruder drew the cuff of his sleeve over his mouth and looked at Tony. "How about you?"

Young as he was, Tony had his cue. "O'Flaherty," he said.

The bully grabbed him by the collar. "What's your real name, dog?"

Tony felt tears welling to the surface. "Schwartz," he said. "Bernie Schwartz."

The big boy directed a stinging slap across Tony's face. "That's one fer lyin'," he said, and let go with another blow. "That's two fer sayin' yer Irish." Then he doubled his fist and struck Tony full on the mouth. "That's fer bein' a Jew," he said.

EVERY time the Schwartz family moved to a new neighborhood, Tony found he had to fight his way into the reigning gang, and once accepted was free to breathe easily until the next move. He never told his parents the cause of the fights, knowing how it would hurt them. Always he was careful to wash the telltale blood from his face before he went home. One night his mother sat by the window for hours, waiting for him to come home. By ten o'clock she was furious at his disregard of the curfew hour set by his parents, and by midnight she was distraught with worry. At one o 'clock she saw him approaching on the streets below, and when his steps sounded on the stairs outside the apartment door, she jerked it open and started to berate him. Then she saw his face. One eye was swollen, his nose was bleeding, and there was a gash across his chin.

"You've been fighting," she said, and reached out to strike him.

"Ma! Ma!" There was anguish in his voice. "Don't hit me, ma! I'm tired of fightin'." He broke down then. "Three guys, ma. They called me a dirty Jew. Three of 'em, ma. I had to fight. Don't you see?"

Helen Schwartz sat down on the top step and cradled her son's head in her arms. The tears streamed down her cheeks as she rocked back and forth with the age-old sorrow of the mothers of a persecuted people.

The next morning Manuel Schwartz asked his son to step into the tailor shop before leaving for school. Tony found his father with a long stick in his hands. It was the "clopper," a board used in pressing suits. Without a word, Manuel took Tony's schoolbooks and slipped the clopper through the strap that bound them. He smoothed Tony's hair with his big hand. "Good luck, my son," he said.

THERE was another reason Tony had to fight his way into each new neighborhood. The kids used to taunt him by calling him "pretty boy," and it made Tony tingle with fury. His parents, weary as they were of the perpetual brawls, knew that the code of the streets required that Tony prove himself, and as time went on they seldom upbraided him for fighting. Helen Schwartz concentrated on cleanliness, respect for elders and good manners, and her efforts were rewarded, for Tony was always a neat and a polite boy, and while he and his cohorts fought with other boys, they observed an unwritten law of chivalry and never molested a girl.

The years went by slowly, as they are inclined to do in childhood, and Tony spent an increasing amount of his time on the streets. The boys played Johnny-on-the-pony and Ring-a-levio. They swiped potatoes, which they called mickeys in those days, and put them in empty bean cans punched with holes. The potatoes were then surrounded by hot coals and a long string attached to the can. If a boy was adept at the art, a few minutes of swinging the can violently above his head would result in the most delectable potato ever eaten by mortals. They followed the inevitable parades of New York City, throwing pebbles and poking sticks between the legs of the marchers. They went over to Third Avenue, where the street cars ran on a double track. Here they jumped on the back of a trolley, and when another passed from the opposite direction, they risked their necks by leaping from one to the other. They removed the hard rubber from roller skates, making the front wheels flexible, put a board atop the skate at right angles, squatted on it and sailed down hills thick with traffic.

WHEN Tony was about eleven years old he was admitted to the toughest gang in the neighborhood, making five in all. Frankie, the leader, was Italian, Johnny was a Negro, Mike an Irish Catholic and Emil was of German descent. The fighting began in earnest now, for whenever an outsider called one of them a "mick" or a "heinie," a "kike," a "nigger" or a "wop" —any of the expressions that continue to divide the world, all five boys dove in with heads down and fists flying. Theirs was one world, and they fought for it.

It made them tough. They had to be the leaders. They played hookey as often as possible in order to roam the streets, and they were fast becoming material for the underworld. Then one day they were rounded up by a weary truant officer, who gave them a piece of paper on which was written the name of Al Schwartz and the Jones Memorial Settlement House.

"You're to go see this guy Al—all five of you," he said. "And no funny business, or the cops'll hear about it."

The boys were filled with disgust at the prospect, but they knew they had to go. They approached the settlement house silently and glumly, their thumbs hooked in their belts. Al Schwartz met them at the door. He was a big man with a round face touched with the blue of a heavy beard. His nose was sharp and his teeth uneven, but there was something in his smile that made the boys immediately warm toward him, though at that moment they would have died rather than admit it.

"Hiya, fellas," said Al.

They looked at each other and sniffed. This guy knew from nothing. The form of address in their circles was "Hey, bum." They stood still, close together, and eyed Al suspiciously.

He motioned to the open door behind them. "Come on in."

They swaggered past him, taking care to look defiant.

"We're going to play a game," Al said.

"A game!" said Tony. "Holy chee."

Al smiled at him. "You see that desk over there? Now, that's a bank. This chalk line on the floor represents the street, and the police station is in that corner. I want you guys to figure out how you can rob the bank in less than five minutes without the cops seeing you."

The kids looked at him wide-eyed. What kind of a game was this? But they wasted no time. Frankie barked orders. Tony was to be the lookout, Emil and Mike would stay in the car, and he and Johnny would handle the bank itself.

Al Schwartz rose two degrees in their estimation that day. They went back again and again, and subtly and deftly, Al Schwartz began to wean them from the streets.

NATURALLY, the boys said nothing of this activity to the other kids in the neighborhood. They said nothing even to their parents, who as a group were happy these days because of the mysterious dearth of bloody noses and black eyes. The word got back to the school, however, probably through Al Schwartz, and one day the boys were requested by the principal to give one of their plays in the auditorium.

The five held a consultation as to the wisdom of the proposition. All but Tony admitted grudgingly that it might be fun to put on a play they'd done many times for Al.

"It's easy for you guys to say yes," Tony told them. "But what about me? I'm the broad in the show."

But they finally won him over, the school stage was attacked by King Arthur and his knights, and the applause was deafening. The next day the five heroes went about the school halls with slitted eyes and doubled fists, and none of the other kids dared to make a comment. A few days went by before an outsider ventured to remark that it had been a good play. The ice was broken and from then on Tony's gang, with the help of Al Schwartz, became the stock company of P.S. 82.

The new respect offered them did something for all five boys. They began to see that there was a more interesting way of life than the streets of New York. The neighborhood grocer, who used to stand guard over his fruit stand when he saw the kids coming, now smiled from under his big moustache and gave them each an apple. "You gooda boys," he used to say. And mothers, catching their offspring playing hookey, would yell from their fire escapes, "Shame on you! Why don't you be a good boy like Frankie and Bernie?" Little girls began to point at the boys and giggle among themselves, and Tony's school desk was flooded with anonymous love notes.

At twelve, Tony joined the Boy Scouts, and at thirteen he began spending his summers and holidays as an assistant junior counselor (dish washer) at the settlement camp. He progressed to assistant counselor (forest guide), and by time he was sixteen he was teaching dramatics to the kids at the camp.

The greatest regret of Tony's life is the fact that today he is unable to learn the whereabouts of Al Schwartz. Letters to New York settlement houses have brought no satisfactory response, and the kids in New York can give him no help, but Tony goes on looking, for he feels that he owes Al a great debt.

IT WAS fortunate, too, that Tony was started on the right path at that particular time, for when he was twelve his younger brother Julius met a sudden and violent death in New York traffic. To spare his parents, Tony himself went to the hospital to make the identification, and to this day he cannot speak of the tragedy without visible emotion. It shook Helen and Manuel Schwartz to the core, and from that time on their whole lives were centered around their first-born. Had Tony been inclined to go wrong, the added sorrow could conceivably have killed his parents.

As it was, their pride in him knew no bounds. His confirmation at the age of thirteen was a joyous affair. For ten dollars, Manuel bought Tony his first suit, a green check, double-breasted outfit that buttoned in the wrong places, which Tony remembers as perfectly awful—and which was never worn again. As he repeated his prayers on the rostrum, Tony could see from the corner of his eye the teacher who had drilled him in his lessons for this day. The man was shaking his head sadly, and as Tony muddled through a badly memorized prayer it occurred to him that the teacher was thinking, "This kid will never be nothin'."

His parents, oblivious to the mistakes, beamed with pride.

Manuel had hired a group of Hungarian musicians to play for the reception at the apartment afterwards, and the singing fiddles delighted the guests. Manuel was happiest of them all. He had arranged with the orchestra to play until midnight, and although the last guest had departed by ten o'clock and Helen Schwartz had gone to bed exhausted, Manuel signaled for the musicians to continue, and sat alone in his big chair until the witching hour.

IT WAS a big day for Tony, but more clearly than anything else, he remembers the advice his father gave him at the reception. All evening Manuel had been proudly watching his son, and after a time he called Tony to him.

"Bernie, my son," he said, "you have a good face now. When you are grown you will be a fine-looking man. But I want to tell you something you will never forget. Please." Manuel held up his hand, with the thumb and forefinger flattened from years of toil with the needle. He pointed first to his heart, then to his head. "You will never, my son, let it go from here—to here."

The combination of his parents' pride in him and Al Schwartz's influence gradually molded Tony into a boy who gave his family much less cause for worry, and only once more did he get into a fight, a fight that wasn't finished until years later. A schoolmate whom we'll call John Smith had taunted Tony for weeks, calling him the vilest of names. When Tony could stand it no longer he started to pummel the other boy. Teachers broke up the fight and Tony was hauled off to the principal's office. When he had explained the cause of his actions the man looked kindly.

"I can't blame you, my boy, not in the least. I would have done the same had I been in your position. But this is a situation I can do nothing about, and I'd be glad if you could control yourself."

Shortly thereafter, Tony's family moved into another neighborhood, depriving him of an opportunity to finish the fight on the streets, but the memory rankled.

Just before Tony turned seventeen his mother gave birth to another baby. From the moment she knew she was pregnant, Helen Schwartz had prayed that this baby would be a boy, to replace her lost Julius. Her prayers were answered, and soon after little Bobby made his appearance, Tony enlisted in the Navy, knowing that should anything happen to him, his parents had another child to enrich their lives.

He served on a submarine in Pacific waters for three years and his letters to his family were frequent and regular, with no mention of the danger to which he was subject every second. One day when they had surfaced near Guam and were loading torpedoes the loading chain snapped, and with the force of a giant slingshot, hit Tony in the back. The blow sent him skidding along the deck and into the water, and although he recovered sufficiently to see many more months of active service, the injury gave him considerable trouble. After his discharge in 1945 he was hospitalized for treatment of his back, and then decided on his future.

The long days at the hospital were brightened for the boys by a woman who regularly visited the ward and brought with her a stack of small books containing the plays of Shakespeare. The books were passed out to the patients and they were assigned their parts. One day Tony would be King Lear, the next Ophelia, and the next, Romeo. He read his parts so well that the woman urged him to take up acting as a profession.

Tony's arm didn't need twisting; he was in complete accord. But for the first six months out of the hospital he did what any GI wanted to do: visited friends, spent long and happy evenings with his parents, roamed the neighborhoods of his childhood—and spent all his money.

One day in the early part of this six months he bought himself a new suit and thus attired, went to the house where John Smith had lived seven years ago.

When Smith appeared he took one look at Tony and stopped stock still.

"I remember you—" he said, but he got no further. Tony's fist shot out and sent him sprawling to the pavement. Without a word, Tony turned his back and walked away. It was a score settled at long last, and with the thrust of his arm all the hate went out of Tony. Today he says he shouldn't have done it, that vindictiveness is no good and that he should have considered the source and forgotten the whole matter. Who is to say? It is possible that with that one blow, Tony Curtis rid himself of all the bitterness that had collected and festered in his soul during the years of his boyhood.

He felt set now to face the world, and knowing what he wanted to do, was tremendously excited when he learned that acting was included in the opportunities to learn offered by the GI Bill. He joined the Dramatic Workshop of the New School for Social Research, and for more than a year worked hard at his task. Then, feeling the need of practical experience, he joined a group of stock players who barnstormed the country, playing anywhere to any kind of audience. Tony learned his acting lessons well under these conditions. One time they were playing in a small hotel, and the dining-room tables had been shoved together to make a stage. Tony was playing the title role of The Jazz Singer, and as such, was making a fervent plea to his mother.

"Ma," he said, "you don't understand. I've got to do this—"

At this point a table leg gave way and Tony went crashing to the floor. Undaunted, he picked himself up and said, "Ma, I keep telling you we ought to get that floor fixed."

He graduated from one group to another, and finally landed with the Cherry Lane Theater in Greenwich Village. On short notice he played the lead in Golden Boy one weekend, and on Monday he received a phone call from a talent scout connected with Universal-International.

On the following Thursday he landed in Hollywood and was met at the airport by a chauffeur and a sleek Cadillac.

"You Bernie Schwartz?" said the chauffeur.

Tony nodded, and was whisked in silence to one of Hollywood's swankier hotels.

In the two years Tony has been in Hollywood, he has tackled the job of his training with the same energy he put into his boyhood. Realizing that he has much to learn, he is studying, in addition to his regular courses at the studio, psychology and speech and the Italian language. In New York, he had gathered a smattering of a great many languages from the parents of his friends, but he has always thought Italian to be the most beautiful. From the study of academic subjects he is gathering credits for Los Angeles City College, and yet finds time to keep himself in trim by taking fencing, boxing and dancing lessons.

Helen and Manuel Schwartz have come to Hollywood to live, at Tony's insistence. They rent a little house in the valley, where Manuel has found work as a tailor, and Bobby plays in the sunshine all day long. The house was scantily furnished when they moved in, and there was talk of the old reliable orange crates until such time as they could afford to furnish properly. But three days after they moved in Tony accompanied his mother to the market and disappeared for a while. When she found him again he steered her into a furniture store and pointed first to a couch, then to a bed, then a few chairs. "You like this?" he asked her. "And this? And this cupboard?" And when his mother nodded he whooped and took her in his arms.

"That's swell, Ma, because they'll be delivered today!"

Helen Schwartz looked at her son as though he had lost his mind. "What do you mean?"

"I bought them," he said.

Her eyes widened. "All this?" The sweep of her arm took in the furniture he had pointed out. "You bought all this?"

Such an outlay of cash was incomprehensible to his mother. There have been many changes in her life and Manuel's, and the pleasure of having a house and garden is almost more than they can bear.

The name Bernie Schwartz has been changed, too. The studio chose James Curtis, but Tony remembers a particularly evil-looking monkey in the Bronx Zoo named James, and wasn't too happy about his new monicker. In the Navy he had spent his spare time reading "Anthony Adverse," and he liked the sound of it so much that he dropped a hint to the studio, and they settled on Anthony. Bobby, who retains his New York accent, gives it an inflection that delights Tony.

"Aaant-ny," says Bobby, and Tony roars with laughter.

The only thing that hasn't changed is Tony himself, who remembers his father's advice the night of his confirmation.

All of Hollywood is captivated by the novelty of this boy whose accent advertises his Bronx beginnings and whose frankness and enthusiasm make him a standout in a stereotyped town.

He keeps in close touch with his New York friends, and occasionally there's a phone call between Manhattan and Hollywood.

"Watcha doin'?" the gang wants to know, and then the inevitable question, "Who ya datin'?" The last time he mentioned a fairly well-known actress, Tony could hear a sharp intake of breath at the other end of the line.

"Does she kiss good?" his pal asked.

Someday Tony wants to buy his family a house of their own, but in the interim the foursome leads a happy life in their small cottage. Tony's pictures all but cover the mantelpiece, and Helen Schwartz will often stop to look at them. "Isn't my Bernie pretty?" she says. And Tony howls his protest. "Mom! Please! Don't say that!"

Then he grins and hugs her, and sometimes in the evening he will go to the brand-new desk and take out his contract, to make sure he isn't dreaming. He isn't. At the age of 25, Bernie Schwartz has a seven-year contract, as good as gold.

taming of the shrew is thrown in, but Yvonne ends up with The Desert Hawk, even though it grieves her princessly soul to wed a blacksmith. (In between frantic kisses, she sneers, "blacksmith," which is the way I found out.) Technicolor.

Cast: Yvonne De Carlo, Richard Greene, Jackie Gleason.—Universal-International.

TEA FOR TWO

What this movie has to do with the play called No, No, Nanette, I can't be positive, but the main character (Doris Day) in Tea For Two is named Nanette, and she has to go around saying "no" for 24 hours, so there is a connection. Doris is an heiress, and when she finds she can't back a show starring herself, and the music of Gordon MacRae, because her guardian-uncle thinks she wastes too much money, she makes Unk a bet. She'll say "no" for 24 hours, and he'll let her have $25,000 for the theatrical enterprise. Little does she dream he's already lost most of her cash in the stock market. Goofy story, but a lot of talented young players—dancer Gene Nelson is really good, and you can also get a look at Patrice Wymore (the lady Errol Flynn plans to marry), and Eve Arden is still drawling cynical sayings in her usual way, in case you go for that. MacRae's music is worth building a show around, all right, but why not? It was originally written by Vincent Youmans, George Gershwin, and a couple of other people. Technicolor.

Cast: Doris Day, Gordon MacRae, Gene Nelson.—Warners.

STELLA

Here's a delightful, delicious, original kind of comedy that never stops being fun for a single minute. First you meet the Bevins family. Ann Sheridan is Stella Bevins, and what she doesn't know is that her two loutish brothers-in-law (David Wayne and Frank Fontaine), who live off her when they aren't collecting unemployment checks, have just buried her equally loutish Uncle Joe. Uncle Joe's a souse; he'd attacked David, lost his balance, fallen and killed himself, but the boys figure who'll believe that story, so they plant the body, with the encouragement and consent of their wives. When the chief of police calls the boys down to identify the body of a guy who's been run over by a railroad train (the whole town has heard of Uncle Joe's disappearance), the boys know the train's victim can't be Uncle Joe, but they identify the corpse anyhow, because they've just found out Uncle Joe was insured for $20,000. A smart insurance investigator (Victor Mature) foils 'em, but they keep right on identifying every stiff that comes into the coroner's office as Uncle Joe, in the hopes of laying their hands on that insurance money. When they finally try to dig up Uncle Joe, and get the money more or less honestly, they discover they've laid him to rest in an old Indian burial ground, and they'll probably be digging for the next hundred years, before they come to the right remains. It sounds like an unsavory topic, but it's handled so well, and the picture's so hilarious, I don't see how anybody could be offended. The performances are swell (Mature gets Sheridan) and you'll laugh yourself silly.

Cast: Ann Sheridan, Victor Mature, David Wayne, Randy Stuart.—20th Century-Fox.

THE BLACK ROSE

If you were a Saxon in 13th-century England, you'd still be smarting about the Norman conquest, and the Norman king. Saxon Tyrone Power, for instance, got no money, got no future, got an old granddaddy and an ancient castle is all, but he's so proud he can't even mention the word Norman without losing his lunch. He leaves the country to seek his fortune in the "almost legendary Far East," and he meets up with Mongolian war-maker Orson Welles, dressed in an $8,000 mink-lined leather coat, and he falls in love with a small half-breed (Cecile Aubry) who's being sent as a gift to Kubla Khan, and he has adventures that make Marco Polo look like Alice-Sit-By-The-Fire. The locations for this movie are really exciting—desert scenes were shot in French Morocco, historic English castles were used as sets, etc. There are several good English actors on hand, Cecile Aubry, the tiny French star, makes her American debut, and a supposedly Chinese gent known as "The Bird Who Feathers His Nest" comes up with the best Mexican accent since Pancho Villa. I don't know if this was supposed to be comic relief, but it's certainly funny.

Cast: Tyrone Power, Orson Welles, Cecile Aubry, Jack Hawkins.—20th Century-Fox.
